THE children of the deceased monarch reaped the fruits of this instance of moderation. With one voice the Mexicans proclaimed Vitzilicutli the successor to his father's dignity, as soon as the funeral obsequies of the late prince were performed. He was crowned and anointed with the utmost ceremony, and adored in a manner little inferior to the gods. It was the custom of the Mexicans to appoint one of the elders of the city to infuse salutary maxims in the breast of the new monarch, by a formal harangue, pronounced before the assembled people. The sage chosen for this purpose recommended it to Vitzilicutli, as the duty of a prince, to be the guardian of the infirm, the aged, the widow, and orphan; to be the father of the public, and to study the happiness of the people, whom he called the feathers of his wings, the balls of his eyes, and the ornament of his countenance. Immediately after his coronation, the young monarch, by the advice of his council, married the daughter of Azcapualco, the inveterate enemy of his country, in hopes of reconciling the two nations; and the project succeeded so far, that the whole tribute was remitted, except two fowls and some fish, which was yearly sent as a testimony of the vassalage of the Mexicans.

poca, out of respect to his grand-father, altho' he was then but ten years of age; but
- e Azcapualco dying, the treacherous Tepeacans murdered the minor king of Mexico, and thereby revived the antient animosities of the two nations. To conduct the war that ensued, the Mexicans chose Izcoalt for their fourth king.

- IZCOALT* was a prince of great valour and prudence, inheriting all the virtues of his illustrious father, the royal Acamapixtli. He declared war against the Tepeacans, and pursued it with so much success, that the enemy were entirely subdued, and the dominions reduced to a province of the empire. His nephew Tlacaclec, the greatest warrior of his time, was at the head of the Mexican troops; and this general no sooner finished the Tepeacan war, than he turned his arms against the cities Tacuba, Cacoaycan Suchimilco, and all the tribes surrounding the lake of Mexico, whom he defeated and compelled to acknowledge the sovereignty of his monarch. Every thing succeeded with the fortunate Izcoalt, who may properly be deemed the founder of the Mexican empire; because in his reign the city first extended her authority over the warlike nations of the lake, acquired the reputation of superior power and valour, and established that system of legislation, which was soon adopted by all the barbarians inhabiting this immense tract of country. He made some very considerable alterations in the political constitution of the Mexicans, by convincing them of the inconvenience resulting from popular elections, and persuading them to transfer their right of chusing their sovereigns to six electors, whom he nominated, namely, the kings of Tezcuc and Tecuba, and four princes of the blood royal. The people consented to this infraction on their liberties, and were never afterwards permitted to intermeddle in elections. Some of the great causeways were also built by Izcoalt, particularly that of Suchimilco, this being the punishment inflicted upon the conquered city, which the Mexican prince thought the most probable means of preventing her revolt, an immediate communication being opened with the capital.

AFTER

5th King.

AFTER a prosperous reign of twelve years Izcoalt died, and the elders met for the election of a successor. The general Tlacuellec, whom Herrera calls Tlacaellec, was one of the number, and had by his virtues acquired such influence, that his nephew Moteczuma, the first of that name, was raised unanimously to the throne of Mexico. To this prince is ascribed the barbarous custom of sacrificing all prisoners taken from the enemy, to add to the solemnity of his coronation; a custom founded on the savage policy of this warlike people, intimating, that warlike abilities were the most essential qualities in a monarch. To express his readiness to lay down his life for his country, Moteczuma was no sooner placed before the sacred fire in the temple, where the oath was administered to him, than he drew blood from the veins of his arms and legs, with the sharp bone of a tiger, and sprinkled the altar. Immediately after he invaded the Chalci, conducted the war in person, proved victorious, and returned triumphant with a multitude of captives, the principal of whom he sacrificed on the day of his inauguration. The Chalci, however, were obstinate; they were defeated, but not conquered. The war went on with great vigour, and cost Moteczuma the life of a brother; who, being taken prisoner by the enemy, had an offer of being raised to the royal dignity. This extraordinary proposal he rejected until he could speak with his countrymen; and to gratify a prince who had gained on the affections of the Chalci, they ordered a scaffold to be erected, from which he was allowed to harangue the Mexicans. "The gods forbid, said he, that I should be dazzled by the "splendor of a crown into treason. Learn of me, ye Mexicans, the duty which you owe
 "to your king and your country;" with which words he flung himself headlong from the scaffold, and perished. All admired the virtue of this young prince, the Chalci were inconsolable, and Moteczuma was animated to revenge his death. Several bloody battles were fought, and the Chalci entirely subdued, after an obstinate struggle. The Mexican altars reeked with the streaming blood of the prisoners, sacrificed to the manes of the prince; and hence this custom came to be established, it being afterwards usual in all the wars, to offer up the blood of their unfortunate captives to the gods.

T L A C A E L L E C was still at the head of the forces. To his good conduct chiefly was owing the reduction of the Chalci, and of all the nations bordering on the north and south seas; but he was less successful in the wars against the Tlascalans. This brave people had formed themselves into a republic, and defended their liberties with unparalleled courage. They foiled all the address of the Mexican general, and with greatly inferior forces withstood the utmost efforts of the numerous armies of the enemy. The Mexican tradition, and from it Acosta alledges, that Moteczuma suffered the Tlascalans to maintain their independency, only that he might have an enemy to exercise the Mexican youth in war, and furnish the altars of the gods with sacrifices; notwithstanding which boast, it is certain, that many serious attempts were made to reduce a nation that was considered as a galling thorn in the sides of the Mexican emperors. When Moteczuma had secured himself against all foreign attacks, he applied to the civil œconomy of his kingdom; which, upon account of his vast conquests, required extraordinary regulations and changes. He settled the royal court with great state and magnificence; he established courts of judicature in all the provinces; appointed censors to examine into the manners of the people; and, lastly, built that celebrated temple to the god Vitzliputzli, so much admired by the Spaniards, and so minutely described by all the historians of that nation.

AFTER a reign of twenty-eight years, in which he displayed the virtues of a good citizen, an experienced general, and a wise monarch, Moteczuma died, leaving the crown to be disposed of at the pleasure of the electors. The general Tlacaellec had considerably enlarged his influence during the late reign. His glorious victories rendered him extremely popular; the conquests he had made, added greatly to the grandeur and power of the empire; and the civil regulations which he projected, contributed to secure the happiness of the people. It was no wonder then, if the Mexicans were desirous of raising to the supreme dignity a person so well qualified to govern. All the electors voted with one voice that he should be rewarded with the imperial diadem; but the prudence of Tlacaellec triumphed over his ambition, and resisted all the importunity of the Mexicans. He positively refused to accept the crown for himself, while he recommended Tezazic, the eldest son of the late monarch, to their favour. It is difficult to imagine what could induce the general to this choice. Tezazic was pusillanimous, weak, and equally unfit to extend his dominions by war, or to render his empire respectable in peace; however, as Tlacaellec undertook to supply the deficiencies of his capacity, the young prince was elected, anointed, and crowned, with the usual ceremonies. The practice of the last monarch had established it as a custom, that every new elected sovereign should immediately distinguish his merit, by the reduction of some neighbouring nations. Tezazic, much against his inclination, was obliged to comply with a custom, now regarded as essential to the constitution, and an indispensable condition of his election. He therefore set

a out with an army to subdue a province, and behaved so ill, that he returned with great loss, and disappointed in his purpose. However, he kept up the appearance of a conqueror, endeavouring to divert the attention of the Mexicans from his misconduct, by shews and festivals; at one of which he was poisoned, after a short inglorious reign of no more than four years.

ALTHOUGH the recommendation of Tlacuellec proved unfortunate in this instance, he nevertheless preserved his influence. The choice of a successor was referred to him; and the general, out of gratitude to the memory of Moteczuma, nominated Axayaca, the second son of that monarch, and brother to the lately deceased sovereign. Old age disqualified Tlacaellec from commanding the army in person; his son was therefore raised to the dignity of general in chief of the Mexican armies by the grateful Axayaca; soon after which the venerable Tlacaellec died, and was buried with all the honours due to his extraordinary merit, and attachment to the royal family.

THE first expedition made by Axayaca was against the province of Tecomtipique and Guat-ulco, two hundred miles to the southward of Mexico, which he subdued, after defeating the enemy in a pitched battle. He returned in triumph to the city attended with a crowd of captives, whom he sacrificed in the temples at his coronation, and then set out upon another expedition against Tlatelulco, in which he was equally fortunate (A). The remainder of this prince's reign was pacific and happy; eleven years being spent, from the time of his coronation, in subduing his enemies, enlarging his dominions, augmenting his reputation, and promoting the felicity of his people.

WHEN the throne became vacant by the death of Axayaca, the electors chose Autzal, one of their own number, to the supreme dignity. This prince was nothing inferior to the most glorious of his predecessors in valour, wisdom, affability, and every virtue that graces and distinguishes the monarch. Being informed that the inhabitants of Quax-acatatlan had committed some violence against the tributaries of his crown, he set out with an army to punish their insolence, and soon reduced the city to submission. Proceeding in the course of conquest, he extended his dominions as far as Guatemala, annexing that province, and divers others, to his crown. But the fame of his victories was still inferior to the reputation acquired by his clemency to the conquered, his generosity to his soldiers, charity to the poor, and humanity to all. Void of all ostentation, he studied only the good of his subjects, and prudently checked that ambition of conquest, which frequently renders the subjects wretched, while it makes the sovereign great. Autzal spent his treasures in beautifying and enlarging the city of Mexico, in promoting industry, and rendering their habitations convenient to the inhabitants. With this view he brought a river of fresh-water into the city; but was so unfortunate as to drown several houses by an accident. However, he repaired this loss by dint of industry and genius, and completed his design to the great astonishment of all men, who beheld with admiration, so vast a body of water, directed according to the pleasure of the king, sometimes making its way over, and sometimes under mountains. This aqueduct has always been regarded as one of the most ingenious pieces of art in the great city of Mexico. He reigned about eleven years, honoured and admired; he died deeply regretted, leaving the throne to be filled by a prince of a different character, equally splendid in his virtues and vices, but more unfortunate than undeserving. This was Moteczuma the second of that name, whose history we have already related, the principal event of which was the invasion of the Spaniards.

SUCH is the history of the ancient Mexican kings, deduced entirely from oral tradition, and consequently replete with manifold falsities, the most glaring and absurd of which we have thought proper to expunge, though we will not presume to vouch for the truth of all we have been obliged to retain. The earlier ages of the most civilized nations, even of the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, is filled with the most incredible fictions and absurd fables; what then shall we think of the ancient history of a people who were ignorant of the use of letters, and forced to convey their ideas to posterity, either by impressing them deeply on the minds of their children, or committing them to the perishable materials of cotton in hieroglyphical signs, so imperfect as frequently to admit of various interpretations?

WE may form some idea of the genius and learning of the Mexicans from the manner in which they adjusted their kalender. This they disposed and regulated by the sun's

(A) Herrera and Acoſta have adopted a fabulous part of the Mexican tradition with respect to this war, which they seem to credit as a certainty. They relate, that the enemy metamorphosed themselves into swans, geese, and frogs; were encountered in this shape by the Mexican kings; defeated with great loss, and as a punishment obliged to imitate the cries of the animals whose figures they had assumed. Herrera alledges, that to this day the Tlaleluncans are bantered with this ridiculous punishment (1).

(1) Vide dec. ii. lib. x. cap. ii.

motion, making his altitude and declination the measure of times and seasons. To every year were allowed three hundred and sixty-four days, which they divided into eighteen months, assigning to each month twenty days. Thus the remaining four days they added at the end of each year, to make it answer the course of the sun. They believed that these four days were designedly left by their ancestors to be employed in mirth and recreation, for which reason they devoted them entirely to dissipation. Industry ceased, shops were shut up, the course of justice was stopt, and even the rites of religion were neglected during this period. Nothing but diversion was regarded, the Mexicans signifying by this their intention of renewing the labours of the ensuing year with renovated vigor, the beginning of which they placed on the first day of the spring, differing from the solar year, according to the computation of their astronomers, only three days, which they took from our month of February. a

BESIDES the division of the year into days and months, the Mexicans had an intermediate division of time into weeks, each of which consisted of thirteen days, with particular names, marked in their kalendar by certain images. Their age consisted of fifty-two years, or four weeks of years, the distribution of which was extremely ingenious, and described in the following manner by the elegant Antonio de Solis. They drew a large circle, which they divided into fifty-two degrees, allowing one year to each degree. In the centre stood the image of the sun, from which proceeded four rays of various colours, equally dividing the circle, and leaving thirteen degrees to each semi-diameter. These divisions were calculated to represent the signs of their zodiac, upon which their ages had their revolutions, and the sun his aspects, prosperous or adverse, according to the colour of the descendent ray. In a larger circle, inclosing the other, they noted with their hieroglyphical signs and characters all the accidents and occurrences of the age worthy of being transmitted to posterity; so that the Mexican kalendar was a kind of chronological register of facts, and annals that greatly assisted their oral tradition, by giving the fundamental points of those transactions upon which their writers, poets, and historians expatiated. De Solis calls the kalendar a species of secular maps, or public instruments, which served for a proof of their history; still, however, these hieroglyphical signs and characters were imperfect, and liable to misconstruction. Schools were instituted, wherein the youth were taught to celebrate the great actions of their heroes, and the most memorable events of the preceding ages, upon which the Mexicans relied much more than upon their kalendar. Upon the whole, imperfect as this method must appear to us who are acquainted with the use of letters, it must be acknowledged to be an ingenious substitute, and among the wisest institutions of the Mexican government; as the very recital of these martial achievements must necessarily inflame the youth with a desire of emulating the glory of their ancestors. c

IN the Mexican computation of their ages, there was a strong tincture of absurd superstition. They believed that the world was in danger of being destroyed, when the sun had completed the course of those four greater weeks; and when the close of this period arrived, they seriously prepared to sustain the shock of this dreadful and ultimate calamity. On the last night they bid farewell to the light of the sun with tears and moans; they expected death without previous sickness, they extinguished their fires, broke their household furniture, neglected their food, and abandoned themselves to sorrow. Thousands might be seen walking about the fields, agitated with the most violent transports of despair, until the dawn of the succeeding day revived hope, when they saluted the rising sun with all their musical instruments, with hymns and songs that expressed their tumultuous joy. They congratulated each other, that a new age was begun, and they should no more be subject to similar danger for the space of two and fifty years; for which blessing they crowded to their temples, to return thanks to their gods by sacrifices, and to receive from their priests new fire, which they kept burning with the utmost violence for the whole day before the altar, the night concluding with songs, dancing, and other diversions, dedicated to the renewal of time, in much the same manner as the Romans celebrated their secular games. Herrera affirms, that in Yucatan, and several other provinces of New Spain, the inhabitants had bound books, with leaves, on which were inscribed the virtues of plants and animals, the equation of time, and all the memorable events of preceding ages. "In the province of Mexico Proper, says he, they had a library of histories and kalendars, wherein they painted such things as had proper figures in their natural representations, and others that had none, with arbitrary characters." By which he would seem to intend, that sensible beings were represented by their pictures, and abstract ideas typified by certain fixed characters and symbols, similar to our art of writing and painting. e

Religion of the Mexicans.

WITH respect to the religious rites and ceremonies of the Mexicans, they were replete with such absurdities, cruelties, indecencies, and obscenities, as detract greatly from the good

- a good sense conspicuous in the people, and cannot well be described consistently with the strict decorum to be observed in history. Amidst a multitude of lesser gods, and the obscurity and blindness of their idolatry, they still acknowledged one supreme Deity, the Creator of the heavens and the earth, the Author of all good things, and the Principle by which we live, move, and have our being. To express this great original of all things, the Mexican language wanted a term, no words being thought sufficient to describe his attributes. They only signified their belief in the existence of this Deity by casting their eyes towards heaven with profound veneration; and giving him, after their way, the attribute of ineffable, in the same manner as the Athenians worshipped the Unknown God. Notwithstanding they ascribed omnipotence to the supreme Deity, they had no conception of ubiquity and omnipresence; they could not believe, that it was possible that the same God could govern the whole universe without the assistance of inferior ministering gods. They were persuaded there were no gods in the other parts of the heavens, until men began to grow miserable in proportion as they multiplied. They regarded the inferior gods as favourable spirits, produced as there appeared occasion, without shrinking at all at the absurdity of supposing them to owe their existence and divine nature to the miseries of human nature. They entertained an imperfect notion of the immortality of the soul, and of eternal rewards and punishments in a future state; though their ideas of virtue, vice, and moral rectitude, were extremely gross and absurd. Like most other savage nations, who pushed their inquiries to futurity, they blended the most ridiculous superstitions with evident truths, and buried great quantities of gold and silver with their deceased, to bear the charges of a tedious journey to the next world. Princes were honoured with mausoleums of great extent and magnificence; and it was usual with women to bury themselves also with their husbands, to testify their affection. The funeral of a prince was a dreadful spectacle; his whole household was obliged to accompany him to the next world, or to be stigmatized in this with ingratitude to their benefactor; a vice of the blackest dye among the Mexicans. The bodies were conducted with great pomp and solemnity to the temples, from whence the priests came forth to receive them with their copper censers, burning incense, and singing elegies and dirges to the accompaniment of hoarse, ill tuned flutes; the whole forming a melancholy, dreadful discord. The funeral obsequies of a great man continued for ten days, during each of which some of his vassals or servants offered themselves voluntary sacrifices, in order to render his dreary journey to eternity more easy by their services. The corpse was handed to the place of interment by all the ensigns and trophies belonging to the deceased. In a word, cruelty and pride obscured all the lights held forth by reason and superstition, rendering the Mexicans more wretched than if they had never carried their thoughts beyond the present existence. Funerals.

- Next to the supreme God, the ancient Mexicans held the sun, moon, the morning-star, and the sea, in the greatest honour. It was to compliment Cortez with divine honours they called him the offspring of the sun. The idol Vitzliputzli was their greatest sensible god; he presided over all the lesser idols; and, as some imagine, was the representative of the invisible God. The idol nearest in quality to this god, was the deity of penance and remission of sins, whom they called Texcalitliputca, made of jet black marble, and finely adorned with gold, silver, and jewels. In his left hand the idol held a pen of beautiful feathers, issuing from a plate of finely burnished gold, in which he held some darts, intimating the punishment he inflicted upon the wicked; and his throne was adorned with human skulls and bones, to denote his presiding over famine and pestilence. At Chalula, the inhabitants adored a famous idol, stiled the God of Commerce, because the people of that city employed themselves in merchandize. The figure and ornaments of this deity were expressive of his attributes; but one essential quality of all the Mexican idols was, to have an aspect hideously ugly, by way of inspiring terror. It would be tedious to specify all the lesser deities of both sexes adored by the Mexicans; we shall therefore only observe, that they frequently raised living men to divine honours, giving their prisoners the name of the idol to whom they were to be sacrificed. For the space perhaps of a whole year, they were treated with the honours thought due to the idol, worshipped in its stead, adorned with the jewels of the god, and fed with the most delicious offerings. When a prisoner was intended to be sacrificed, he walked along the streets, the people flocked round and worshipped him; they held forth their children and sick, that he might come and bless them; but care was taken that he should always be attended by a strong guard, to prevent his escaping.

THE Mexican priests were divided into the same orders and classes as the gods whom they served; those of the great idol Vitzliputzli succeeded to the sacred office by a kind of inheritance, the right of becoming the ministers of this god being vested in certain families. The priests of the other temples were by election, though many of them had been offered up to that function from their infancy. The sacerdotal office was one of the most Mexican priests.

lucrative and important in the state, as the clergy had great influence in all political and civil affairs, directing not only the consciences of the people, but the judgment of the sovereigns; in return for which they were obliged to perform certain rigid and painful penances, as the price of the honour and esteem in which they were held by all degrees of mankind. The high priest was likewise the sacrificer; he first plunged the knife into the breast of the unhappy victim, and tore out the heart of the bleeding sacrifice, which his blind zeal enabled him to perform without remorse, and regard as an action of sublime piety and devotion.

Marriages.

AMONG the Mexicans, marriages bore the form of civil contracts, blended with certain religious ceremonies. The preliminary articles being adjusted, the contracted pair appeared in the temple, and one of the priests sounded their inclinations, by certain ceremonial questions, appointed by law for that purpose. He then took the tip of the woman's veil in one hand, and a corner of the man's garment in the other, and tied them together, to express the indissoluble union of the lovers, and inseparable tie of their affections. Nor did this ceremony complete their marriage; the pair returned to their habitations, under this emblem of the nuptial yoke, visited the domestic fire, accompanied by the same priest, and offered worship to that element, which they believed essential to their union and happiness. They surrounded it seven times, after which they sat down to receive equal shares of the treat, and then the marriage was thought to be accomplished. The portion brought by the bride was registered in a public instrument, that every part of it might be faithfully restored, in case of a separation, which frequently happened. Here the law laid no restraint on inclination; mutual consent was judged sufficient cause for a divorce. The parties were supposed to be best acquainted with their own affections; and as their happiness was chiefly concerned, they were left to be their own judges; an institution which under certain restrictions, ought perhaps to be adopted, even on political principles, by more civilized nations; unless marriage be supposed a religious rite, ordained by the christian doctrine in its present form. When the nuptial tie was dissolved, and the parties separated, the boys became the care of the father, while the mother was enjoined to provide for the girls; and it was capital even again to unite or cohabit, that a due restraint might be laid on caprice and sudden transports of anger and violent passion. Thus, notwithstanding the natural fickleness of the people, divorces were extremely rare, and more instances of connubial happiness were to be seen in Mexico than in any other country. The danger incurred by attempting cohabitation after the dissolution of the nuptial bond, was sufficient to prevent their giving way to slight sallies of resentment, while any sparks of mutual affection remained; and the law thought it unreasonable to oblige two persons to inseparable union, who entertained for each other only sentiments of disgust. The Mexicans were extremely delicate of the chastity and conduct of their wives, as a point in which the honour of the husband was deeply concerned; so that amidst that boundless licentiousness with which they indulged their sensual appetites, they abhorred and punished adultery with the utmost rigour; less upon account of the atrociousness of the crime, than the inconveniences resulting.

Baptism.

As soon as a child was born, the infant was carried to the temple with great solemnity, and received by a priest, who pronounced a grave and pathetic oration upon the troubles and miseries to which it was doomed on entering into this life of wretchedness and corruption. In the right hands of infants of distinction the priest put a sword, and in the left a shield, to express the military life to which they were destined. Mechanical instruments were put into the hands, of the male children of plebeian extraction, and the females of every degree were adorned with the spindle and distaff, intimating the proper sphere of the more tender sex. This ceremony being ended, the infants were brought up to the altar, and a kind of circumcision was performed, by drawing blood from the privy parts with the prickle of maguey, after which they were dipped in water, while certain barbarous innovations were repeated. A ridiculous kind of communion was likewise observed at stated periods by the Mexicans, which the priests administered with great devotion, by dividing into small bits, a paste idol, which they called the god of Penitence. We need not observe the near resemblance of these institutions to those of the Jewish and Christian religions; it must strike the imagination of the most careless reader; yet we cannot avoid once more repeating, that many of the rites and ceremonies of the Mexicans were so barbarous in their nature, so shocking to humanity, so absurd, bestial, and incongruous, as to seem altogether incompatible with the regularity and undeniable œconomy observable in other parts of the government. One of the most detestable, though originally founded on policy, was the human sacrifices made to the gods; which was carried to so great a pitch of religious fury, that twenty thousand, on times, have sprinkled the altars with their blood in a single day. In one word, the Mexican religion was an abominable compound

a compound of impiety, absurdity, and cruelty, rendered more glaring by the accidental ray of natural reason, which sometimes enlightened the dreadful object.

It has already been observed, that the ancient government of the Mexicans was at first popular or republican; that the factions into which the people were divided obliged them to elect a sovereign; that the power of election was lodged in the hands of the whole body of the community: but this being found attended with inconveniences, it was delegated to the kings of Teczeuco and Tacuba, and four princes of the blood royal. We also observed that the king elect, after the reign of the first Moteczuma, was obliged, previous to his coronation, to invade some neighbouring nation, to augment the dominions of the crown, and to return with a number of captives, whom he was to sacrifice to the gods at his inauguration. In his return in triumph from this expedition, the monarch was met by the nobility, the ministers of state, and the chief personages of the sacerdotal function, who conducted him to the temple of the god of war, shed the blood of the human victims, then clothed the prince in the imperial robes, put a golden sword, edged with sharp flints, in his right hand, and in his left a bow and arrows, to express his supreme authority over all matters civil and military. The diadem was then placed on his temples by the sovereign of Teczeuco, the first elector of the empire; and one of the oldest ministers made him a speech, congratulatory and exhortatory, to the purpose we have already related. He was anointed by the high-priest with a kind of balm, jet-black, sprinkled with consecrated water; and, after receiving the blessing of this religious sage, adorned with a mantle, on which were painted the images of skulls and human bones, to remind him of his mortality. Several drugs, medicines, charms, and incantations, were likewise used at the coronation, to preserve the prince from the infection of diseases, and the power of enchantments; after which he offered incense to the god Vitzliputzli, and took an oath to maintain the religion and customs of his ancestors, to preserve the people in all their rights and privileges, and to render his subjects happy, and his empire powerful. It is also reported that he was obliged to swear, that the sun should shine by day, and the rains fall in their proper seasons; and that the land should neither be infested with plagues, famines, nor inundations, during his reign; by which it was not understood that the prince had power over the elements, but that he should do nothing to cause the vengeance of heaven, or draw down the punishment of his sins upon his innocent people.

IMMEDIATELY after the king's coronation, his court was appointed. His household and guards were magnificent beyond imagination; but as we have described many of these particulars in the history of the conquest of Mexico, it will be sufficient to repeat that Moteczuma II's court was splendid beyond that of any of his predecessors. No less than two hundred noblemen of the first distinction formed his body-guard, and served him with profound reverence at table. De Solis makes the number still greater, and describes the worship paid to the emperor as of a piece with the adoration shewn to the gods. No less than three thousand women were kept in the palace to gratify the lust of this monster of sensuality, who, in other respects, was a prince of great spirit, policy, and magnificence. In former reigns, the palace was crowded with concubines; but Moteczuma greatly augmented the number, and selected them from the virgins first in quality and beauty in his empire, either given by their relations, or violently extorted by way of tribute to the sovereign. Two of these ladies, the prince's favourites, were particularly distinguished, and the Spanish writers honour them with the title of queens; but whether they acquired this pre-eminence from their superior quality, from the peculiar favour of the sovereign, or in consequence of some contract before they were taken to the royal bed, we are not informed.

THE revenues of the crown have before been mentioned; they were indeed enormous, but the chief fund arose from the voluntary or extorted contributions of the people. All the laborious citizens and merchants of this vast empire contributed a third of their profits to support the imperial dignity. Officers were appointed, who made regular circuits to collect the revenue, in which they never suffered any deficiency, from whatever accident it might arise. The poor were stripped of their all, and the rich obliged to pay for the necessities of their inferiors. Whatever became of the subject, the monarch must be maintained in the utmost splendor and luxury of pomp.

THESE were gross imperfections in the Mexican government, which nevertheless was not devoid of excellencies. There was a remarkable harmony among the different departments of the constitution. There was a council of state, a council or board to manage the royal revenue, a council of war, which regulated every thing relative to the army; a supreme council of justice, and a board of trade and commerce. We shall relate the prerogatives of the principal of these, from whence the reader may form a pretty accurate idea of the ancient constitution of the Mexican empire. In the council of state were debated all matters of great importance; such as the imposing taxes, framing laws, forming alliances, or declaring war or peace. In this the king was supreme, and indeed arbitrary, when he chose to dissent from his counsellors, whom Moteczuma II. consulted, rather out of form than regard to the constitution. The supreme tribunal of justice resided at Mexico, and consisted of twelve judges, who determined all appeals from the lower courts, and gave a final verdict, unless the emperor thought proper to interpose. The towns and provinces had their proper judges and officers, who heard the parties and decided causes. Their decisions were summary and verbal; both sides appeared with their claims and witnesses, and judgment was immediately given, except when the point in litigation was too intricate for the determination of that court, in which case it was remitted to the superior tribunal at Mexico. There could be no bills nor answers, no tedious declarations and pleadings, to obscure truth and confound the judges, because there was no writing, which in this instance might be considered as a felicity. Unadorned facts and naked truth, undisguised by sophistry and rhetoric, alone prevailed; and if justice was at all perverted, the cause was immediately known, namely, that it was the pleasure of the sovereign it should be so, with which the people readily acquiesced. Custom and the institutions of their ancestors usually regulated the conduct of the judges. Rewards and punishments were dispensed with the greatest caution, and most rigid regard to justice. Murder, theft, adultery, and even the appearance of treason, were punished with death; sodomy and robbery too were deemed capital crimes; but some writers alledge, that the first instance of theft and robbery was punished only with the loss of liberty, and the second with the loss of life: Corruption in the ministers was capital; but slighter misdemeanours were easily pardoned, says De Solis, in a country where religion itself deformed justice by tolerating vice. The crimes committed by the magistrates were closely inspected by the prince, and always severely punished. This must be confessed from the superficial view of the Mexican policy exhibited by the Spanish writers, that they were possessed of some moral virtues. Their integrity and strict regard to that kind of justice with which they were acquainted, was sufficient to redress injuries, and maintain society among fellow citizens. The Mexicans, amidst all their impieties, impurities, and absurdities, still preserved some regard to that primitive equity implanted in the human soul, when men had no laws, because they were ignorant of crimes.

THE council of war nominated all inferior officers, issued out the pay of the soldiers, took care that the army was properly supplied with provision and every other necessary, and recommended to the royal notice those officers who had distinguished their zeal for the public service by their courage or capacity. As the government was in a great measure military, the soldiers were more favoured than any other degree of people. They sooner rose to great fortunes, to dignities, posts and employments, and even to civil titles and honours, than persons of the same quality of any other profession. Wherever the troops resided, they were distinguished by particular privileges and immunities; for this reason the nobility and gentry flocked to the army as the regular channel of preferment. It was therefore easy for the Mexican government to maintain a prodigious army, where men of fortune served at their private expence, in hopes of raising themselves to the royal notice by their merit. Besides, the caziques, and curacas, or governors of provinces, were obliged to bring a certain number of men into the field when required; and, if we may credit De Solis, the emperor of Mexico had thirty vassals, who could each of them raise a hundred thousand able-bodied soldiers; which alone sufficiently demonstrates the power of the empire, and renders next to supernatural the conquest of the Spaniards. These troops were commanded by their respective princes in person, who all received their orders from the emperor in person, or his representative. In all wars of great importance the emperor took the field, it being deemed extremely impolitic to commit great armies to the care of subjects, as it might be the means of seducing them from the fidelity they owed to the crown, and exciting an ambition which before lay dormant, because it was not roused into action. Military honours were instituted as rewards to those who had eminently distinguished their valour; they were of different kinds, in order to discriminate between the different degrees of merit. Some wore the eagle for a badge, others the tyger, and a third the lion, as the devices of their several orders. There was one of a superior nature, to which none but princes were raised, whatever merit they might possess. Of this order the emperor himself was always a member. They wore their hair tied back with a red ribbon, to which were suspended a number of tassels, which hung down their shoulders, according to the exploits they performed, a new one being added every time they performed any signal action. This was an admirable contrivance to excite emulation; and the honours were eagerly sought after, because they were never abused or conferred on the unworthy by court-favour. Signal services alone gave a title to those

- a those dignities, and it was necessary that the exploits of which they were the rewards, should be performed in the presence of the whole army, before those promoted could procure respect or esteem.

THE council of trade and commerce was strictly united to that of the revenue. They conferred together on the means of rendering the impositions on commerce most advantageous to the crown, and least oppressive to the subject. The board of trade examined all projects offered for the benefit of commerce, promoted them if approved, and rejected them if they were found inadequate to the purposes intended. They also adjusted and regulated all differences among merchants, and rated the market-prices of all commodities. We have, upon a former occasion, minutely described the great fair of Mexico, b at which the officers of the crown and the board presided, which may suffice to convey an idea of the prerogatives, and the utility of this board.

WE must take notice of the care taken by the Mexicans of the education of their children, and the diligence with which they studied their inclinations, as one of the most laudable institutions of their policy. Public schools were erected for the children of plebeians; and colleges, or seminaries of more polite learning, for the sons of the nobility. The method of education was adapted to the peculiar genius of the child, and the station in life in which he was to act. There were respective masters for every different branch of education, for infants, children, and youth, who had the authority of the king's ministers, and were justly regarded in that important light, because they formed c those principles and qualifications, which afterwards fitted their pupils for the service of their country. In these seminaries the young men spent their lives, until they were fit to emerge into light, embark in the publick service, and pursue those professions in which they were instructed. One of the first branches of education was to decypher those signs and characters, of which their kalendar and historical register was composed; and to recite, by memory, those songs which contained the valiant actions of their ancestors, and the praises of their gods. In the next superior class, they were taught modesty, humility, a gentle mild behaviour, and those qualities of the mind which endear men to the world, and prove so agreeable and useful to the peace and felicity of society. This was a species of ethical learning, by which moral habits were inculcated instead of refined speculative d principles; the masters were, therefore, of greater reputation and ability than the former, eminently skilled in the human heart, and fully practised in the means of contending with youthful inclinations, and correcting violent passions. When the youth had acquired what was deemed a sufficient moral knowledge, and were supposed able to bend their passions to reason, they passed on to the third class, where they employed themselves in robust exercises, and were taught to govern strength by dexterity and address; they raised heavy weights; they wrestled, and vied with each other in running and leaping. They were instructed in the use of arms, how to handle the sword, throw the dart, and shoot the arrow with force and exactness, in which many became extraordinary proficient. They were inured to hunger, thirst, fatigue, hardened against the inclemencies of the e weather, and formed in all respects in the rudiments of the military art, as far, at least, as it was understood in Mexico. When the young nobility returned home, they were then allowed to pursue their inclinations, and to embrace a civil, military, or religious life, just as they thought proper; it being very reasonably supposed, they would succeed best in that sphere to which they were led by inclination, without any compulsion from their parents. The military life was generally preferred, as the most certain path to preferment and honour; but before it was irrevocably embraced, the children of nobility passed another trial, which merits attention. They were sent to the army to experience the hardships of a campaign, before they enrolled themselves in the military list, and undertook a profession which they might find disagreeable in practice, however pleasing f it might appear to the imagination. Here they were obliged to carry loads of baggage like the meanest soldiers, to inure them to fatigue, mortify their vanity, and accustom them to subordination and obedience; the most essential part of discipline, and the most difficult to be acquired by a proud ambitious spirit. They were obliged to give proofs of their perseverance, constancy, and valour: none was admitted who changed countenance on sight of the enemy; and it was observable, that these probations proved of the utmost service in battle, all being emulous to signalize themselves, and many plunging headlong into danger, from a persuasion, that some degree of temerity was inseparable from juvenile valour. With these institutions it is scarce conceivable how the Mexican empire should have so easily been overthrown; but there was a fatality that seemed to hasten the downfall and ruin of this most powerful and polished nation of all America.

Containing the history of the incas, and the religion, government, customs, and manners, of the ancient Peruvians.

Account of the ancient Peruvians.

THE origin of nations is so involved in obscurity, that little can be related with certainty, respecting the earlier periods, and remoter ages, of the most civilized people, that has any pretensions to antiquity. What fables are intermixed with the histories of Rome and Athens! Even the origin of modern nations, though posterior to the use of letters, hath its difficulties, and every day furnishes matter of debate among antiquaries: how, therefore, can we expect to find truth unmixed with falshood and absurdity, in the accounts given by the barbarous natives of the origin of those kingdoms and empires, whose subversion afforded the first inlet to the enlightening beams of science, and the bright dawn diffused over every object, by the use of those characters invented happily to carry our ideas to posterity, with the same precision they occurred to our own minds? Accordingly we find, that nothing can be more improbable, superstitious, and ridiculous, than the account given of the Peruvians, before they were reduced by their incas to a regular form of government, unless we except the means by which this extraordinary change, and revolution of manners, was effected. The genealogy of the sovereigns favours strongly of that adulation ever paid to the rulers of the world, who are often inferior to the brute creation; while they are regarded by their indiscriminating subjects as something above human. Garcilasso de la Vega, the most authentic historian of Peru, himself descended, by the mother, from the royal line, lavishes his praises on the incas, as the civilizers and humanizers of a barbarous people, who wandered about like the beasts of the fields, without laws, government, or the least idea of virtue or rational religion. Perhaps he intended to compliment the regal dignity at the expence of human nature; certain it is, that the horrible picture he has drawn of the ancient Peruvians, before the foundation of their monarchy, is the highest panegyric on the conduct of the incas. If we may credit this writer, the ancestors of the Peruvians were savages, distinguished from the brute creation only by speech, and the human form; they were fierce, ignorant, and cruel, almost beyond belief. We shall begin with their religion, if that term may be applied to such abominable superstitious institutions, every way suitable to their corrupt manners, and grovelling notions.

Religion.

THE ancient Peruvians, like the negroes on the coast of Africa, had a multiplicity of gods; almost every object that presented itself was raised into a deity. Nations, provinces, tribes, families; and individuals, had their peculiar gods; the Peruvians not being able to comprehend how the same deity should be able to attend to the various actions of different persons. Herbs, flowers, trees, shrubs, caves, rivers, and all kinds of animals, were worshipped by this savage people, who sacrificed to those material gods not only their enemies, but their own children. Mountains were adored for their height, trees for their shade, tigers for their ferocity, other animals for other qualities, and many for their power of doing mischief. Garcilasso confirms the account of Blas Valera, who relates, that the inhabitants of the mountains of the Andes were man-eaters, and sacrificed their fellow creatures and even their children to serpents, whom they deified. Prisoners taken in war were immediately quartered and divided for the benefit of the captors, or sold in the shambles. Should any person of distinction happen to have fallen into the hands of this savage tribe, they stripped him of his garments, tied him to a stake, cut him in pieces with knives and sharp stones, pared off all the fleshy muscular parts, and sprinkling the bye-standers with the blood, eat up the flesh with the utmost greediness, before the eyes of the unhappy victim, regarding his excruciating anguish as the most delicious sauce. The women wet their nipples with the blood, that their infant children might partake of the shocking sacrifice. All this was performed by way of religious offering; and when the wretched victim expired in agonies, the remainder of his flesh and bowels were devoured with a more solemn and silent reverence. "Such," says Garcilasso, "was the manner of these brutes, because the government of the incas was not received into their country." Nor need we indeed be astonished at the profound veneration with which their race of princes was regarded, if the people ascribed to them the changes wrought on their manners.

Manners.

THE government of the antient Peruvians was equally barbarous with their religion. There was no regular system of policy; a few families lived together in caves, rocks, and forests, and roamed for their prey over the country like wild beasts. Neither the arts of building, sowing, planting, or cloathing themselves, were known to these barbarians.

Nature

a Nature produced sufficient for their wants, in the spontaneous roots, fruits, and herbs, of the earth; and the only luxury known, was that of feeding upon the flesh of their fellow-creatures. Sometimes a ruler started up among the Peruvians, and then they were reduced for a while to a kind of societies. Whoever had courage or policy enough to acquire a superiority, might easily tyrannize over the whole, and treat them as slaves. When this kind of despotism was established, the situation of the Peruvians became still more wretched; no change was wrought in their manners, and they lost their liberty. Their daughters and wives became the property of the tyrant; even their lives were sacrificed to his caprice, and their skins employed in covering drums, to regale the ears of this monster of cruelty. In other parts they lived without lords, passing their days like so many sheep in all simplicity; not that virtue moderated their nature, but that stupidity rendered them equally insensible to good and evil. Even their barbarity was the result of their insensibility. It was no way shocking to them to dispose of the flesh of their prisoners in the shambles, and fatten children, in order to be served up as delicacies to table. Lust unrestrained by laws, customs, or natural decency, was a ruling passion among the Peruvians, who propagated like beasts without discrimination, and gratified their appetites with the first woman that offered. Where there was no regular society, there could scarce be any idea of those refined passions of love and friendship, which are the result of communication and mutual converse. No regard was paid to kindred, or affinity of blood, in the gratification of the senses; mothers, daughters, and sisters, were used without distinction. In some countries a kind of nuptial rite was observed; but it was no less depraved than the vicious impulse of nature. Those women who were the most lascivious and incontinent, were the most esteemed. It was the most notorious prostitution of virginity, and most dissolute life in the maiden state, that best recommended to a husband. Certain tribes were charged with preserving inviolate the chastity of their female children to a marriageable age, when they were exposed in publick, and the proofs of their virginity shewn to the whole world; others are taxed with the beastly sin of sodomy; and it is affirmed, that sorcery, witchcraft, and the arts of poisoning, arrived at great perfection in several of the provinces of this empire. These, however, are the tales of tradition, blazon'd out by the royal historian in the strongest colours, only to heighten the compliment intended the incas, by demonstrating the happy effects of their government, and the surprising changes wrought on the manners of the most savage people on earth, by dint of prudence and policy. These effects being supposed to exceed human means, the following fable was invented, to account for the manner in which the Peruvians were civilized, and give lustre to the pedigree of the royal line. It is confidently related by Garcilasso as a tradition universally believed in his family; and we shall beg leave to transcribe it from his commentaries, rather to shew the genius of the nation, than to gain the belief of the reader.

GARCILASSO having one day questioned the inca, his uncle, concerning the origin of the nation, and the rise of the incas, was answered in these words. "Cousin, I most willingly comply with your request; for it is of consequence for you to know these things, and impress them deeply in your heart. You must therefore understand, that all this region and country was formerly one intire forest and desert, and the people a kind of brutes, devoid of religion and government, destitute of all the arts necessary to society; and ignorant of sowing, reaping, building, spinning, or weaving. They dwelt in pairs in caves in the rocks and mountains, fed on roots, herbs, grass, or human flesh. All their cloathing consisted of leaves, or the bark of trees, and the skins of beasts. In a word, they were altogether savage; they had no property in women, or single enjoyment of the sex, but used their females in common like the brutes, and gratified their lust on the first object that occurred.

"THIS was the situation of our ancestors, when our father the Sun, taking pity on their wretchedness, sent a son and daughter of his own from heaven to earth to instruct our people in the knowledge of his divinity, that so they might adore and worship him, giving them laws and precepts to regulate their lives like men endowed with reason. They were empowered to live in houses and society; they were taught to sow the land, cultivate trees, rear plants, feed flocks, and enjoy them like civilized persons, who made a proper use of their rational faculties. With these instructions our first parent, the Sun, placed his two children in the lake Titicaca (about eight leagues from the capital city of Cuzco), giving them full liberty to travel to whatever part of the country they chose, with this restriction only, that when they stopped for a night to sleep and refresh themselves, they should strike a gold wedge which he gave them into the earth. This wedge was about half a yard in length, and above an inch thick; and if it sunk with one stroke into the ground, there they were ordered to take up their future residence, and form a court, to which all the people should resort. They were further directed to govern themselves with reason, justice, piety, clemency, and lenity. After they had reduced them to obedience, and subjected them to laws, they were enjoined to perform all the offices of tender parents to children they love, and to imitate the example set them by their parent the Sun, who doth good to all the world, furnisheth light and heat, maketh the seeds to vegetate, the trees to be prolific, and the flocks to increafe; watereth the lands with dewes from heaven, and daily performs a circuit in which he visits every corner of the earth, to discover the necessities and wants of all things, and apply the proper remedies. "Thus, after my example, said the great author of their being, I would have my children employ all their care in cherishing virtue, and rooting out bad habits from the human breast: from henceforth I constitute and ordain you lords and sovereigns over this people, that they may be reclaimed to reason by your instructions, and maintained in regular society by your government." "Thus our father the Sun, proceeded the inca, having declared his pleasure to these his two children, dispatched them to execute their important commission; and they, beginning their journey from Titicaca northward, tried to strike the wedge in the ground at every place they reposed themselves, but it refused to enter. At length, after various fruitless efforts, they arrived at a poor place about seven or eight leagues southward from the city (Cuzco), which to this day is called Pacavet Tampu, or the Shining Dormitory. This is one of those colonies which this prince planted, the inhabitants of which boast of the title bestowed on it by the first of our incas. From hence he and his queen descended to the valley of Cuzco, at that time a wild and barren desert (A), halting at Huanacauti, where again the wedge of gold being tried, was received by the earth with such facility, that it sunk at one stroke, and never more appeared." "Then, said the inca to his sister and wife in this valley, our father the Sun hath commanded that we should make our abode, and in so doing we shall perform his pleasure. It is necessary, therefore, that we should now separate and take different ways, in order to assemble the people in such a manner as we may be able to preach and propagate the doctrine among them which he recommends." Accordingly our first governors proceeded by different ways from the desert of Huanacauti to collect the people, which being the first place of their residence which they hallowed by their feet, that we know of, we have deservedly erected a temple wherein to adore and worship our father the Sun, and offer up thanksgivings for this benefit conferred on mankind. Our inca the prince pursued his way northward, while his consort and sister directed her steps to the south, declaring to all men whom they met in the wild thickets and uncultivated places, that their father the Sun had sent them to be the instructors and benefactors of those inhabitants, and to wean them from that rude and savage life to a method of living more agreeable to reason and human society. In pursuance of these commands they related to the people, they came to gather those who were scattered among those mountains and rude places into more convenient habitations, where they might live in society and friendship, upon such food as was allotted by nature for man. The people heard, beheld, and were astonished. They saw these children of the Sun cloathed in the habits in which their father had vested them; they observed their ears pierced to receive the complaints of the oppressed, and adorned with jewels as a mark of their superior dignity and birth; they greedily sucked in their words and promises of comfort, yielded to their persuasion, adored them as the offspring of a superior being, and resigned themselves to their tutelage and government. These wretches relating the wonder to each other, the fame of the prince and princess spread abroad; insomuch that multitudes of men and women flocked to them, submitting themselves to their obedience.

"GREAT numbers being collected in this manner, our first governors gave orders that provision should be made of such fruits as the earth produced for the sustenance of man; left, being scattered abroad in search of nourishment, the bands of society should be broken, the main body divided, and the members diminished. Others were employed, in the meantime, in building houses according to the models given them by the prince. This was the origin of our imperial city of Cuzco, which was then divided into two parts; the one called Hanan Cuzco, or the Upper, and the other Hurin Cuzco, or the Lower Cuzco. Those who assembled under the king inhabited the former, and those of the queen's train peopled the latter; a difference arising from no superiority assumed by the king, and intended only to distinguish his followers from those of his consort, and to remain an eternal monument of the rise and origin of society. This is the reason, added the inca, that in all our empire this diversity of lineage hath remained, being ever since distinguished by the appellations Hanan Aylla and Hurin Aylla, signifying the upper and lower lineage; and Hanan Sugu, and Hurin Sugu, the upper and lower tribes.

"WHEN the city was peopled in the manner above recited, our inca taught his people those labours that contribute to the conveniences of life, such as ploughing the land, sowing it with grains and seeds fit for the nourishment of man, and the instruments necessary to carry on husbandry with facility and advantage. He also taught his subjects to cut chana nels for those rivulets which now water the capital, and to defend their feet from stones and thorns by shoes, and their bodies from the inclemency of the weather and the vicissitudes of seasons by cloathing. On the other hand, the queen instructed the women in good housewifry, taught them all the domestic arts; to spin and weave cotton; to make garments for their husbands, their children, and themselves; with all the other little offices that could render life agreeable, and reconcile the men to the harder labours.

b "THE Indians being reduced to some form of civility, felicitated themselves on their change of condition; and with singular acknowledgments of the benefits received, travelled with joy through the rocks and woods to communicate the happy news to the other savages, who had not yet tasted the blessings showered down by the children of the Sun. They recounted all the favours bestowed on them, and confirmed their relation by showing their new habits and cloathing, and describing their diet, houses, and employment. The curiosity of the savages to behold these wonders was roused: they resolved to have ocular demonstration of all that was repeated, ranged themselves among the rest to learn and to obey; and one in this manner inviting another, the people increased, in seven or eight years, in so extraordinary a manner, that the inca was enabled to raise a considerable army, and make conquests where influence and persuasion proved insufficient to draw men from their barbarous way of living. He taught them how to make bows and arrows, and instructed them in the use of these weapons; so that they soon became a formidable power, and obliged all the surrounding states to receive those legal restraints, which serve to promote the happiness of mankind.

c "THAT I may not be tedious, said the inca, in relating the transactions of our ancestors, and the achievements of our first inca, you must know that he reduced all to the eastward as far as the river Paucartainpee, eighty leagues westward, quite to the great river called Apurimac, and southward, for nine leagues, as far as Quequesona. To the several districts contained within these limits, he sent colonies, to some places a hundred families, to other lesser numbers, according to circumstances. These were the beginnings of this noble city, and of this vast empire, which your father and his countrymen (meaning the Spaniards) have conquered from us, or rather of which we are despoiled and defrauded. These were our first incas and kings in the early ages of the world, from whom the succeeding princes and d We ourselves are descended; but how many years it may be since the Sun our father sent his offspring among us upon earth, I am not able to ascertain precisely; but I imagine it may be about four hundred years. This inca was called Manco Capac, and his queen was named Caya Mama, of Huaco, both being children and brethren of the sun and moon; and now, having satisfied at large the request you made of me, I abstain from tears, that I may not fill you with sadness; although my eyes, refraining from flowing, occasion drops of blood to fall from my heart on account of the inward grief I feel for the calamities of our empire and the misfortunes of our incas (B)." a GARCILASSO, lib. i. c. 7, 8, 9.

(B) The following story is related by Herrera, as another method by which the Indians account for the origin of their monarchy. It is still more absurd and ridiculous than the former, and is besides intirely omitted by the author of the royal commentaries. At Pacavac Tampu, which Garcilasso translates Shining dormitory, and our author The house of veneration, there appeared three men and three women. The names of the former were Ayarache, Aranca, and Airamanca, and of the latter, Mamacola, Mamacona, and Mamaragna, all of them cloathed in long mantles, and short tunics, so beautiful and elegantly wrought, that they were called tocabo, or royal. They had a golden sling of peculiar virtues, produced great abundance of wrought plate, assumed the government of the country, built Pacavac Tampu. Ayarache having got the sling into his possession, overturned mountains, and gained such a superiority, that his brothers, jealous of his power, laid a stratagem to destroy him. They persuaded him to enter a cave for a precious vessel, which they had forgot, and to pray to their father the Sun, to assist them in the reduction of that country, and bending the minds of the savage people to the regulations of social institution. The unsuspecting Ayarache entered the dark recess, and no sooner disappeared, than his brothers blocked up the mouth of the cave with stones, to prevent his return; immediately upon which a dreadful earthquake was felt, which overturned mountains, and entombed hills, woods, and rocks, in the bowels of the earth. Ayarache was seen flying through the air with beautifully painted wings, and a voice was heard, admonishing the two brothers not to be afraid, for Ayarache was going to found the empire of the incas. Ayarache then discovered himself to his brothers, and entered into farther conversation with them. He desired them to build a temple where Cuzco now stands, in which the Sun should be worshipped: he predicted that it would grow into a great city: he promised to watch over its safety and growth on a neighbouring hill, in his present form, which he desired might be held in adoration by his brothers, and their posterity; and he required, that as an emblem of their sovereignty, they would have their ears pierced as his were, and had no sooner pronounced the injunction, than they perceived his ears adorned with pendants of great beauty and richness. This was a return for their perfidy, which the two brothers did not expect. Full of gratitude and admiration, they promised to fulfil with punctuality every particular that was enjoined. They went to the hill, now call Guonanere, there raised altars to Ayarache, were favoured with another visit from him, and told to bind their temples with that garland, which the incas ever after wore as a mark of regal dignity. Reasons are given in this absurd fable, why Airamanca was chosen inca in preference to his brother Aranca, for he was vested by Ayarache with the imperial mantle. The ceremony of coronation was performed by the Orejones, a species of magicians, who were suffered to inhabit the country; and for this reason they were rendered capable of succeeding to the

SUCH was the fabulous relation of the origin of the empire and the establishment of monarchy among the Peruvians, which was firmly credited by all the natives of the country. If we might be permitted to interpret this account in the most natural and probable meaning, we should imagine that the first inca, Manco Capac, had formed this tale the more easily to induce the credulous multitude to embrace his doctrines, by pretending they were of divine origin. It could not be long, indeed, before they must have gained reputation even without this pretext, so admirably were they calculated to civilize, polish, and refine the mind, and to promote social converse and felicity.

WHEN Manco Capac had founded Cuzco, and reconciled his savage subjects to society, he began with planting colonies, as we find by the above narrative of the inca. To the eastward he established thirteen villages, filled with the tribe called Roques. To the westward he planted thirty villages within the space of eight leagues, which flourished so amazingly, that in a few years the whole country, as far as the royal road of Cantifuya, was thickly peopled; and from these first inhabitants were formed three great nations, namely, Masca, Chilgui, and Paperi, of considerable repute in the Peruvian annals. This prince likewise planted the valley of Sacsalumona, and twenty leagues round, establishing such wholesome regulations that the human species multiplied and increased with the astonishing rapidity of plants, cherished and raised by the parental hands of the skilful husbandman. To every new colony were communicated new instructions, fitted to their peculiar circumstances. The arts of plowing and sowing, of planting and pruning, of forming aqueducts and conservatories of water, of building, cloathing, and every other particular necessary to the commodious sustenance of life, were taught to all; but the laws of civil œconomy, for the support of friendship, brotherhood, and the dictates of nature and reason, were diversified. It was laid down as a general maxim, that all unruly passions should be subdued, all animosity one with another be forgot, and that they should distribute impartially the same justice to others which they required for themselves. Above all, the sage inca was careful to inculcate precepts of chastity and delicacy with respect to the sex, in which the Indians were hitherto peculiarly gross and brutal. He ordained that adultery should be capital, as well as murder, rapine, and robbery. For this purpose, it was necessary that marriage should be instituted, and every man enjoined to take only one wife. This was laying equal restraints upon both sexes, which the inca thought would be a means to induce the women to bear the restriction without repining. To prevent confusion in the lineage, it was besides recommended, that the people should confine themselves in their marriages to certain tribes, which, in our opinion, was the most impolitic ordonnance of this legislator, as it laid the foundation for separate interests, and divided the whole body of the people into casts and clans, each of whom afterwards struggled for independency. At twenty the men were supposed by the law to be marriageable, and capable not only of propagating the species, but of managing their families with prudence, and supporting the necessary labour; the women were allowed to marry earlier, for reasons deduced from the nature of their constitutions, and the station allotted them in civil society. Over each of these tribes or colonies he appointed a chief or curaca, who governed the people as the inca's lieutenants, being responsible to him for their conduct. These persons were chosen for their merit solely, without regard to any other distinction; for when any of the people were observed to be more religiously scrupulous in their devotion to the gods, more regardful of justice, more obliging to their equals, more obedient to their superiors, and affable to all, they were promoted to governments, to instruct the more ignorant Indians. Until the fruits of their industry could be reaped, the people were supplied with provision out of large magazines, formed by the prudence of Manco Capac, who omitted nothing that became a great legislator.

SENSIBLE that just notions of religion contributed powerfully to refine the manners, he bestowed great pains on this article, and diligently prescribed the rites and ceremonies of the Peruvian idolatry. A stately temple to the sun was erected, and beautified with all the ornaments that could excite awe and veneration in the human soul towards the object of worship. Manco Capac taught his subjects to behold this luminary as the fountain of light, the cause of vegetation, and the author of all those blessings reaped by the husbandman; and natural reasons demonstrated, that it was incumbent on them to acknowledge these benefits by a due portion of gratitude. A cloister for a certain number of select virgins was also built and dedicated to the sun, into which none were to be admitted but young ladies of the royal family.

the regal dignity. Crowds of people flocked from all quarters to behold this spectacle, bringing presents of gold to immense value, out of which was formed the great chain of Cuzco, weighing, according to report, above four hundred thousand weight. The natives, says Herrera, added, that after this ceremony Ayara-che and Aranca were converted into stones, resembling the human figure, and that Airamanca, with the women, went to lay the foundation of Cuzco, taking the name of Manco Capac, signifying rich lord, or king. (1)

a NOTWITHSTANDING these ordonnances were received with gratitude by the people, and obeyed with reverence, ye Manco Capac thought it necessary to impress the minds of his subjects with the most profound respect for the regal dignity, by annexing certain titles and ornaments denied to other degrees. For this purpose, he ordered that, after his example, all the males of his family should have their heads shaved, wearing only one lock of hair; to which they submitted, although the operation was performed with great pain and difficulty, the Indians having no better instruments than sharp flints to cut the hair. Upon this, de la Vega observes, "That had the Spaniards introduced no other arts among the natives than the use of scissars, looking-glasses, and combs, they had deserved all the gold and silver their country produced." Another mark of distinction peculiar to the royal family, was to have b their ears pierced, which operation was performed with a thorn, the orifice being afterwards stretched to such a degree, as to admit the frame of a small pulley, to which the large pendants were suspended. In process of time the inca, willing to enlarge the privileges of the people, suffered them to enjoy this extraordinary instance of his favour in common with the royal family. The last distinction by which Manco Capac proposed to secure a degree of veneration to the royal blood, and particularly to the inca, consisted in his wearing a wreath of various colours, wrapped four or five times round his head in the manner of a turban. This royal fillet was called Llauta, and for some times the three distinctions were rigidly observed, although they afterwards were allowed to the people with a few discriminating circumstances. For instance, they were permitted to wear the Llauta; but it was always to be c black: their ears were pierced, but neither the orifice nor the pendants were so large as those of the blood royal. At last the people came to be indulged so far, that they shaved their crowns, but wore a larger lock of hair than their princes. One would imagine the people would have no great solicitude about privileges so painful and troublesome; yet certain it is, the multitude will submit, and even court the most absurd and irksome marks of honour, or whatever tends to raise them upon a level with their superiors, or elevate them above their equals.

To discriminate the different tribes and nations, and keep up the necessary subordination and regulation of society, the inca appropriated certain marks to each, by which they were immediately known from any other. The nation called Mayca were ordered to wear a straw d wreath of the thickness of the finger. The tribe called Roques was distinguished by a lock of white wool suspended: other tribes had ear-rings of the common reed; some wore pendants of a different work and structure; a few had pendants of reed twisted round the ear; and all had their particular marks, by which the tribe to which they belonged was immediately known. Nor were these distinctions founded upon whim and caprice, but upon reason and a strict regard to the order of society, as it enabled the magistrates to trace the author of any crime more easily, and oblige the tribe, to which the culprit belonged, to punish the breach of law, and redress the injured.

SUCH were the institutions established by Manco Capac, the legislator and civilizer of those rude savages, and received with thankfulness and applause by the grateful Peruvians. Trans- e ported with the plenty they enjoyed, they ascribed every thing to the bounty of the inca, who had transformed them from beasts to men; instructed them in the arts conducive to the happiness of human life: taught them their natural laws, which promoted morality, and proved the cement of society, and infused into their minds that knowledge and veneration for the sun, the fountain of light and heat, and the dispenser of every good, by his instrument the inca, whom they considered as a second cause, acting immediately under the direction of the first great author. After a long and happy reign of between thirty and forty years, Manco Capac, finding nature declining, and the torch of life almost extinguished, assembled his family, which was very numerous, and his chief subjects at the city of Cuzco, and in a long and studied harangue, which he called his last will and testament, recommended to his f son and heir, a true love and affection to his subjects; and to the people, loyalty, zeal, and obedience to their sovereign and the laws. This was one of the precepts which he alledged was particularly enjoined him by his father the Sun, whenever he was removed from his subjects. In private, he admonished his children to remember, in all their actions, that they were descended from the sun, and to do nothing unworthy of their divine origin, to adore this glorious luminary with the veneration becoming children, who owe every blessing to the author of their being, to obey his laws and precepts, that so their subjects, in imitation of their conduct, might the more readily be induced to worship the deity. He advised them to allure the Indians with acts of piety, lenity, and clemency, as the surest bond of their g subjects, were neither happy nor really respectable. He finally told them, that as he was now about to take his flight to heaven, to repose himself in the arms of his father the Sun, he hoped they would live in peace and unity together; and that he beholding their conduct from the mansions above, would succour and comfort them in all extremities, if their behaviour merited his favour. With these words his spirit separated from his body : his afflicted subjects lamented his death, as if they beheld the end of all their enjoyment; they piously celebrated his funeral rites for several months, and took care that his body should be embalmed, that they might not lose sight of so dear and precious an object. Upon the whole, Manco Capac appears to have been a prince of so elevated a genius, that we are not surprized at the divine origin assigned to him by the Indians, nor astonished with the superstitious veneration paid to the memory and posterity of a monarch, who had loaded them with the most substantial favours, and reduced them from a state of wild and barbarous anarchy to a regular government, and knowledge of the duties of humanity.

Sinchi Roca,
second inca.

THE inca was succeeded in all his power and authority by the prince Sinchi Roca the eldest born by his queen and sister Coya Mama, agreeable to the rule of succession established by Manco Capac, and approved by his people. Sinchi Roca was no sooner possessed of the imperial wreath, than, in imitation of his father, he married his sister, the princess Mama Oello, or Mama Cora, in order to preserve the inheritance in the pure channel of royal blood, both on the paternal and maternal side. In all other degrees of the people, such a connection was prohibited, it being made penal by the laws to marry a relation within a certain degree of consanguinity; but the prince had an exclusive privilege from his great parent the Sun, as was wonderfully beloved by the Peruvians. Society being now firmly established, it was no difficult matter to improve upon the institutions which Manco Capac was obliged to adapt to those untutored barbarians, for whom he laid his plan of legislation. It was in his reign, if we may judge by the order observed in his history by de la Vaga, that the Peruvian empire was divided into four quarters, called Tavantinsuya, representing the four quarters of the heavens, east, west, north, and south, of which the city Cuzco was made the centre. It was also ordained that these greater divisions should be parcelled out into lesser districts, the inhabitants of which should be registered and classed in decurions or tithings; over each of which a superior or decurion was to preside. Thus ten families constituted the minutest division of the people; five of these, or fifty families, composed a higher class, over which was a proper magistrate, and two of the last class formed a third order, called an hundred. In this manner the number increased to the division of a thousand families, which was the greatest class; every decurion of the smallest division being obliged to provide that no family within his jurisdiction wanted the necessaries of life, or the means of industry. He was to distribute corn for sowing, wool for manufacturing, and materials for binding. The care of the sick and infirm was intrusted to him: he was to be the censor of their moral conduct, and to report to his superiors any crimes or misdemeanors of which they were guilty, leaving to them the punishment of greater offences, and claiming to themselves the power of reforming and correcting those of a more trivial nature. This inferior decurion had likewise the power of deciding all petty differences, so as to prevent litigation and troublesome processes. He was, in short, a kind of subordinate magistrate of the peace and order of society, who, in all cases of any moment, had recourse to the judgment of his superiors. The people too under his authority were allowed to appeal to a superior tribunal, where they suspected themselves aggrieved by his decision; or, in case the decurion was found culpable, he was either turned out, or otherways punished, according to the nature of the crime. Where differences arose between two provinces, these were decided by commissioners appointed by the inca himself, the matter being judged of too great moment to be referred to the decision of an individual, who would besides necessarily incur the displeasure of the nonsuited party (C).

OFFICERS of superior rank were subject to punishment, if they perverted the laws in the same manner as the private decurions. There was a censor-general to inspect the conduct of all public officers and ministers of state, who made his report to the inca himself; and condemned, without the hopes of obtaining a reprieve, all those who were guilty of oppression and rapine, to the most ignominious death. The conduct of parents and masters of families was strictly observed: it was deemed a point of the last importance to the state that children should be kept to modest and decent behaviour. Not only the parents, but the decurions, were made responsible for their miscarriages; and perhaps no modern nation, the Chinese excepted, ever took more pains to lay the necessary restraint on the passions of youth, to inculcate submission and obedience to parents and the laws, and humility and respect to their superiors. Hence it was that the Peruvians, even in the infancy of their government, were of a gentle and tractable temper, great preservers of order, and particularly averse to every kind of indecorum.

EVERY family being thus exactly registered in the first class, each lower class minutely

(C) It serves to illustrate the intention of the political division of the state, and the office of the decurion, that the Peruvian word chunca cunayci corresponds exactly with the Latin meaning of decurion, viz. decan and cura, or an officer, who extends his care to ten families. (1)

(1) La Vega, l. ii. c. 5.

- a ascertained in the second order, and that again exactly corresponding with the third division, it was easy for the decurions and publick officers to intimate to the ministry such alterations as arose in their jurisdictions by deaths, births, marriages, or removals; so that the incas were always perfectly acquainted with the state of their provinces, the numbers of their subjects, and the forces and revenues proper to be required of them upon all occasions. They were punctually informed of all calamities that befel them, whether from floods, fires, unkind seasons or pestilence, and the revenues were immediatly supplied by the government in proportion to their losses, either by a remission of taxes, or an actual loan. The Spanish writers themselves acknowledge, that the incas might be justly stiled, "Fathers and guardians of their people, and lovers of the poor;" favours which were so gratefully returned by the
- b Peruvians, that they obeyed the laws and their incas with such reverence, as rendered it common to see no more than a single execution in the space of a year within the limits of this vast empire, which extended above a thousand leagues, if we may credit the royal historian, La Vega.

In war the generals and captains assumed the same power over the soldiers allowed to the decurions in peace. Exact registers were kept of the births and burials in every corps, and the utmost care was taken to prevent the soldiers from despoiling or plundering those towns or provinces they conquered, which were immediately admitted to a participation of all the blessings of the Peruvian government, if the incas could place any dependence in their fidelity. Of these matters the inferior officers gave an account every month to their

c superiors, who transmitted their report to the court in knots of different colours, the knots being a kind of arithmetic used by the Peruvians, which we shall have occasion to describe more particularly, mentioning it in this place only to shew that it was introduced as early as the reign of Sinchi Roca. To these regulations and ordonnances we must add, that this inca passed a law forbidding crimes to be atoned by pecuniary mulcts; nothing was deemed a satisfactory expiation besides the extirpation of the evil; every other remedy affording the opulent a liberty to transgress. If a curaca, great lord, or governor, rebelled, and thereby forfeited his life, his estate nevertheless descended to his children; but with due admonition, that he should beware to avoid that rock upon which his father was shipwrecked; it being deemed highly iniquitous to punish the innocent children for the crimes of the d guilty parent. In the same manner, if a governor or officer was deposed from an employment hereditary in his family, the next heir succeeded; a rule which was likewise adopted in the army, with some restrictions, which left the inca sufficient room to distinguish and reward merit. Judges had no power to relax in the severity of the law any more than to encrease its rigour: and though it may appear barbarous, that in the class of trespasses against society, which come under the denomination of crimes, there should be no distinction, and all were deemed equally capital; yet, considering the benefit deduced to the public, the rule can neither be regarded as unjust nor irrational.

THE Spanish writers affirm, that the inca was superior to the laws, because there could be no scrutiny into his conduct; a mistake which Garcilasso corrects, by demonstrating,

e that the sovereign, as well as the subject, was bound down to observe certain fundamental maxims of the constitution; and that, in case of failure, he could be deposed and degraded, and even punished as an auca, or traitor. He ascribes their seldom incurring the penalty of the laws to the veneration in which they were held by the people, who looked upon them as the children of a god, and therefore incapable of doing wrong; and likewise to the want of those temptations which private persons had to offend. Their ambition and appetites were gratified to the utmost stretch of imagination; neither lust nor avarice could well seduce them into actions deemed criminal in subjects, because both passions were fully satiated. Crimes against the state were the only ones punishable in the incas, as they were supposed to have no opportunity of committing those of a private nature; and we shall see in f the course of the history, that a monarch was deposed for cowardice or negligence.

THE royal historian, having specified the constitutional alterations made in the reign of Sinchi Roca, proceeds then to give us a view of the other transactions of a prince, who derived his name from his extraordinary wisdom and valour, Sinchi, signifying wise, and Roca, valiant. No sooner were the funeral obsequies of the late inca solemnized with becoming magnificence, than the young prince had the regal fillet of various colours bound round his temples, which answered all the purposes of a coronation, and was performed with great pomp and solemnity. When he found himself established on the throne, he assembled the principal curacas and officers assigned him by his father, and declared his intention of enlarging the boundaries of the empire, and shewing himself worthy of the supreme dignity; to

g make an expedition in person, summon the several nations to the southward to acknowledge his sovereignty, adore the sun, and receive the laws and constitutions of his father Manco Capac. Sinchi Roca pretended, that his main design was to bring those people to a knowledge of the deity, and reduce them from their brutish lives, to a more civilized form and regular regular society ; but the real intention was the great desire he had to signalize his valour. a

 It was no difficult matter to gain the consent of his council : the curacas unanimously declared their approbation of the inca's proposal, and readiness to attend him wherever he thought proper. Accordingly he began his march at the head of a numerous army, employing heralds to proclaim before him the design of the expedition. There was little occasion for force ; the savage Indians observing the order, cloathing, and happiness of the inca's soldiers, easily believed what they were told, that he was a descendant from the sun, and of consequence made no resistance. In this manner he subdued, by dint of persuasion and example, a great variety of nations beyond Chanarra, and then returned to Cuzco to spend the remainder of his days in peace and tranquility. Every year added new provinces to his dominions, but without bloodshed. Sinchi Roca preferred a conquest over the mind to one over b the body, and he succeeded to admiration. It is probable, however, that the inca's formidable army added weight to his arguments, and induced the Indians to resign their liberties ; for it is seldom that we see men so little prejudiced to ancient customs, however absurd, as immediately to relinquish them on conviction, or to change their manner of living and religion for a better, without some degree of violence. After a long and happy reign, in which nothing memorable occurred, besides the laws he passed, and the provinces he reduced, Sinchi Roca, in imitation of his father, declared his intention to repose himself with his great parent the Sun ; and dying soon after, was succeeded by his legitimate son Lloque Yupanqui, then a prince of a promising genius. This monarch left a very numerous issue besides, by his wives and concubines, all of whom were deemed capable of succeeding to the throne, because c they were descended from the blood of the incas by the mothers, especially the children of Caziques, and royal princes ; but the greatest regard was shown to the right of primogeni-ture, and the issue of the favourite women, who were usually called queens, or empresses, by way of pre-eminence.

Lloque Yu-panqui 3d
 inca.

THE inca Lloque Yupanqui, so called from his being left-handed, and the sovereign of Peru, was less pacific than his predecessor (C). After taking an exact survey of his dominions, and examining minutely into his finances, he resolved to extend his frontier, agreeable to the established practice on the accession of a new sovereign. Instead of arguments and gentle treatment, by which means his father made such large acquisitions, Lloque had recourse to d arms, commencing immediate hostilities with all those nations who hesitated about submitting to his authority. They were first summoned, and treated with all the rigour of war, unless they yielded instant obedience ; whence it happened that Lloque was less beloved, but more dreaded, than his father, in all the provinces. At the head of a considerable army, he entered the country called Cana, and dispatched messengers to the natives, requiring them to quit their savage lives, form regular societies, and submit to the government established by the children of the Sun, and accept of this luminary for their deity. The affrighted people promised all that was demanded, but desired a little time to inform themselves of the particulars required ; and after they were instructed in the policy of the Peruvians, and the laws of the incas, they readily confessed the superiority of government over a savage life, and were accordingly received as partners in all the blessings of a civilized, regular community. e Leaving proper persons at Cana, to instruct the inhabitants in agriculture, and other arts, the inca proceeded to the conquest of another province, called Ayvirí, the inhabitants of which were fierce, warlike, and obstinate, insensible to precept and example, and therefore to be reduced to obedience only by dint of arms. They persisted in the resolution of perishing in defence of their liberty, and occasioned more trouble to the inca, than ever his predecessors had experienced in all their conquests. A battle was fought, with such fury and perseverance, that notwithstanding the field was covered with the slain, neither side would yield the victory, both retreating to places of security, where they fortified themselves against any sudden attack, and prepared to resume hostilities. From the account Garcilasso gives of this people, they appear to have had some idea of the art of war, although he describes them f as utter strangers to political subordination. They sallied out of their fortresses upon the enemy, and drew the inca's forces, against their inclination, into a variety of sharp skirmishes. Perceiving the reluctance the Peruvians expressed to quit their intrenchments, the barbarians ascribed their caution to pusillanimity, became bolder, fell upon the inca with all their forces, penetrated quite to the royal camp, and were repulsed with so much difficulty, that Lloque, seeing no chance of subduing them without a powerful army, sent immediately back for a strong reinforcement. Dreading the shame, as well as the consequences, of being baffled in his attempt, which might encourage other nations to throw off their al-

(C) We are informed by la Vega, that Yupanqui is that it was deemed sacrilege in any other to assume which were supposed to reside in the monarch ; and a legiance, he assembled all his forces, gave battle to the enemy, and after a very obstinate contest, in which great numbers were killed on both sides, obtained so complete a victory, that the barbarians never afterwards presumed to appear in a body, although they still endeavoured to avoid subjection by skulking in woods, caverns, and mountains. The inca, unwilling to extirpate them by the sword, endeavoured to subdue their obstinacy by famine. He cooped them up with his army in the deserts so closely for several months, that after they were quite exhausted and emaciated, the barbarians at length confessed his power, acknowledged his sovereignty, and promised fealty and obedience; by which means they appeased his wrath, and broke that storm of vengeance which threatened their contumacy. This conquest was followed by the reduction of Pucara, in which Lloque built several fortresses, and then returned b in triumph to Cuzco, leaving garrisons, governors, and instructors, in the conquered provinces.

On his return to his capital, the inca devoted his time to the pacific arts, and the good government of his empire. He framed laws, and made new regulations suitable to the occasions, introduced by the growth of luxury and refinement in living; but as his genius was turned to war and the field, he could not long remain inactive; and accordingly Lloque returned again to the frontiers of his conquests, to make farther progress in reducing the Indians, and extending his dominions. The barbarians of Ayvirí had alone presumed to dispute his commands; all the other nations paying the most profound obedience to whatever was required by the sacred offspring of the Sun. However, to give still more weight to his c authority, Lloque gave orders to have nine thousand men immediately raised, with which body he marched into the districts of Poneac Colla and Hatun Colla. Ambassadors were sent before him to require the voluntary submission of the people, and remind them of the misfortunes consequent on the contumacy of the Ayvirí. The inhabitants of Colla gave ear to the remonstrances of the ambassadors, assembled their chiefs, and concluded in a general assembly, that the plagues and mischiefs which had befallen other provinces, were punishments sent by heaven for the sin of resisting the children of the Almighty; therefore they unanimously declared themselves the subjects and vassals of the inca, worshippers of the Sun, and implicit observers of whatever laws he should think fit to prescribe. After this resolution they went out to meet the inca, and received him with songs, musick, and acclamations, which secured the royal favour, obtained a number of valuable grants, and d induced the inca to build a great number of temples in their country. This was a powerful accession to the Peruvian monarchy. The Collas consisted of various nations, who derived their origin from the great lake Titicaca, which they called their mother, and honoured with yearly sacrifices. Some deduced their pedigrees from a great fountain, and others from certain wild men who issued from caves, to which they likewise offered sacrifices. There were some who affirmed, that they originally sprung from a certain river, the fish of which they deemed sacred; but the general deity acknowledged by all was a white ram, which they worshipped with offerings of tallow, and sacrifices of lambs. In the room of these deities, the inca established the sun as the supreme god, in whose presence e all others vanished, and were annihilated. He also established several civil regulations, and particularly reformed the licentiousness of unmarried females, who acquired reputation by living in a continual state of prostitution before marriage, though they were obliged to strict fidelity to the nuptial bed.

HAVING laid these principles of government and religion, the inca returned, loaded with glory, to Cuzco, checking for the present his lust of conquest, and indulging a more rational policy, that of giving his new subjects leisure to taste the sweets and blessings of his government, and report their felicity to the neighbouring nations, the more easily to induce them to embrace the same advantages. He was received at Cuzco with all possible demonstrations of triumph and rejoicing, where having resided for some years in promoting the common good and benefit of his people, he once more suffered his warlike humour to recur upon him, and resolved to visit the confines of his empire, not only with a view to fresh conquests, but to afford his new subjects the satisfaction of beholding their monarch, and rectify the corruption and negligence of his ministers by his own presence. For this expedition, an army of ten thousand men was raised, at the head of which Lloque entered the province of Chucuytu, first summoning the people to submission by ambassadors. There was no occasion for violence; the people were sensible and moderate; they perceived the advantages that would result from their obedience, and willingly resigned themselves to the disposal of the monarch, under whose shadow and protection they flattered themselves with all possible happiness and security. They were so graciously received, and loaded g with so many favours, that the report of their felicity induced all the nations, as far as where the lake Titicaca discharges itself, to follow their example. All were graciously received, and taught the arts necessary to the convenience of life; after which the inca disbanded his army, except a few companies for the safety of his person, and the preservation of his royal dignity. He directed in person the establishment of laws, and administration of justice; which being regarded as the highest favour to the chief provinces, proved afterwards of the greatest benefit to the royal authority. He now learned by experience that persuasion, and the exercise of the beneficent virtues, was a more ready method to conquest, than the force of arms; and he accordingly strove to allure strangers to place themselves under his protection, by works of piety and humanity. His excellencies were proclaimed over the land; he was every where celebrated as the father of his people, and received as the true offspring of that benevolent luminary the Sun, which shines, without discrimination, upon all degrees of mankind, cherishes, animates, and invigorates, every part of nature. His fame extended quite to the Andes, and soon after all the nations, dispersed over that vast tract of country, acknowledged his authority without resistance; although, for the greater certainty, an army of ten thousand men was detached to those mountains, under the conduct of the inca's five brothers, who were strictly enjoined not to use violence, but in cases of extreme necessity. The report of the miracles wrought by the descendant of the Sun, in changing the very nature of men, gained implicit credit with this credulous simple people, and easily engaged them to own submission to so extraordinary a monarch. Three years were consumed in civilizing this people; for they were of so dull and stupid a nature, says Garcilasso^b, that they could not comprehend those easy rudiments of the arts laid before them, without great pains and labour. When they had made a competent progress, governors were appointed to administer justice in the inca's name, and soldiers left to protect and defend them against the insults of barbarous neighbours.

MEAN time Lloque was employed in visiting other provinces, where he encouraged the industry of the people, improved the arts, cultivated the lands, raised public edifices, made aqueducts, roads, and bridges, to facilitate the communication between the different provinces. Judging now that his dominions were sufficiently extensive to be governed with justice under the eye of the sovereign, he returned to Cuzco to pass the remainder of his life in peace and tranquility. Here he employed himself wholly in acts of justice and beneficence towards his subjects; and that the remoter provinces might not suffer by his residence at the capital, he sent Mayta Capac, his eldest son and heir, upon a progress over all his dominions, attended by wise and experienced men, not only to see justice duly administered, but to attach the affections of the people to the successor, and accustom him to public business and the government of a kingdom. Perceiving at last that old-age and disease impaired his faculties, that he was no longer qualified to reign and govern with his usual vigour, and that death was approaching with hasty strides, he assembled his children, brothers, relations, and chief dependants; and, by way of testamentary donation, recommended to them the strictest regard to those laws and ordinances which his ancestors had prescribed, the tenderest affection for his subjects, the most scrupulous observance of justice and equity, the encouragement of industry and the arts, and an especial care of the morals of the people, upon which depended the security of the monarch, and the happiness of the subjects. Lastly, he charged the Curacas, lieutenants, and governors of provinces, to patronize and relieve the poor, to be obedient and faithful to their sovereign, and to live in unity with each other, while he was gone to repose himself in the celestial mansions, and receive from his great Parent the rewards of his labour, to promote the good of his people, and execute his commission. Not long after Lloque Yupanqui died with the reputation of the greatest captain and statesman who had yet filled the Peruvian throne, admired equally for the qualities of his head and heart.

MAYTA CAPAC, the successor to his father's crown and dominions, having religiously performed the obsequies of the deceased monarch, set out upon a progress through his several provinces, in order to examine into the conduct of his ministers, correct all abuses of authority, and supersede those magistrates who, under the shade of royal favour, presumed to oppress the people. He had made this circuit in his father's life-time; but being then in his minority, and under the tuition of his parents and counsellors, he had no opportunity of displaying his natural virtues in so conspicuous a light as now when he possessed absolute power. He, besides, resolved to pursue all the maxims of the wisest of his forefathers; and as this custom of making an expedition in every new reign had always been attended with happy effects, the young inca determined to maintain a practice founded upon the soundest policy. In the course of his progress he exhibited such manifest testimonies of liberality, courage, and a generous disposition, to his Curacas and subjects of an inferior degree, that all were astonished at the maturity of his genius, his early proofs of wisdom and ability, and that extraordinary assemblage of virtues which shone with uncommon lustre in the youthful monarch. Having fully accomplished the design of this visitation, he entered upon an expedition calculated purely to enlarge his dominions, covering his ambition under the pretext of ^b GARCILASSO, lib. ii. c. 10.

- a reforming and civilizing barbarous nations. With this view he raised an army of 12,000 men, under the command of four experienced generals; and, putting himself at the head of this body, marched into the province of Callac, where the great lake Titicaca discharges itself. The inhabitants of this country were docile, simple, and ingenuous; the conquest was therefore the more desirable, and the inca set about it with the greater earnestness. Coming to the stream that issues from the extremity of the lake, he passed over his army on floats contrived with great dexterity, and then summoned the inhabitants to surrender, and yield obedience to his government. The terror inspired by his army and his own reputation easily induced the people to submit to orders which they were in no condition to dispute, and the inca eternized this event as the first conquest of his reign, by raising a kind of artificial mount, b so high, that were it not founded upon stones regularly laid, it might pass for a natural mountain covered with wood (E). After this the inca proceeded to the reduction of the province of Hatunpacassa, a district on the opposite side of the river, using no other means to bring the inhabitants into subjection than those of persuasion, doctrine, and instruction in the cultivation of the soil, and the arts of living in political society. Hence the inca marched to the country called Cacyaviri, in which the inhabitants lived in large, separate, independent villages, without any other government than the paternal right which every man claimed over his own family. Upon advice of his approach, the people assembled upon the top of a sacred hill, which they worshipped as a god, intending to dispute his entrance into the country. Here they fortified themselves with a turf wall, and laid in a great stock of provisions, men, women, and children, working with all possible diligence at a fortification c upon which they rested the security of their liberty. When the inca sent them a summons, declaring it was not his design to take away their lives or liberty, but to make them acquainted with arts useful to their convenience and happiness, they rejected his proposals with disdain; upon which Mayta Capac formed his army in four divisions, and laid siege to the hill, trying to subdue the barbarians by famine. The Callaons defended themselves vigorously, made frequent sallies, and observing that the inca declined engaging, they ascribed his conduct to fear, rushed without discretion or order upon his sword, and after perishing in great numbers, gave away that victory with rashness, which the inca could not obtain by valour. According to the tradition of the country, the gods fought visibly against the barbarians, d all the stones and weapons they threw recoiling upon themselves with double strength, which so terrified and astonished them that they immediately submitted to the pleasure of the conqueror, marching out in more order than they had fought, to implore his mercy and forgiveness. This procession was extremely solemn. First the children marched out of the intrenchments, next followed the mothers, then the old men, while the captains and soldiers led up the rear, having their hands bound, and halters round their necks, intimating how much they deserved death for having disputed the will of the offspring of the Sun. When they came into the inca's presence, all prostrated themselves at his feet, and licked the ground with the deepest humiliation and contrition, saluting him with the title of Son of Phoebus and Representative of the great God. The Curacas then approached the monarch, and, after a short apologetical speech, besought him, with great earnestness, if it was his pleasure death e should be the punishment of their crimes, he would accept of their lives as an atonement for the transgressions of the multitude; a circumstance which, although confirmed by Garcilasso appears inconsistent with the barbarity of the people, who lived free and independent, without any kind of civil polity, or notion of subordination. The generous inca was affected with their supplications: he ordered them to be instantly unbound, granted them not only their lives, but also what they prized much higher, their freedom; and assured them, in the most soothing expressions, that the sole object of his expedition was to teach and instruct them in divers arts conducive to their happiness. He then entered upon a kind of treaty with the Curacas, obliging them, in the name of the people, to pay him homage on the left f knee, by which they for ever acknowledged their subjection. To engage their affections the more strongly, they were suffered to touch his sacred person, an honour never before granted to any under the degree of royal blood. Having thus established certain laws and regulations suitable to the disposition of the people, and appointed officers and magistrates to administer justice and govern the province, he made his triumphal entry into Cuzco amidst the loud acclamations of his joyful people.

(E) There are, besides, in this province a variety of other stupendous monuments of labour and ingenuity, which we think it probable owe their origin to the inca Mayta Capac I. conqueror of the country, although the natives alledge they existed many ages before his birth. Among other works, is to be seen a wall built with stones laid upon each other, of such prodigious size as astonish all beholders, and convey a favourable opinion of the invention, industry, and contrivance of those barbarians. There are, besides, divers stupendous buildings, with porches of great magnificence hewn out of single stones. Some of these doors measured thirty-feet in height and fifteen in breadth. (1).

AFTER

AFTER reposing himself for some time, the inca resumed his warlike schemes, and sent an army under four celebrated commanders, towards the western parts, with injunctions to proceed towards the coast of the sea of Zur, and try, by all possible means of persuasion, to bring the inhabitants to acknowledge the sovereignty of Peru; and if they found them obstinate and refractory, to exert force, and subdue them by open war. With these instructions, and great supplies of provision, the generals passed the snowy mountains; and travelling, for the space of thirty leagues, over a desert country, arrived at length in the territories of the province of Chacuna, which they found well inhabited. Alarmed at the approach of an army, the natives built a fort, and retired into it with all their wives and children. The inca's generals summoned them to surrender, and on their refusal formed a regular blockade, with design to compel them by famine, and without the effusion of human blood, which produced the effect. Hunger obliged the fathers to detach their children in quest of provision; and they no sooner sallied out of the fort, than they were made prisoners, and so kindly treated, that now, conceiving a better opinion of the enemy, all the besieged submitted themselves to the inca, and willingly received the religion and laws which his generals thought fit to prescribe. When the inca was informed of the conquest and the fidelity of the country, he settled two colonies in it; erected a fortress, which he garrisoned strongly, for the defence of the conquest; abolished, by severe laws, the abominable practice of poisoning, in which the natives of the country were extremely expert. The punishment was, that the criminals should be burned alive, with all their effects; and so eagerly was this law received by the natives themselves, who severely felt the inconveniences of a dreadful custom, which they could not prevent, that they gave immediate information to the inca of those who were guilty; and, by three or four examples, put an entire stop to an evil of the most dreadful consequences. The qualities of the subtle poisons which they used, are reported to be very extraordinary, and so well known to the adepts in this way, that they could produce what degree of effect they pleased, either in the mind or body. Some they covered over with leprosy, others with boils, phlegmons, and ulcers, while others were made stupid, foolish, or frantic, just as the malice of the prescriber dictated. Such, at least, is the account of the royal historian, the credibility of which we shall submit to the judgment of our readers.

SEVERAL years, subsequent to this expedition, were spent in peace and profound tranquillity at home and abroad, the inca bending all his thoughts to civil policy, and the good, rather than the grandeur of his people: however, the spark of ambition, which had been smothered by prudence, again broke out without any visible cause, and Mayta Capac set on foot another expedition with a view to encrease his dominions. Possibly he might have found, upon trial, that his abilities were equal to the government of a larger empire, or he thought it necessary to keep up a military spirit by exercising his troops in arms. With a body of forces he directed his march to the country of Llaracassa, the inhabitants of which submitted the moment he appeared, and acknowledged the inca for their lord and sovereign. The reputation of his arms being now spread to every quarter of the southern continent of America, other nations followed the example of the Llaracassians, and particularly the inhabitants of the province called Sancovan, who acknowledged their subjection without attempting any resistance. After regulating the religion and government of these conquests, Mayta Capac passed into Pacassa, where he encountered no more opposition than in the other parts through which he had marched. "Every thing, says Garcilasso, fell down before him with such obedience and veneration, as was agreeable to one who derived his birth and descent from the Sun." But the scene was soon changed. On his way to Huyachu, the inca's passage over a little river was disputed by 14,000 barbarians of different nations, who joined by common consent to defend their privileges and natural liberty. Mayta Capac, unwilling to come to extremities, sent frequent messages to the enemy, offering them terms of peace and friendship, all which they haughtily rejected, because they were persuaded that fear had dictated this moderation. Still, however, the inca continued to make overtures, which so animated the courage of the barbarians, that they attacked his camp with great impetuosity, and penetrated almost to the royal standard before they could be repulsed. From the confusion with which this assault was made, Mayta Capac easily discovered his own superiority, and the facility with which he might overcome the enemy in battle; but he industriously declined bloodshed so long, that his soldiers began to murmur and entertain doubts of his courage. All cried out, that the insolence of the enemy was no longer tolerable, unless the inca intended to forfeit that reputation for valour which he had formerly acquired. The inca endeavoured to moderate the passions of his soldiers, by reminding them it had been the practice of his ancestors, and the command of his great parent the Sun, to save the lives and promote the happiness of the most savage nations; to have recourse to arms only in cases of extreme necessity; and to try the effects of patience and gentle usage, even though he should be insulted; neither to extirpate the

a ignorant inhabitants, under the pretext of rendering them happy. With these soothing speeches he for some time restrained the ardour of his troops, until the enemy one day pressed so hard, that he was persuaded by his captains of the necessity of giving battle. The army was accordingly drawn out; and both sides being eager to engage, the fight immediately raged with great impetuosity and fury. The enemy had liberty at stake, and the royal army the honour of their prince; both pressed on with the utmost intrepidity; the field flowed with blood; but the barbarians were at last defeated by their own courage, which was too fiery to obey the dictates of prudence, and the order required by discipline. They fell on in crowds with loud shouts, and rushed upon the enemies weapons without dread or reflection, thereby making the victory easy, when otherwise it would have been exceeding difficult and doubtful. Six thousand of the barbarians were slain, an equal number was wounded, and yet they quitted the field with a stern countenance, which threatened the inca with another assault, as soon as they had recovered the fatigue of this day's engagement; nor is it improbable they would have perished to a man before they would consent to yield the victory, had not the darkness of the night obliged them to retire. In the morning their ardour was abated; when they beheld the heaps of slain upon the field, and their own diminished numbers, their spirits began to droop, and they soon lost their former courage. The smart of the cold wounds, and the stiffness and rigidity consequent on the fatigue undergone the preceding day, disabled them from renewing the engagement, and they at last condescended to implore mercy, and throw themselves on the clemency of the inca. A few of the young men, indeed, proposed fighting their way through the Peruvian army, which had in the night taken possession of all the outlets from the field; but they were over-ruled by the more experienced generals, who concluded, that it would be rash and vain to try their strength, in their present situation, with an enemy to whom they were unequal when in full vigour and spirits. No sooner the resolution to submit was taken, than the vanquished barbarians marched in slow and solemn procession to the inca's camp, unarmed, unshod, and naked, the leaders having their hands bound, and the women attending with dreadful howlings, beating their breasts, and tearing their hair. They fell upon their knees before the inca, telling him, in the most piteous manner, that as their crime was past forgiveness, the only favour they expected was to suffer death from the swords of his soldiers, rather than to be exposed to ignominious punishments. Nothing could equal the joy they expressed on the inca's acquainting them, that he came not to destroy, but to relieve, comfort, and instruct the distressed and ignorant, to civilize their manners, and teach them the worship of the true God, and the arts of living with ease, convenience, and happiness: for which purpose he travelled from country to country, by order of the Sun his great parent; and took infinite labour and pains, without any other view than that of establishing a rational government among nations who now differed only from brutes in their erect form. He added, that notwithstanding their contumacy merited the severest chastisement, yet that he was willing to extend his clemency even to the most criminal among them, provided that henceforward they should reform their manners, and worship and obey the Sun, under whose laws and protection they might expect all the blessings of repose and prosperity. With this answer he directed that their leaders should be unbound, their wounded dressed, and all feasted with the best provision which the camp afforded; and then he dismissed them in the highest admiration of his generosity, justice, and mercy, fully determined to live in the utmost obedience and submission.

The news of the bloody defeat of the people of Colla (for so those barbarians were called) diffused itself among all the neighbouring nations, and was every-where interpreted as a just judgment inflicted by the Sun on the refractory Indians, who had refused the beneficial conditions offered, and despised the proposals of the inca. This apprehension became so strong and general, that divers nations, who had taken up arms to oppose the progress of Mayta Capac, and even formed their camp, now laid aside all thoughts of war, and resolved to put themselves under the protection of a prince equally renowned for his martial abilities and his piety and justice. They were accordingly received into favour, and vested with very considerable privileges; upon which they proclaimed, wherever they went, that the inca was the legitimate and undoubted offspring of the Sun. All the nations from Huachu to Col-lamac for the space of thirty leagues, and afterwards to the eastward quite to the snowy mountains of the Andes, submitted themselves, received colonies among them, and became faithful servants to the inca; who after having consumed three years in these expeditions, and greatly enlarged his frontier, returned triumphant to Cuzco, where he was joyfully received by his grateful and happy people.

g MAYTA CAPAC's genius was active and lively: he looked upon the time passed in his capital as consumed in indolence; the reforming savage nations, and encreasing the power and grandeur of his subjects, he regarded as the employment alone worthy of a monarch. Full of these notions, a year had scarcely elapsed since his return, when he made preparations

tions for a fresh expedition, the difficulty of which he hoped would eternize his fame, and equal his reputation with that of the most illustrious of his predecessors. He now projected the reduction of those vast tracts of country to the west-ward of his capital, which were filled with warlike savage nations; and as he expected considerable resistance, he set on foot a numerous army, with which he resolved to cross the river Apurimac, the most arduous enterprize which had yet been attempted. How to form a bridge over this rapid and broad stream sufficiently strong to support the weight of numerous forces, puzzled the wits of the most ingenious Indians who were consulted upon the occasion; but the inca found resources in his own genius. He ordered large ropes to be made of slender tough osiers; and fixing one end, ordered the other to be carried to the opposite side by Indians expert in swimming. To this he fixed large fagots of twisted osiers, and brush-wood to serve as a foundation to the bridge, upon which he laid beams, railed in at each side for the security of the passengers. In this manner it answered the intention of the inca; but as it came to be considered as a very extraordinary invention, it received improvements every year, and was regarded, in the days of Garcilasso, as one of the most ingenious monuments of antiquity, and of the untutored invention; of the old Peruvians. Over this bridge detachments were immediately sent to frustrate any designs the enemy might have to destroy it; but so far was this precaution from being necessary, that the Indians stood astonished at the stupendous fabric, which they did not hesitate to ascribe to some powerful deity. No other argument was necessary to secure their obedience: it would have been the height of impiety to oppose those whom the gods favoured in so distinguished a manner. Only the people called Villili ventured to make any defence, and they too were soon conquered; for shutting themselves up, without the necessary provisions, in a fortress, they were surrounded, and in a few day reduced to such extremities, that they surrendered at discretion. It was in the province of Contisuyu that the inca built a causeway over some marshy lands, to render the march of his troops more convenient, and assist the industry and commerce of the natives with each other. So eagerly bent was he upon this work, that, to encourage his soldiers, he laboured with his own hands, helping to raise and lay the great stones which formed the foundation. Garcilasso alledges, that in his day the Indians held this causeway in the greatest veneration, not only upon account of its antiquity and convenience, but because it was considered as built in part by the sacred hands of the inca himself. For this reason, it was for ages kept in the best repair, not a stone decaying or sinking from it, but was replaced by the care and industry of the surveyors appointed on purpose.

It was over this new dyke that the inca marched to the country of Ailca, where he encountered the natives in a difficult craggy pass: they imagined they should be able to defend themselves against all his forces; but the inca made his approaches so cautiously, that the enemy were dislodged, and forced to submit, without scarce any bloodshed. Hence he proceeded to the lake Paribwana Cocha, or the Sea of Penguins, the Indians giving the appellation of Sea to all great bodies of water; and from thence he went to the province of Arani as far as the valley of Araqueba, bringing all the different nations on the way under the dominion of the incas, and thereby greatly extending the boundaries of his empire; which particulars we mention to shew the gradual progress of this originally small state, to the pitch of grandeur and power in which the Spaniards beheld it on their first entering the country. He met with little obstruction in this rapid conquest, most of the barbarous nation delivering themselves up to his pleasure on the report of the miracles he had wrought and dangers he surmounted, and the divinity of his birth. He settled several colonies in the fruitful vale of Araqueba, before entirely unpeopled, established a regular form of government in all the different provinces, and taught the people by experience to consider the loss of liberty as the most happy incident that could befall them, since they only exchanged a barbarous freedom for a regular, well-conducted, and civilized state of society. Having appointed magistrates to preside over the execution of the laws, and enforce obedience to his orders, he returned to Cuzco amidst all the festivity and joy which a people, enamoured of their sovereign, could express. Immediately he rewarded all who had distinguished themselves, disbanded his army; and resigning all farther thoughts of military achievements, delivered himself up entirely to repose, and the peaceable enjoyment of the honour he had acquired by his activity and valour. Among the excellent civil institutions which he set on foot during this interval, were hospitals established for the support of the aged and infirm, which were afterwards enlarged by his successors, and endowed with many valuable privileges. This was the last act that is recorded of the inca Mayta Capac, who died in the thirtieth year of his reign full of honour and glory, acquired both in peace and war.

Capac Yu-
panqui, 5th
inca.

It was a custom religiously observed by the incas not to assume the reins of authority before all due honours had been paid to the memory of the deceased sovereign, and his body was interred with the utmost solemnity. Capac Gupanqui, the eldest son of Mayta Capac, by his queen Mama Caca, shewed the usual regard to this practice, and deferred binding his temples with a with the imperial wreath, until the last obsequies were paid to his father. Then he took upon him all the rights of sovereign authority, and entered upon his government, by making a progress round his dominions, inquiring into the conduct of the magistrates, and the administration of justice among his subjects. In this circuit he spent two years, ordering, on his return to Cuzco, that troops should be levied for the succeeding year, the new inca proposing, agreeable to that ancient maxim of state observed by his ancestors, to give proofs of his valour in the beginning of his reign, and to enlarge his hereditary dominions by the reduction of those countries in Centifuya, lying eastward from Cuzco. To facilitate his design, he ordered another bridge to be laid over the river Apurimac, upon the model of that made by his father, but more difficult in the execution, because the stream was broader. However, this bridge, though incomparably more b magnificent, was never held in the same estimation with the former; for this reason chiefly, that it wanted the novelty. Early in the season the inca passed this river at the head of 20,000 men, directing his march through the pleasant territory of Yanatucaca, which contained upwards of thirty different nations, all of whom came out to meet Capac Yupanqui, men and women, old and young, singing, dancing, and every other demonstrations of rejoicing. The principal people among them were called Piti, whose chiefs were so delighted with the favour shewn them by the inca, and certain presents they had given them, that they echoed his fame over all the neighbouring countries, and easily prevailed on the inhabitants to follow their example, and submit to the government of the divine offspring of the Sun. From this province he passed into Amayra, where no less than eighty nations were assembled c to oppose his design of establishing the dominion of the incas. They had fortified themselves in a kind of turf enclosure, in which they were blocked up so closely for a month by the royal army, that they surrendered at discretion, and received the inca for their sovereign. Some authors alledge, they stipulated with the inca as a condition of their obedience, his promising, on the word and faith of his divine origin, that he would conquer and subdue the neighbouring province of Uncafuyu, inhabited by a warlike people that lived by rapine and robbery, their implacable enemies.

CAPAC YUPANQUI, agreeable to the promise made to the conquered nations of Amayra, summoned the lords of Uncafuyu to appear before him; for that, being appointed sovereign over all those countries by his great ancestor the Sun, he claimed it as his prerogative to d judge and decide all differences among nations, bring them to the knowledge of the true god, and establish such modes of religious worship and government as he thought would prove most conducive to their happiness. To this message a haughty answer was returned; the barbarians assembled to deliberate upon the necessary measures, and unanimously agreed to acquaint the inca, that it was not their practice to pay the submissions he required, nor to receive laws from a prince of whom they knew nothing; that if he had business with them, he should find them in their own territories ready to receive him with arms in their hands. As to his boasting that he was descended from the Sun, it was a matter of no consequence at all to them, who did not hold the Sun in any particular reverence, having
e gods of their own, whose protection and goodness they had too often experienced to exchange them for any other. This they declared to be their final answer; and, if it proved displeasing, they desired the inca would resent it in the open field, like a brave and courageous soldier. When this answer was brought back, the inca held a council of his officers, in which the resolution was taken to surprise the enemy, and march into the heart of their country before they could have time to assemble, by which means they might be terrified into submission without bloodshed. Every thing succeeded to expectation; a detachment was made of eight thousand men, who marched with such celerity as entirely disconcerted the barbarians, astonished at finding an army in the midst of their country, when they doubted not but a month would elapse before the enemy could appear on the frontier. Incapable of resisting, they began to repent of the haughty answer made to the inca, and, after some formal deliberation, resolved to yield the same obedience as the neighbouring nations, and obtain an equal degree of royal clemency and favour, by the most inviolable fidelity and attachment. The Curacas prostrated themselves before the inca, expecting with dread the effects of his resentment; but he received them so graciously, that they soon laid aside their fears, and beheld him as their guardian angel. He told them, that, when he considered their barbarity and ignorance, he was not surprised at their refusal of a regular scheme of morals, religion, and politics; being well assured, that when they had once experienced the sweets of those arts which conduce to human happiness, they would bless the hour in which they were persuaded to embrace the Peruvian laws, manners, and form of social institution. To put an end to all disputes between them and their neighbours g about the boundaries of their several jurisdictions, the inca ordered the frontier to be marked out by large stones, which he erected at certain distances; and so impartially did he pass judgment, that all parties rested perfectly satisfied with his decision. The Curacas, with profound humility, kissed his hands, and requested him to settle the government at his

pleasure; and when he gave notice of his design to take up his residence for some weeks at Chiriqui, the nobility carried him in a chair of gold upon their shoulders in token of their servitude.

THIS was one of the most advantageous conquests hitherto made by the incas, as the country was not only rich in pasture and cattle, but in mines of the precious metal; yet, instead of satiating his ambition, it served only to stimulate him to farther enterprizes. Some little time being employed in the administration of government, he judged it impolitic to suffer his soldiers to relax in military discipline by too long repose, and therefore ordered preparations to be made for another expedition early in the season of the ensuing year. The inca did not lead this enterprize, intended against the Quechoas, in person; but appointed his brother captain-general, and four princes of the blood, well experienced in the art of war, to assist his councils. An army of 25,000 men immediately took the field, entered the province of Catapompa, and struck such terror, that the inhabitants resolved, with one voice, to receive the inca for their sovereign. Assembling in great numbers, they presented themselves before the general, and one of the orators addressed him to the following purpose: "General, we heartily welcome thee, because thou art to give us a new being, and the honour of being servants to that great prince who derives his pedigree from the Sun. We adore thee as his brother and the commander of his armies, giving thee to understand, that your arrival only hath prevented us from throwing ourselves at the feet of our sovereign lord at Cuzco, to beseech him to receive us under his mighty protection. The fame of the marvellous actions he hath performed in peace and war, hath affected us with such wonder and love towards him, that every day appears an age to us, until we enjoy the privilege of becoming his subjects. Hereby we promise ourselves the happiness of being delivered from the tyranny and cruelty of our neighbours of Chanca and Hancobualla, who have grievously oppressed us since the days of our forefathers; so if you will receive us under the shadow of the inca's authority, our happiness will be complete, and our everlasting prayers shall attend all your desires, that they may be accomplished by thy great parent the Sun, whom henceforward we worship with the most profound devotion." To enforce their request, they made a valuable present in gold, to be offered to their sovereign the inca, as the voluntary tribute of dutiful subjects; were received into favour, and afterwards governed by laws similar to those established in the other provinces.

THE affairs of this country being properly settled, the general, Aqui Titu, led his army across the vast deserts of Huallaripa, famed for the great quantity of gold it produces; and having made the necessary observations, proceeded on his march along the plains bordering on the ocean to the fertile valley of Hacari, reducing all the inhabitants, without fighting a single stroke, to the obedience of the inca. He found the natives immersed in barbarity, and greatly addicted to the most libidinous gratification of unnatural lust; an abominable practice, which he abolished by the most rigorous laws and exemplary punishments. It was ordained, that whoever should be convicted of sodomy should be burnt alive, with all his effects, and those who were even suspected of the crime, were subjected to very severe usage, whipped with thongs, and sometimes put to death, if the suspicion appeared well founded, although not proved.

THE general having thus executed his commission, returned triumphant to Cuzco, and was received by the inca with the favour which his eminent services deserved. He was now appointed regent of the empire, the inca having resolved to make another expedition in person, and his four generals were given him as counsellors. All things being now in readiness, Capac Yupanqui departed from Cuzco, and marched as far as the lake Puria, which was the utmost boundary of his father's conquests. His army consisted of twenty thousand chosen troops, besides recruits picked up in his march, which greatly augmented the number. So formidable a power could not fail to inspire respect, and accordingly all the nations around, for the space of twenty leagues, sent their deputies to do homage to the inca, and acknowledge his sovereignty. Among others came messengers from two powerful lords of Collafuya, who had waged perpetual war against each other for many years. They contended for power and authority with the most implacable resentment; but the country being reduced to the most wretched condition by their animosity, it was mutually resolved to submit their differences to the inca, each of the parties beseeching to be admitted to his presence, and the honour of giving a minute relation of the injuries sustained from his adversary. Both protested, with the utmost solemnity, that they would strictly adhere to his determination, which they knew to be infallible, because he was the genuine offspring of that fountain of light, which pierces with so keen a ray into the darkest secrets of the human breast. Their request was admitted, and the curacas desired to attend the inca whenever it suited their convenience. They came accordingly at the same time, both throwing themselves upon their knees, and at once kissing his hands, that neither might seem to have the preference. Cari, whose territories bordered the nearest upon the inca's, had the fortune to speak first; he gave a tedious a tedious account of the differences that subsisted, and the source from whence they arose, confessing honestly, that the quarrel was inflamed by envy, emulation, and ambition; however, as there was some real cause for dispute about certain lands, he humbly hoped the inca would interpose, and by his just arbitration cut off all future occasion for wars, which had desolated the country, and reduced the people to wretchedness. When he had finished his discourse, the other curaca entered upon his address to the inca, and ingenuously acknowledged the truth of all that had been recited by his adversary; submitting with him the decision of their quarrel to the pleasure of his Peruvian majesty, who was highly delighted with these proofs of simplicity and frankness. The affair was submitted to his council, the lands in question were equally divided, the parties sworn to pay implicit obedience to this decision, b and for ever to lay aside their animosities, and become faithful affectionate subjects to the inca. This last article was inserted in the treaty in consequence of a conference between the two chiefs; who agreed, that the Peruvian government was preferable to their own; and that acknowledging a sovereign superior to both, would be the most effectual method of restraining them within the boundaries assigned by their oath, suppressing any future cause of animosity, and cementing them in the strongest and most durable friendship.

THE affairs of these two chief being adjusted in this manner, the inca commanded two of his principal officers to make a survey of the country, and to appoint such magistrates as they believed best qualified to govern his new subjects with moderation and equity, to instruct them in the laws and religion of Peru, teach them the mechanical arts, and promote a spirit c of industry and loyalty that might conduce equally to the glory of the monarch, and happiness of the people; after which he returned to Cuzco, and made his triumphal entry with unusual splendour and magnificence, justly esteeming that a more glorious acquisition to his people which was made by the reputation of his justice and humanity, than by the force and terror of his arms.

CAPAC YUPANQUI had not resided long at his capital when he perceived that his conquests were not yet complete, something, he imagined, being still wanting to the glory of his name, and the grandeur, convenience, and security of his empire. Experience had demonstrated the conveniency of the bridges thrown over the Apurimac, and now determined him to render a passage less difficult to the country of Collasuya, where he proposed to complete the conquests begun on his accession, by laying another bridge over the river near the place where the lake Titicaca discharges itself. Directions were issued accordingly, and a bridge more beautiful than any of the former was constructed in the short space of a few weeks. Over this he marched with a powerful army, attended by the prince his son, who was now initiated in the art of war, and taught the practical conduct of a general in the field, all his knowledge hitherto arising from precepts and private instruction. Upon entering the province of Chaycuta, the inca ordered the prince his son, with a detachment, to summon the inhabitants to submission. They were greatly divided in their sentiments concerning the answer which should be returned; some dreaded the power of the inca, and therefore thought they ought to comply with the purport of the summons. Some were of the same opinion, because they preferred the Peruvian government to their own, and wished to partake of the blessings which they saw enjoyed by other savage nations received into the protection of the inca. A third party, more bold and confident than any of the former, insisted upon their ability to defend themselves, and the shame of surrendering the slaves of a tyrant without shedding one drop of their blood in defence of those privileges transmitted to them by their ancestors, and the natural rights of mankind. In consequence of these divisions, a kind of ambiguous answer was returned, which partook of the several opinions of the parties; but upon the inca's denouncing vengeance unless they explicitly declared their obedience, they soon yielded to their fears, and unanimously agreed to grant him a free ingress into their country; upon condition, that, if his terms were not approved, they might be rejected, and the natives left to their freedom. Although the inca was in a capacity to give rule, yet to spare the effusion of blood, and impress a favourable opinion of his justice and moderation, he accepted the proposal, entered the province, and soon gave the inhabitants such convincing proofs of the excellency of his institutions and government, that without hesitation they swore fealty, and put themselves under his protection; celebrating this happy event with songs, music, and dancing, in honour of the inca.

AFTER settling the administration of the country, and instructing the ignorant barbarians in the rudiments of the several arts conducive to the happiness of their lives, the inca proceeded to Charcas, where fame already resounded. The different nations inhabiting this country sent their ambassadors to him, requesting they might be admitted to the privilege g of subjects of the imperial wreath, and instructed in those arts which procured such happiness to the Peruvians, and rendered them so much superior to the rest of mankind: however, as all were not unanimous in acknowledging the sovereignty of the inca, those who put themselves under his protection, and embraced his religion, implored him that he would not suffer them them to be exposed to the resentment of the rest, who would probably treat them as apostates from the manners of their ancestors. The inca granted all their demands without scruple; and, after spending two years in settling the country, returned to the imperial city of Cuzco, carrying in his retinue some of the principal inhabitants of Charcas, that were desirous of visiting their celebrated capital, of which such wonders were reported. Here he dismissed his troops, suffering them to return to their several homes, to enjoy, in peace and tranquility, the fruits of their labour.

CAPAC YUPANQUI now devoted himself entirely to the government of his people, leaving to the prince, Inca Roca, the care of extending the limits of the empire, and annexing new conquests. It was proposed to stretch the boundaries of the empire further on the side of Chincafuya, which, being a barren desolate country, was neglected by all the incas since Manca Capac; and for this purpose a formidable army was raised, with which the prince crossed the Apurimac on floats made of osiers. This expedition was attended with no remarkable incident; all the people submitted on sight of the army, and an addition of twenty thousand souls was made to the Peruvian subjects, without the loss of a single drop of blood. Scarce had the prince returned to Cuzco, when his venerable father sunk under old age, and yielded up the imperial sceptre, which he had wielded for many years with the reputation of a prudent, politic, and brave monarch.

Inca Roca,
sixth monarch.

WHEN the young prince Roca ascended the throne, he determined upon imitating the conduct of his sagacious sire, and acquiring a perfect knowledge of the extent and power of his dominions, the characters of the public officers, and of the administration of justice in all the provinces; with which view he made a progress over the whole empire, which took up the space of three years. During this circuit he made such prudent regulations, formed such salutary laws, and shewed such a discerning spirit, as impressed the people with the most sanguine expectations, that he would equal the greatest of his ancestors in wisdom, policy, and all the virtues of a sovereign. He penetrated quite to the mountains of Cordillera, in an expedition he made, at the head of a great army, in the third year of his reign, and reduced many powerful nations to his obedience. Among the most distinguished of these, were the people called Chomcas, who made some appearance of resistance, and deliberated, with great solemnity, whether they should accept the inca's proposals, or dispute his entrance into their province at the hazard of a battle. The inca, observing their hesitation, resolved to cut off all room for debate, marched into the midst of their country, entered upon hostilities, and struck such terror into the people, that they yielded immediately to all that was required, and used all their influence with several other adjacent nations to follow their example, as the only means of avoiding the inca's resentment, and partaking of the felicity which all his subjects enjoyed under his wise administration. These conquests were followed by the reduction of the provinces of Uramarca, Sulla, Utumfulla, and divers others, in which were contained above forty thousand families; whence we may judge of the importance to the state of this expedition.

AFTER the inca's return to Cuzco, he spent some years in the quiet possession and government of his kingdoms, employing his son, the prince Tabuarhuacac, in all foreign affairs, particularly in the conquest of Antisuya, a province to the eastward of Cuzco, beyond which none of his predecessors had attempted to penetrate. This prince derived his name from a superstitious prophecy uttered at his birth, that his life would be unfortunate, and disgraceful to the empire; to falsify which, his royal father bestowed the utmost pains on his education, and now sent him early into the field to be instructed in the art of war, before he should come to the government of a great kingdom. He ordered an army of fifteen thousand men to be raised, with which he detached this young prince over the high mountain of Canastucaya, the most difficult enterprize ever yet attempted by the Peruvians. By this he intended to inure him to fatigue, and render him accustomed to danger; and his orders were executed with so much punctuality, as left him no room for suspecting either the prince's judgment or courage, notwithstanding he was afterwards justly taxed with pusillanimity. By means of this last conquest, the empire was extended from north to south above two hundred leagues, and from east to west considerably above half that space; all which tract of country the politic inca laboured assiduously to cultivate, and adorn with palaces, gardens, baths, and other public structures, which not only kept his people in constant employment, and improved them in the arts, but added greatly to the pleasure, convenience, and grandeur of the state; and for the better accommodation of the people, he erected public granaries, storehouses, and magazines, on all the great roads, which he filled with provision, cloathing, utensils of labour, ammunition, and every necessary either for the merchant, the husbandman, the mechanic, or the soldier.

IN this manner he passed several years; and having compleated his projects concerning the domestic policy of his kingdom, he once more turned his views towards the enlargement of his dominions. The reduction of the provinces called Charcas was begun in the

- a lite reign, but never completed; a work reserved for the great inca Roca, which was to immortalize his fame. As the enterprize was deemed arduous, an army of thirty thousand select men was levied, and the emperor resolved to command in person, the government being left in the hands of the prince, assisted by several counsellors, that he might gain some acquaintance with the affairs of the cabinet, as well as of the field. Arriving, after a tedious march, on the frontiers of the province of Chuncari, he sent heralds to the different nations, requiring them to live under those laws which his father the Sun had ordained for their benefit; to worship him as the only God, to forsake their corrupt customs and manners, and to follow the light of nature, and the instructions which he should lay down to direct them in ways more agreeable to humanity, than their present manner of living. All the young men took fire at the boldness of this demand, and confident of their own strength and courage, were for giving battle to the enemy. “Who is this tyrant (said they) who would oblige us to renounce our natural gods and adore a stranger, a god unknown to us, and recommended only as he happens to be the parent of the usurper? What right has he to require that we should depart from our manners rendered venerable by their antiquity, and abolish the sacred customs handed down from our ancestors, only to receive new laws from him, which would pave the way to taxes, tributes, impositions, and services, with all the other train of vexations and grievances which afflict his oppressed vassals? These are conditions not to be endured by a free people, while they are able to defend their liberties, and, at the worst, are not unwilling to perish with their freedom.”
- c All the old men were, nevertheless, of a contrary opinion; they judged with more caution, and dreaded the power of the inca which they were sensible they could not withstand. It was their opinion, the proposals ought to be debated with impartiality. They had conversed for many years with the subjects of the inca, and could never learn that he had ever given cause for the severe reflections thrown out against his government, by the fiery and over-weening young persons who spoke before. They had always been told, that his yoke was easy, his administration equitable, and his laws salutary; that he conducted the state as the father of a family, and regarded his subjects as his children; that the lands upon which he seized, were not the possessions of the Indians, but waste fields, and desert countries, which he rendered flourishing and fertile by the force of culture; and that he required no other tribute than the fruits of those lands, manured, tilled, and sowed, at his own expence. As a proof that he did not subsist by oppression and robbery, they desired the young men to inform themselves how much the estates of the Indians had of late years been improved, and then to judge of the wisdom of the inca’s government, by the degree of wealth and felicity which his subjects enjoyed. Such indeed was his reputation for justice, that many neighbouring provinces, allured by the gentleness of his servitude, voluntarily put themselves under the protection of the inca. It was therefore more adviseable, that they should yield without force or constraint, before matters came to such an issue, that they would neither be able to defend their liberty, nor procure such terms of submission, as might now be readily granted. As the religion of the inca appeared to be one of their great objections, it ought to be well considered, they said, that the Sun more visibly deserved worship, on account of the light and heat it afforded, than any of those dumb and insensible idols which they formed with their own hands.

f WITH these, and some other arguments, the sages at length so far prevailed, that a resolution was taken to wait upon the inca, with presents of the fruits and best produce of the country, the young men carrying their arms in their hands, in token of their willingness to serve him in quality of soldiers, to assist in his conquests. They were most courteously received by inca Roca, presented with cloaths, and other valuable gifts, admitted to all the privileges of the most favoured of his subjects; five hundred of the young men were chosen by lot into his service, and the rest sent home for the defence of their country against the attacks of their savage neighbours. In a word, his behaviour was so gracious, affable, and engaging, that all cried out with joy and exultation, “How like art thou to a child of the sun! how worthy art thou of the title of king! how well thou meritest the appellation of protector of the poor, and redresser of the injured! We no sooner became thy subjects, than thou didst load us with thy favours and benefits. May the blessings of thy father the Sun shower down upon thee; and all the nations of the world obey, and fall down before thee; for thou art truly the Capac inca, who deserves riches, absolute power, and universal dominion.” Having annexed a space of a hundred leagues to his empire, the inca returned to Cuzco, and spent the rest of his life in peace, dying at a very advanced age, in the fiftieth year of his reign, after having established the reputation of the wisest, the most benevolent, and virtuous monarch, who had ever been honoured with the imperial wreath. His memory is held to this day in veneration, upon account of the many excellent laws he established, of which the following are the most remarkable. That the children of the common people should not be taught the liberal arts and sciences, which served only only to render them haughty, proud, and above labouring at the mechanic arts, so essential to the good of society : that the nobility should be diligently instructed in every branch of learning, in order to qualify them to discharge those functions and duties, which belonged to their rank and dignity; that thieves, murderers, adulterers, and incendiaries, should be hanged without mercy, immediately upon conviction : that sons should obey their fathers, and be considered as minors to the age of twenty-five years; after which time they should be employed in matters tending to the good of the state. Inca Roca was the first institutor of schools at Cuzco, in which the Amantas were appointed to instruct the princes of the blood and young nobility in the arts and science by daily discourses; for as yet the Peruvians were wholly unacquainted with the use of letters. They besides taught the worship of the true god, and explained the spirit of the laws, by demonstrating the reasons and principles on which they were founded; by this means accustoming their minds early to politics, and the art of government, which ought to constitute the principal knowledge of persons of their birth and quality. The Amantas also taught history, poetry, philosophy, astrology, and music, in all which they pretended to some skill, though it was of a very limited nature, as the Spaniards found on their arrival in the country, at a period when the sciences had made but a slender progress in Europe, and more especially in the dominions of his Catholick majesty. By oral instructions the youth were taught the military art, and the sciences, while they read in their knots the history and actions of past ages. Under the Amantas likewise, they improved themselves in eloquence, oeconomies, and the government of their own private, as well as of the publick affairs. This mode of education was not only authorized, but strictly enjoined by a law passed in this reign; and for the encouragement of the natives and professors, handsome salaries were established for their genteel maintenance, in order to give their instructions more weight with the pupils. The seminaries of literature were further endowed, and strongly patronized, by a succeeding inca, grand nephew to inca Roca.

WE shall close this reign, with repeating some celebrated sayings, ascribed to the inca Roca by the Spanish writers Blas Valera and Garcilasso. When he reflected on the immensity, beauty, and splendor, of the heavens, he would say, "If the heavens be so glorious, glittering, and resplendent, which is the throne of the Rachacamac, how much more glorious and resplendent must his person be, who is the creator of all things in heaven, on earth, and in the waters?" Another saying of his was; "If I were to adore any terrestrial thing, it should be a wise and good man, whose excellency transcends all other creatures." He would likewise say, "When an infant is born he grows up, and then he dies. He that yesterday had a beginning, to-day arrives at his end. He that cannot make himself immortal, nor recover life after death is not worthy of adoration." Numberless other adages and remarks are attributed to him, which, if genuine, evince his deep reflection and solid understanding.

seventh inca.

WHEN the last duties were paid to the memory of the excellent inca Roca, his eldest son, Yahuarhuacas, ascended the throne, and assumed the reins of government; to qualify him for which his father spared no labour. No prince had ever received a better education, or been earlier tinctured with the principles of virtue; and indeed he exhibited, in the beginning of his reign, the most flattering prospects of peace and happiness to his people. Being of a moderate, gentle disposition, he sought no addition to his empire. Fully satisfied with his hereditary dominions, his whole study was to govern with equity, without encroaching upon the rights of his neighbours, under a pretence of reclaiming them from their barbarity. It is reported, that certain inauspicious predictions, published at his birth determined him to pursue this pacific conduct, as the most certain means of escaping the danger with which he was threatened. However, that his time might not be consumed in inactivity, and in a manner unserviceable to his people, he made divers progresses over the kingdom, improved and adorned several parts of the country with stately buildings; and gained the esteem and love of his subjects, by divers acts of benevolence, munificence, and liberality. His neglect of that maxim of state, whereby the sovereign was required to give some proof of his warlike genius, and to add to the dominions of his ancestors, drew so many reflections on the inca's courage, that, after he had reigned for many years with the utmost tranquillity, he was at length forced into hostile measures, diametrically opposite to his own judgment and natural disposition. His caution was construed into timidity, and his ardent love of peace into pusillanimity. He resolved, therefore, to send twenty thousand men upon an expedition to the frontiers of Arequaba, to reduce a large peninsula, which had been overlooked by his ancestors in the course of their conquests. An army was assembled, and his brother appointed to conduct this enterprize, the inca not chusing to go in person, so strong an impression had his mind received from the predictions we have mentioned. Every thing succeeded to the utmost wishes of the prince; a large tract of country was subdued, and the army returned triumphant to Cuzco, which so animated Yahuarhuacas, that he began to aspire at the fame of a conqueror, and now entered a tained thoughts of reducing certain warlike savage nations, that had struck with dread the boldest of his ancestors. Yet his ambition was frequently checked by sudden emotions of fear, which obliged him to stop short in the middle of his preparations, and declared to all the world the motives of his irresolution. In consequence his character began to suffer, and he found himself sinking daily in the esteem of his subjects, who considered valour as the first and most essential quality of a monarch. While he was thus tossed between contending passions, the untoward disposition of his eldest son and heir to his dominions, opened a new source of affliction. The prince had resigned himself to every kind of debauchery and extravagance, disdaining all the admonitions of his father, and even treating his person with disrespect, until at length he fixed upon the resolution of disgracing and disinheriting b him, as unworthy and incapable of wielding the imperial sceptre. At the age of nineteen, the prince was banished the court, to the mean employment of feeding the cattle of the Sun, on certain pleasant pastures, at the distance of a league from Cuzco. As he had not power to resist the imperial command, he submitted with seeming cheerfulness, and diligently executed the servile business assigned to him, for the space of three years.

THESE domestic troubles afforded the inca a fair opportunity of laying aside all thoughts of war without reproach. For three years he attended only to the good government of his people, and the means of reclaiming his sons, for whom he still entertained a paternal affection, notwithstanding all his vices. One day about noon the disgraced prince entered the palace without companions or attendants, and with marks of deep contrition and sorrow, requested c to speak with his father, upon business of the highest importance. Upon hearing the message, the inca, persuaded it was only a stratagem to work upon his passions, refused in a rage to admit the prince to his presence, and ordered him immediately to retire to the place appointed for his residence, unless he wanted to compel him to execute the laws against disobedience. To this answer the prince replied, "that he came not in contempt of the royal mandate, for which he had the most profound respect, but in obedience to the injunction of another inca, as great as himself, who commissioned him to impart a secret of the last consequence to the empire of Peru; and if it pleased his imperial majesty to hear the message, he desired to be admitted to an audience; if not, he had fulfilled his orders, and should return with an account of his unsuccessful attempt." There appeared something so extraordinary d in this reply, that the inca resolved once more to see his son. Curiosity to know who this inca as great as himself could be, was an irresistible motive for complying with the prince's strange request. Accordingly he was introduced, and standing before his father, he told him, "that he was come to acquaint him, that while he was sitting under one of those great rocks in the fields of Chita, where he was employed by the imperial orders in feeding the flocks of the Sun, there appeared to him a man in a strange habit, and different in figure from any he had ever beheld, his beard being above a span in length, his garments long and flowing, and about his neck he carried a kind of living creature, unlike any animal he had ever seen. This figure spoke to me, said the prince, and cried, "Come in; I am a child of the Sun, and brother to the inca Manco Capac, who was the first of your family, and e by him I am allied in blood to your father and you, my name being inca Virachoca. I am sent by our father the Sun, to order you immediately to acquaint my brother the inca, that the greatest part of the Peruvians of Chincasuya, are in rebellion, and united in a confederacy to assault his dominions, and with a strong and numerous army to depose him, overturn the empire of the incas, and introduce the primitive barbarity. This intelligence I order you immediately to carry to my brother the inca, that he may provide against the danger, and take such vigorous resolutions as the importance of the occasion requires. As to yourself, I will declare to you, that in whatsoever misfortune thou art, you lose not courage nor spirit, for I shall ever be ready to succour thee as my own flesh and blood; and therefore I exhort thee not to attempt any thing unworthy thy family, thy f ancient descent, and the honour of the empire, for I will be assisting to thee in the greatest exigencies."

THE inca could scarce forbear laughing at the plausibility of this tale, which he was persuaded his profligate son had framed to answer his own purposes; and indeed it is probable that the young man had fallen upon this stratagem, to recover his father's favour, or had actually fomented the rebellions which he now predicted: however, many of the sagest persons of the council judged otherwise, and seriously admonished the inca to make all possible inquiry into the truth of the report, and provide diligently for the worst. They superstitiously alledged, that all due reverence ought to be shewn to those intimations of divine favour, since it was highly improbable the prince would presume to pass for truth a forgery g which might so easily be detected. Nevertheless, the inca obstinately resolved to give no credit to his son; and accordingly ordered him immediately back to the place of his banishment.

ABOUT three months after this vision of Virachoca, (for so the prince was afterwards called) a rumour was spread, that an insurrection appeared in the provinces of Chincafuya, to which the inca refused giving any belief, imagining it must have arisen from the foolish vision related by his son. In a few days it gained ground; and though no particulars were known, the enemy having blocked up all the passes, yet it now occasioned universal dread and consternation. At length an exact account was brought, that the rebels, after having put all the inca's governors to death, were marching with an army of forty thousand men to plunder, burn, and destroy Cuzco. These nations, having submitted out of fear, suppressed their resentment, until a fair occasion offered to throw off the yoke, in the present weak and pacific reign, and amidst the differences between the inca and his son, whose hard usage they determined to make the pretext for their rebellion. The authors and contrivers of this insurrection, were the chief curacas of the provinces of Charcas. Haucstucalla was the leader, a young man of twenty-six years of age, full of fire, mettle, and ambition; uneasy under the gentle yoke of the inca, and aspiring at liberty and dominion. He despised the character of the reigning monarch, thought it unreasonable that thousands of brave men should be subjected to the will of a coward, and entertained hopes of one day ascending the throne of Peru; to which, however, he could have no title, except by conquest.

WHEN the inca received the certain intelligence of these particulars, he was terrified and dismayed. His fears prevented his following the advice of his council, to make vigorous preparations for opposing the enemy; and he suggested to himself so many objections against every thing that was proposed, that in the end he involved himself in inextricable perplexity, leaving neither time to levy a sufficient number of forces, nor a garrison strong enough in the city to resist the rebels, until further succours could arrive. Distracted with his circumstances, he privately resolved to yield to the torrent of calamity that threatened the empire, and retire to Coilafuya, where he flattered himself with security, which was the utmost to which he now raised his hopes, leaving the city in confusion, exposed to violence from abroad, and the effects of dissension and discord at home. In this situation every one shifted for himself, some taking refuge in the mountains, some going over to the prince Virachoca, and all abandoning the city to its destiny. Virachoca was deeply affected with the fate which threatened Cuzco, but still more grieved at the misconduct of his father. Immediately he gave orders to all his attendants to repair instantly to the city, and stop the flight of the inhabitants, with assurances, that he would soon repair with an army to their relief. Then he diligently set about collecting the fugitives, and after he had assembled a considerable number, marched with incredible rapidity in search of the inca his father, whom he found on the top of a mountain that overlooked the enemy's camp. Falling upon his knees he addressed the inca; "How is it, sire, that upon a report, the truth of which hath not been examined, that some of your subjects have risen in rebellion, you should abandon your city and court, and fly disgracefully before an enemy you have not yet looked in the face? How can you desert the sacred temple of the Sun your father, to be polluted by the unhallowed feet of your perfidious subjects, giving them leave to return to their abominable worship, and the sacrifices of men, women, and children, with other barbarous and inhuman practices, from which they were reformed by your glorious ancestors? What account shall we give to our great parent, if we abandon the sacred virgins of the Sun committed to our care, to the brutality and lust of our savage enemies? What benefit shall we get by saving our lives at the expence of our honour, property, liberty, religion, and whatever ought to be dear to us? For my part I shall never consent that the barbarians should possess Cuzco unopposed; I shall rather endeavour to stem the torrent with my single person, and appear alone before my enemies, to shed the last drop of my blood, than live to see the dissolution of that imperial seat, reared to its present grandeur by the military toils and trophies of our glorious ancestors; or those horrible sacrifices performed in the sacred temple, founded by the offspring of the Sun in honour of their parent. Wherefore let such as have courage follow me, and I will teach them to exchange an infamous and loathsome life, for an honourable death, or by a glorious victory lead them to the paths of happiness and security." Having spoken this, he perceived a spirit of enterprize and emulation rise in the breasts of the curacas and soldiers, who to the number of four thousand men had followed the fugitive monarch in his shameful retreat. They blushed to see themselves outdone in courage by a debauched stripling; and repenting of their mean complaisance to the apprehensions of a timid monarch, resolved to wipe off their disgrace, and assist the bold resolution of the heir apparent, whose virtues now blazed forth with greater lustre, than if never they had been obscured. Accordingly they all joined Virachoca, a few old men only being left with the inca, and begun their march towards Cuzco, with such expedition, that the prince had not leisure to refresh himself, after a fatiguing journey. In their way a great number of troops were picked up, and the news spreading with inconceivable a able rapidity, that prince Virachoca was coming to the relief of the city, with a resolution to perish in its defence, every heart was cheered, every bosom glowed with renovated vigour, and spirits were infused into every subject of the empire. When he entered Cuzco, he was received with loud acclamations as the guardian angel of the state, sent by his great parent the Sun for its protection. The vision he had related was now universally believed, and it inspired the people with a kind of sacred awe and reverence for his person. Every man capable of bearing arms hurried to his standard, and he was enabled in a few days to seek the enemy, instead of suffering himself to be besieged in a city that was scarce defensible on account of its extent.

This train of good fortune was greatly encreased by a very unexpected accident. The b Quechuas, the hereditary and implacable enemies of the Charcas, were the first who had discovered the conspiracy; and perceiving the urgency of the affair admitted of no delay, or of time to receive the inca's orders, they complied with the necessity; and, putting themselves in arms, marched directly for the defence of Cuzco, resolving to give proof of their loyalty by spilling the last drop of their blood to relieve the capital. The arrival of so powerful a succour infused universal spirit into the troops: they ascribed this unforeseen and providential circumstance to the promise made to Virachoca in the vision; and now, believing the gods fought for them, they eagerly sought to be led to battle. The prince cherished the impression, and indulged the wishes of his soldiers, by entering immediately on his march towards the river Apurimac, on the banks of which he proposed exhibiting c the first proofs of his valour, and making trial of his fortune. Having chosen his ground with great judgment, he gave orders for the arrangement of the troops with so much composure, presence of mind, and ability, as astonished all the old officers, who believed him capable of displaying nothing more than a juvenile ardor. Every thing being disposed in order of battle, he sent proposals of pardon, peace, and friendship, to the enemy; promising to pass a general act of oblivion, if they would throw down their arms, and retire home; but the Charcas being informed that the inca had deserted his people, and persuading themselves that this circumstance would so dispirit the troops as to render them an easy conquest, they rejected the terms with insolence, and advanced within half a league of the imperial camp; sending word, that to-morrow's sun should discover in whose power d it was to offer conditions of peace and pardon. Both armies remaining all night in arms, the signal for engaging was given by day-light, and the battle joined with astonishing fury. Virachoca threw the first dart at the enemy, fell into the midst of their squadrons, and was received with equal courage and conduct. Here the engagement raged with doubtful success for several hours, when 5000 men the prince had placed in ambush sallied out on the rear of the enemy at the most critical juncture, and turned the scale of fortune. The Charcas began at length to remit in their vigour, and sink under the impetuosity of the imperial forces, who, seeing them give way, poured in on all sides, and pressed the advantage. Great numbers flocked from the country on the report that prince Virachoca was giving battle to the rebels; and the prince, to render these succours of double service, cried e out, that the gods had converted the rocks and stones of the country into men, to defeat the perfidious designs of the barbarians, and fight in defence of the offspring of the Sun. In proportion as this notion animated the Peruvians, it dispirited the Charcas, who were no less superstitious. After great slaughter, they retreated, and left the prince master of the field, though not of a complete victory. They faced about when they were pursued, and the imperialists were too much fatigued to enter upon a fresh dispute merely for the honour of a victory, all the advantages of which they already enjoyed. Honchocullo, the principal officer among the rebels, was taken prisoner; together with great numbers of other officers and private men. Several thousand of the enemy were left dead on the field, and the prince thought it equivalent to a decisive victory that he was not defeated in this f first trial of his prowess, and in such dangerous circumstances. Virachoca's moderation, after the battle, was still more glorious than the valour he had displayed in the action. He ordered the wounded to be dressed and treated with the utmost humanity. The noble prisoners he won by his affability and heroic qualities; and such was the impression he made upon all men, that so extraordinary a change in his manners was ascribed to the immediate influence of the Sun, who had destined him to be the saviour of his country.

As soon as the troops had refreshed themselves, the prince dispatched three different expresses with the happy tidings; one to the temple of the Sun, to acquaint that presiding lumina- g the inca. Though the Peruvians believed the Sun omniscient and omnipotent, yet this divinity was always treated as a human creature, whose faculties were limited, and who required information of the event of things below. Having made these dispatches, and given the troops some rest and refreshment, he selected six thousand of the most bold and hardy of his soldiers to accompany him in the pursuit of the enemy; the rest of his army he disbanded, disbanded, thinking this number sufficient against a broken, harraffed, and fatigued, remnant of barbarians. Many stragglers were picked up in the march, treated kindly, and then dismissed to acquaint their countrymen what they might expect from the clemency of the conqueror. The effects of this wise policy soon became visible; all the provinces of Charcas through which he passed submitted, the women and children coming forth to meet the prince with green branches in their hands, crying, "O thou undoubted child of the Sun, who art the succour and protector of the poor, have compassion upon us, and pardon our transgressions!" Moved with the gentle usage and clemency extended towards them, the men next sent their submission, and yielded themselves implicitly to the will of a prince who revived all the heroic qualities of his glorious ancestors. Ambition and the thirst of honour operated in the most extraordinary manner upon the mind of Virachoca, to whom all the qualities he possessed were natural, although for some time they lay buried in dissipation, riot, and youthful extravagance. The disgrace of banishment, the danger of his country, his father's shameful flight, and the circumstances of the times, had just opened his eyes to his own conduct, and called forth the exertion of all those talents which were natural to his family, although but faintly possessed by his royal parent. By this means he wholly subdued the rebels; and, after having fully established the usual government in the provinces, he made his public entry into Cuzco, on foot, that he might assume nothing belonging to royalty; at which, however, it appears, he aspired. Never was conqueror received with greater honours, all the aged incas, whose infirmities rendered them incapable of attending him in the field, now came forth to mingle in his triumph; telling him they earnestly wished again for youth for no other reason than to serve under his fortunate and auspicious conduct. His mother also, with all her women, and the ladies of the court, went forth with songs and dances, to receive the victorious prince. Some embraced him, others wiped off the dust from his brows; multitudes might be seen sweeping the dust from his feet, and strewing the road with flowers; in which joyful and solemn manner he visited the temple of the Sun where he devoutly returned thanks to that luminary for having enabled him to overcome his enemies, and rescue the empire from disgrace and destruction. Then he visited the convent of select virgins, to whose prayers and intercession with the Sun he piously ascribed great part of his success, and at length quitted the city to wait upon the inca his father with an account of his conduct.

THE inca Tahuarhuacac had concealed himself all this while in the Straits of Mayra, and now received his son as the glory of his family, the saviour of the state, and the tutelary being who had preserved himself and people from imminent and unavoidable destruction; yet he appeared melancholy, confused, covered with shame, and distracted with the reproaches of his own conscience. Garcilasso ascribes the uneasiness, which was visible amidst all his expressions of joy, to envy, thereby intimating an apology for the prince's conduct in having supplanted his father in the imperial dignity. He alleges, that at the public interview few words passed between the princes; but that it was universally believed among the Indians, that all the discourse they had in private turned upon the establishment of the government, and which of the two should reign; the inca, who had shamefully abandoned his capital, or the prince who had valiantly defended the kingdom, and subdued the enemies of his country. It was determined in favour of the latter; or rather, in all probability, the prince, knowing his own popularity, chose to gratify his ambition at the expence of filial duty, which is the deepest stain upon his character, notwithstanding all the follies of his youth. To whatever cause we ascribe it, whether to the old inca's voluntary resignation, to the prince's ambition, or to the will of the people, certain it is, that Virachoca was raised to the throne in the room of his father, for whom there was a palace prepared in a pleasant valley between the Straits of Mayra and Quespichanca, where he might use the diversions of hunting and fishing without restraint, or care about public business. The old king was permitted to continue the use of the purple imperial wreath as a badge of his royalty, and to appear in all respects a monarch, except in the exercise of power, which devolved wholly upon the prince; empty honours with which his pride was gratified at the same time that the natural indolence of his disposition was fully indulged. Here he passed the remaining days of his life in ease and tranquility, and died in advanced age, after he had been long dead in the memory of his subjects.

THE prince no sooner ascended the imperial throne, than his new dignity gave additional splendor to all those heroic qualities which had lately blazed forth to the astonishment of his subjects. It was doubtful whether he was more revered on account of his vision, or admired for the valour and activity displayed in the field against the enemies of his country. No one presumed to question his being under the immediate protection of heaven, and the peculiar favourite of his parent the Sun, which had already obtained to him the appellation of Virachoca. To perpetuate the memory of this vision, and keep up the superstitious esteem of the people, the inca gave orders that the foundation of a temple should be laid on the eighth inca.

- a the very spot where his uncle appeared to him, and that it should in all respects represent the circumstances of the vision, the temple being open at the roof to imitate the open field where the god stood, a little chapel rooled with stone being added in imitation of the holy rock under which the prince reposed himself, and a stone image of a human figure, adorned with a long beard, a flowing gown, and an animal with the claws of a lion chained round his neck, representing the apparition. This circumstance encreased the veneration of the Indians for his person, and produced the usual effect of prosperity in the mind of the inca, who now issued directions to have a picture made, which reflected upon the character of his father, and blazoned his own superiority with all the arts of adulation. The piece represented the shameful flight of the old inca, the distressed situation of Cuzco, and his own victory over
- b the rebels; and it remained for many years a disgraceful monument of filial irreverence and natural pride inflamed by success. However, Virachoca, notwithstanding these spots in his character, shone with unrivalled lustre at the head of the empire, in which he established peace and tranquillity, industry, arts, and whatever tended to the benefit of his subjects. He began his administration with bestowing rewards on all those soldiers who had joined his standard in his desperate situation, and taken arms against the rebels. In this distribution of the royal favour the faithful Quechoas were not forgot; on them he bestowed various immunities, and, among others, the privilege of wearing their hair shorn, their heads bound with the wreath, and of having their ears pierced in the manner of the incas; a favour of seemingly trivial importance, but to them of the last consequence.
- c Next he visited the provinces, and made such regulations as were best adapted to the peculiar genius of the different climates, countries, and inhabitants, with so much judgment and discretion as greatly augmented his reputation.

AFTER some years spent in establishing the domestic policy of his empire, Virachoca issued orders for levying an army of 30,000 men, and determined to make certain conquests towards his remotest frontiers, thinking that the recovery of the empire alone was not sufficient to establish his reputation for enterprize and valour; yet, on more mature deliberation, he relinquished the thoughts of conducting the expedition in person, and appointed his brother Pabuac Mayta to the command of the army; a prince who derived the surname of Pabuac from his extraordinary swiftness, agility, and vigour. The design was to conquer

d the large provinces of Coranca, Ullaria, Llipi, and Chicu, the reduction of which was omitted by his predecessors, and particularly his father, who, after making all the necessary preparations, had relinquished the expedition. After a long march, Pabuac arrived on the frontiers of the provinces Chica and Ampura, the inhabitants of which worshipped two lofty mountains from a principle of gratitude, because from them descend those wholesome streams which give fertility to their lands. They maintained some slight skirmishes with the imperial army, rather with a view of demonstrating their own courage, than from any hope conceived that they should be able to resist the power of the Incas, whose fame was exalted so high by the late defeat of the Charcas, and the valour of Virachoca. Having given sufficient specimens of courage, they then made their voluntary submission, and their example

e was followed by other nations; so that in the space of three years the expedition was ended, and all the nations towards that quarter were brought under the obedience of the inca, and subjected to the laws which governed the Peruvian empire.

VIRACHOCA now seemed to have extended the frontiers of his dominions as far as nature would permit, being hemmed in to the eastward by the snowy mountain, and bound in to the westward by the ocean; to the southward he was acknowledged sovereign to the very extremity of the Charcas, and the vast deserts which separate Peru from Chili, then deemed impassable. Yet still ambition found an outlet to the northward, and spurred on the inca to attempt fresh conquests towards this quarter. An army was accordingly raised for this expedition, which Virachoca determined to command in person, leaving his brother f regent of the empire in his absence. Advancing towards Antabuylla, a province under the jurisdiction of the Charcas, this people testified their repentance of the late rebellion by every possible act of deep contrition, which so thoroughly pacified the inca, that instead of continuing his resentment, he conferred upon them several favours and immunities, as the surest method of confirming their obedience. The inhabitants of the rich and populous province of Huyatora proved equally submissive, notwithstanding they were celebrated for their warlike turbulent spirit. No sooner the inca's army approached, than they dispatched ambassadors to assure Virachoca of their obedience and profound submission to his will and pleasure. Pocra and divers other provinces yielded with as little resistance; upon which the inca disbanded the bulk of his army to avoid oppressing his new subjects, and applied himself

g diligently to settle the civil government of his conquests; establishing such laws and ordonnances as he believed would prove most conducive to the good of the people. It was here he cut a fine canal, flowing for the space of 120 leagues, and 12 feet in depth, for the conveniency of trade and navigation; a work which to this day remains as a monument

ment of his magnificence, power, and attention to the interest of his subjects. It had its course through all the country of the Rucanas, and by means of numberless rivulets issuing from it on both sides, watered the finest pasturages in the whole empire of Peru. Another aqueduct of the same nature, but still more magnificent, he made in the provinces of Contisuyu, which though it was productive of the greatest blessings to the people, the lazy Spaniards have suffered to go to ruin.

THESE stupendous works and useful conquests were succeeded by another progress, which the inca made through all his dominions, to inspect how well his orders, with respect to domestic policy, had been executed. He pried, with the most curious eye, into the conduct of his officers and magistrates; punishing every neglect of duty, every act of oppression and injustice, with the utmost rigour. Passing from one province to another, and distinguishing merit by his peculiar favour, he at last arrived on the sea coast at Toracopa, where he received ambassadors from the kingdom of Tucman, which the Spaniards call Tucuman, distant about 200 leagues from the southwest of Charcas. When the ambassadors were admitted to an audience, they told the inca, that, excited by the report of his famous achievements, the equity of his proceedings, the excellency of his laws, instituted solely for the benefit of his subjects; the purity of his religion, the clemency of his disposition, and the miracles wrought by his father the Sun, they were come to learn the certainty of what fame had spread abroad on her wings, and diffused far and wide, with such circumstances as almost exceeded belief. Their Curacas had commissioned them, in case they found things any way agreeable to flattering report, to implore the protection of the great inca, to put themselves under his dominion, and request that he would condescend to govern them by a prince of the royal stem, who would instruct the people in the Peruvian laws, customs, and religion. "Perceiving, said they, that all things greatly exceed the wishes of the most sanguine imagination, we humbly entreat your divine majesty that you will be pleased to take us under the shadow of your wings, in hopes and expectation of which we do here prostrate ourselves before you as the undoubted offspring and legitimate issue of the Sun, acknowledging you for our sovereign king and lord; in testimony whereof we do offer our persons, with the fruit of our lands, to be disposed of as you in your justice shall think proper." Having said this, they offered their presents, consisting of fine honey, cotton, pieces of cloth, corn, pulse, gold and silver; and which metals, they told the inca, were not the produce of the country, nor, in their opinion, at all necessary to the happiness and convenience of life. The inca received them in the most gracious manner; they were entertained with the utmost splendor and hospitality, and then dismissed with presents and the highest sentiments of Virachoca's goodness and virtue. They confessed that the laws and constitutions of Peru were worthy of their divine origin, and gave the first intimation of Chili, in the conquests of which they promised to assist the inca with all their forces, "that every part of the world might taste the blessings consequent on so rational, humane, and excellent a government."

WHILE the inca was thus employed, advice was received of the flight of the brave Honcobuallo, chief of the Charcas; a step which greatly astonished Virachoca, as he had, for the space of ten years, been endeavouring to conciliate the affections of this prince by the utmost generosity, munificence, and favour. The great spirit of Honcobuallo could, nevertheless, brook no subordination; he regarded the royal bounty as an indirect reflection upon his own inferiority, and he particularly resented the degree of esteem shewn for the Quechoas, his declared enemies. Fired with these imaginary injuries, he determined, against the general sense of the people, to purchase his liberty at the expence of his fortune and his life. After a pathetic speech to his subjects, in which he blazoned out, in the strongest colours, the blessings consequent on liberty to a generous mind, even in a state of poverty, he took his leave, with a resolution to try his fortune, and endeavour to establish a sovereignty in some remote country. Those who were so strongly attached to his fortune as to connect themselves with him in all situations, were recommended to remove out of the country with all possible silence, to avoid exciting the jealousy of the inca, and incurring his vengeance. Great numbers accordingly quitted the province, and assembled at an appointed place out of the dominions of the inca, where Honcobuallo was chosen king and leader of this band of adventurers; which appeared to them the most probable means of regaining their liberty, as it would be in vain to attempt throwing off their subjection to so powerful a monarch as Virachoca. To the number of 8000 fighting men, with their wives and children, abandoned their country, out of attachment to their chief, and love of freedom. They directed their course towards the Cordellara mountains, and are said to have traversed above 200 leagues of a barren country; but where they settled is not determined. As to the inca, he no sooner received the news than he took all possible measures to prevent the escape of the fugitives; but they had conducted themselves with such prudence as secured success. When he found matters could not be remedied, he entered upon measures to remove every cause of discontent

a tent among the Charcas, and sent his brother to enquire into their grievances, and conciliate their minds by the utmost lenity and liberality. By these means the Charcas were soon brought not only to forget their beloved chief, but even to rejoice at the flight of a prince whose turbulent humour proved an insurmountable obstacle to their peace, while his courage and munificence gained their affections.

At length the inca Virachoca, after governing for many years with the greatest reputation, was forced to submit in the zenith of glory and prosperity, to the common fate of mankind, and yield to mortality, while he was revered as a deity. He is the reputed author of a prophecy, universally believed in Peru at that time, and preserved among the royal archives; "that, after a certain period of years, and the succession of a certain number of incas, there should come a people from remote countries, never seen or known before in Peru, who should abolish the religion, trample upon the laws, and subvert the empire of the incas." He is reported likewise to have been held as an oracle by the people, from the time that Virachoca appeared to him in a vision. The Amantas, who were the philosophers of Peru, and the magicians, consulted him upon all extraordinary appearances in the heavens, flight of birds, and other superstitious prognostications, and yielded intire faith to his interpretations; for, as he was supposed to hold an immediate intercourse with the Sun, there was none so hardy as to question his infallibility. One observation of his is memorable, as it distinguishes his good sense and knowledge of the human heart: he was often heard to say, "That parents occasion the ruin of their children by shewing them too much indulgence, yielding to their froward humours, and suffering their passions to take the lead without controul; whereby they become so corrupt in their manners during infancy, as to be ripened in vice before the age of manhood. Others, on the contrary, break the spirit of youth by too much rigour. The true method of education is to steer between both extremes, to encourage vivacity and spirit, to check only what is vicious; by which youth become valiant in war, and wise in peace (F)."

After the usual marks of respect were paid to the memory of the deceased inca, the throne was immediately filled by his eldest legitimate son, the prince Pachacatec; a name importing the subverter of the world. He began his reign with the established custom of making a progress through his dominions, in the course of which he found reason to be satisfied with the choice made by his royal father of magistrates: Not a single province in the whole empire preferred an accusation against the governor, or desired any change in the magistracy; from whence we may infer with what lenity, prudence, and justice, the incas executed the laws. Never, indeed, was there a people governed by the mere light of nature and reason with more prudence, equity, and moderation; insomuch, that the Spanish writers themselves bestow the greatest praises on the Peruvian institutions, both political and civil, notwithstanding the necessity they are under of vindicating the conduct of their countrymen, who, under the pretence of propagating the gospel, committed the grossest violations on the rights of humanity, by establishing an arbitrary and despotic dominion over a people always accustomed to freedom, and the most gentle administration. At the expiration of three years, Pachacatec returned to Cuzco, and, lest he should appear to dedicate his whole time to repose, set on foot an expedition, in order to establish the reputation of a soldier, as well as that of a statesman. Thirty thousand men were raised for this service, with which army the inca, attended by his brother Capac Yupanqui, marched to Vilca, the extreme frontier of his dominions, on the side of Cbincafuya. Here he remained with a body of forces, while his brother advanced to the province of Sanja, called Xanxa corruptly by the Spaniards. This country contained above thirty thousand inhabitants, all of the same lineage and name, Huanca. They boastingly derived their origin from one man, and one woman, both descended from the same fountain. They were barbarous, fierce, and warlike; they flead their prisoners, filled their skins with ashes, and hung them up in their temples, as trophies of victory, and proofs of savage valour. The perfect union that subsisted among them rendered the Huancas formidable to all their neighbours, and enabled them to extend their dominions greatly beyond their original dimensions. (F) Before we close this reign, it may be proper to observe, that La Vega thinks it probable that Virachoca reigned fifty years. He saw his body, which was preserved entire in his days, with the hair as white as snow. He was also shewn the bodies of several other incas from whom he was descended by the mother, which he observes were more entire than the mummies of Egypt, as they retained the hair of the head, the eye-brows, and even the eye-lashes, in full perfection.

He adds, that the flesh of these bodies was so plump and full, and the eyes so well counterfeited by a mixture of gold, that they seemed almost alive and natural; which circumstance, however, he borrows from Acosta. It appears, indeed, from the testimony of all the Spanish writers, that the Peruvians were extremely expert in the art of embalming; and one author asserts, the bodies were so light, than an Indian could easily carry one of them in his arms. sitions sitions they fortified in such a manner, that, notwithstanding the perpetual wars in which a they were engaged, they never lost any of their territories, even when they happened to be defeated in the field. They entertained a particular affection for dogs, and some writers intimate that they worshipped them. This considerable nation, the inca subdued by his moderation and arguments. He convinced them of the superiority of the Peruvian laws and constitution; he demonstrated to them the excellency of his own administration, and gained so far upon these savages, that they earnestly requested to be admitted into the rights and privileges of his subjects: by the same policy, he allured several other surrounding nations to put themselves under his protection and government; among the principal of which were the inhabitants of Tarma and Pampu, which the Spaniards call Bombu. These, b although warlike and ferocious, yielded to the inca's arguments, and admitted his sovereignty without resistance. There was something peculiar in the customs of these new subjects. They sealed matrimony with a kiss, all the previous ceremony consisting in the declaration of the parties, that they were mutually agreeable to each other. Widows cut off their hair in testimony of their grief for the decease of their husbands, and were not allowed to marry within the year. On festivals all abstained from animal food, and the priests were never supposed to eat any thing that ever enjoyed life; notwithstanding which, we are told by la Vega, that the people lived without order, government, or religion; perhaps he means that they were unacquainted with monarchy, and the worship of the sun.

EVERY thing being adjusted to the inca's satisfaction in these countries, his brother c marched with the main body of the army to the territory of Chicarpac, possessed by a warlike nation, exceedingly barbarous in their nature and manners. They rejected all his proposals, and bid defiance to his menaces. Finding moderation answered no purpose, the prince entered upon hostilities; and, in a few skirmishes, no less than four thousand Indians perished, which struck such a dread into the enemy, that they submitted, without further efforts to defend their liberties. Nor did they admire the clemency of the victor less than his valour; they were astonished to find him admit them into the same degree of favour as other nations, who had made no resistance, and asked, that if such was the virtue of the general, what might they not expect from the inca himself? After giving them instructors, rulers, and garrisons to keep them in obedience, the prince directed his march to d a large and populous province, called Ancara; which immediately acknowledged the sovereignty of the inca, and was imitated by another powerful neighbouring province, to which the Spanish writers give the name of Huyallas. Here he abolished the abominable practice of sodomy, so frequent in this country, that Huyallas became an opprobrious name among all the Indians of the adjacent provinces.

WITH this conquest ended the expedition of Yupanqui, after which he returned to Cuzco, and was received with triumphal honours by the inca, the people being ordered to devote a whole moon to rejoicing, and to celebrate their festival with such games and sports as reflected honour upon the victorious prince. These holidays ended, the inca enquired into the degree of merit displayed by each of the officers, and soldiers in the expedition, and rewarded them proportionably, with such admirable policy and discernment as to inflame e them to emulation. His next measure was to make a second progress through his dominions, in which course he beautified and adorned the provinces with a variety of temples and stately publick edifices. Among these were several fortresses on the frontiers, which he garrisoned strongly, and beautiful palaces seated in the pleasantest vallies, which were intended for the royal residence. Nor were these works wholly confined to ornament; storehouses were erected, and granaries built in all the great roads, to supply the people with provision in years of scarcity. Divers laws and ordinances were promulgated in the different provinces, in all which the inca studied the peculiar temper and disposition of the people, indulging each nation in their own customs, in all matters which did not interfere f with the general plan of legislation. Having spent three years in this expedition, he returned to the capital, and consulted with his brother and ministers about the intire reduction of the extreme province of Chinchafuya. When the resolution was taken of completing the conquests on that side, the command was given to the prince Yupanqui, whose admirable services in the last expedition proved him deserving of this confidence, and the inca's eldest son, then sixteen years of age, being sent under him to receive the first instruction in the rudiments of the art of war. The greatest army ever beheld in Peru was levied on this occasion; no less than fifty thousand fighting men took the field, the uncle and nephew leading the van directly to the province of Chincarpa. On their arrival the usual summons was sent to the inhabitants of the province of Pinan, which submitted without delay, from g a sense of the inability to resist so vast a power, and conviction of the superior excellence of the Peruvian constitution. Similar messages were sent to the provinces of Huaras, Canchuca, and Nisossampu, but they were received by the spirited inhabitants in a very different manner. Far from copying the tame submission of Pinan, they confederated together for their

a their mutual defence, returning this answer, " That they had rather perish than renounce the laws, customs, and religion, handed down to them by their venerable ancestors." They added, that, perfectly satisfied with those gods, who had shed the blessings of freedom and independence on their forefathers, they had no occasion to change them for that specious phantom of religion, with which the inca allured their simple neighbours, and usurped a tyrannical dominion. Upon this they retired to their strong holds, knowing how unable they were to face the imperial army in the open field. They seized upon all the passes, and fortified themselves in a situation almost inaccessible; laying in such store of provision, as evinced their resolution of standing an obstinate siege. Tupanqui received without surprise the rude and haughty answer of this savage people, with whose bravery and love of liberty he seemed even delighted. b He divided his army into four battalions, and resolved to block up the enemy so straightly that they should be compelled without bloodshed into obedience: however, this humane design was frustrated by their ferocity. They disputed all the passes with the utmost obstinacy, and made the most desperate sallies out of their strong intrenchments. Each of the provinces strove who should exceed the other in feats of arms, and martial achievements: the consequence was dreadful; thousands perished on the points of the swords of the imperialists, who very prudently kept on the defensive, until the first effort of the enemy's fury was over, and their rage subsided. When famine began to prevail in the camp of the besieged, they dispatched their wives and children in quest of provision, who, being taken prisoners, were treated with such kindness by the inca, c that they returned with the loudest encomiums on his valour, generosity, and clemency. This politic tenderness was well received by the enemy, though, for some time, it seemed rather to inflame and animate them to a higher pitch of fury. At last, grown feeble with disease and hunger, affected with repeated instances of the inca's generosity, their hearts softened, they melted into complacency, and, by the joint consent of their leaders, dispatched ambassadors to the prince to implore his pardon and clemency. The reception the ambassadors met with was so gracious, that they stood amazed at the unparalleled goodness of the person, whom they had lately considered as the most oppressive tyrant. All were dismissed to their houses and dwellings without so much as a reproof; the prince even extolled their bravery, telling them, that their valour, as enemies, was the surest pledge of d their fidelity and obedience, as subjects; he ordered their lands to be sowed, placed magistrates over them, and established such institutions and regulations as were the most suitable to the spirit of a free, valiant, and barbarous people.

ADVANCING farther into the country, the prince arrived on the confines of the province of Huamuchacu, governed by a lord of the same name, a person of profound judgment and prudence, who had long been striving in vain to civilize his rude and barbarous subjects. This nation worshipped trees and pebbles, of which the most shining were held in the greatest devotion, and deposited with the utmost care in their houses. They lived like wild beasts in hollow trees, caves, and rocks, and offered sacrifices of human blood. Their lord had conceived a plan of government more suitable to moral and rational e life; but the ferocity of his subjects prevented his putting it in execution. Now he joyfully entertained the messengers sent by the prince with proposals to embrace the laws and religion of the Peruvians, of which he conceived an extraordinary favourable opinion from report. It was sufficient proof of his moderation and patriotism, that he preferred vassalage, and such laws and ordinances as might contribute to the good of his people, to sovereignty and independence in the present savage situation of the nation. He hoped, that he now should be able, under the protection of the inca, to oblige his subjects to listen to reason, and yield to the repeated trials he was determined to make of civilizing them. To the prince he sent the strongest assurances of his respect and submission, acquainting him with his present circumstances, and requesting he would advise him in the means of f accomplishing his purposes without violence or bloodshed. Encouraged by these demonstrations of duty, the inca marched into the province, and was met by the Curaca with such presents as his dominions afforded. He worshipped the prince with devotion, and immediately entered upon the subject of the interview, and the necessary measures for bringing his subjects to receive the laws and religion of the Peruvians. But there was little need of arguments, the formidable appearance of the imperial army, the cloathing, arms, manners, and apparent happiness of the soldiers effected every thing. Those, who had resisted all the reasonings of their excellent prince, gave way to their fears, and yielded immediate submission to the inca, as soon as they were informed that they should receive the same encouragement and protection as the soldiers, whom they so greatly envied; accordingly, g the people were collected from the woods and mountains, houses were built for them, lands cultivated, themselves instructed in the arts, and the same plan of legislation was established here, as in the other provinces.

EVERY particular being settled, agreeable to the most sanguine expectation of the Curaca ^a Huamachacu, the prince proceeded on his conquests to the province of Cassamarca, inhabited by a bold and warlike nation, and since become famous on account of the imprisonment of the unfortunate inca Atahualpa, perfidiously put to death by the Spaniards. The inhabitants of this country having long observed the growing power of the incas, and the rapidity with which they subdued all their neighbours, were for several years preparing for war, in expectation of a visit. They fortified all the passes, and seized upon the strong situations in the country, where they raised works, and laid up great store of provisions. When they were summoned by the prince to surrender, they returned an answer filled with disdain; and expressed in such contemptuous terms, as almost forced him upon punishing them with the utmost severity. These were the first sentiments which arose in his mind on the return of his ^b heralds; but he soon gave way to others more gentle and moderate, ascribing the insolence of the enemy to their barbarity. He blocked them up closely; studiously avoided coming to action, though he was frequently drawn into bloody skirmishes; and in the space of four months, intirely subdued the fierce and haughty spirit of this free people, who consented to receive the inca's yoke upon the same terms as the other conquered nations. The soil being fruitful, and the situation pleasant, the prince determined to build a city here, and to collect into one regular society all the inhabitants, dispersed in huts over the face of the country. Here he erected a temple for the Sun, and a convent of select virgins, with other publick and religious buildings, giving the city the name of the province. Before he returned to Cuzco, ^c to render his conquests more complete, he marched to Yanyu, a rocky mountainous country, inhabited by a warlike people. Twelve thousand men being thought sufficient to execute all the purposes of this expedition, the rest of the army was disbanded, that they might not be harrassed and unnecessarily exposed to hardships. When the Yanyus received the usual summons, they entered into consultation, whether the proposals ought to be accepted, and, after warm debates, at last concluded, that the most adviseable measure would be to engage the friendship of so great a potentate as the inca, by immediate submission; notice of which resolution they sent to the prince. Their submission was graciously received by Yupanqui, who gave their curacas present of garments made of the finest cloth, and then entered the province to settle the government. Having thus fully executed his commission, he returned with ^d his nephew, the inca's son, and made a splendid triumphal entry into Cuzco, amidst the acclamations of the assembled citizens, who joyfully expressed their sense of the promising qualities of the heir apparent to the imperial wreath, and of the virtues of his uncle and instructor.

FOR the space of three years the inca, assisted by his son and brother, whom he regarded as his colleagues in the sovereignty, devoted his whole time to the strict administration of justice, the execution of the laws, the reformation of abuses, and in adorning his empire, which he beautified by a great variety of stately edifices, aqueducts, canals, and bridges, erected in the different provinces. But something still being thought wanting to the grandeur and security of his dominions, a fresh army of 30,000 men was raised to make new conquests on the side of Hunafca. The two princes were again ordered to take the field, and direct their ^e march to the valley of Chinca. On their way they received the submissions of the inhabitants of Yca and Pisco; but the Chinchese, relying upon their own valour and numbers, sent a defiance, and told the prince they would neither acknowledge the Sun for their god, nor the inca for their king; that the sea was the only deity they had reason to adore, as it supplied them with fish for their nourishment; whereas they could wish they lived more remote from the Sun, whose rays served only to scorch and torment their bodies. The prince took fire at the impiety and insolence of this answer, entered the country, and directly commenced hostilities. A sharp skirmish began in the valley; but the heat and dust were so great, that the combatants were obliged to separate. The enemy retreated to take possession of a pass, which, however, they defended with so little address, that the prince dislodged them, and ^f established his quarters in the heart of their country. This stroke of ill fortune did not disconcert or dispirit the Chinchese; they forced the imperial army again with great resolution, and used every expedient to recover their losses. Several bloody undecisive engagements were fought; and, tho' the barbarians perceived their own inferiority, yet they expected they should be able to hold out until the intense heat of the climate would force the prince to relinquish his design. Their hope was extinguished on seeing a fresh army enter the country to relieve the other, fatigued with long duty; but even this untoward circumstance could not intimidate them. The war rekindled with more than usual vigour, and the Chinchese used their utmost endeavours to strike their new enemies with a formidable notion of their valour. All their efforts were fruitless; the prince hemmed them in so closely, and took ^g such precautions, that there was no room for sallies, which, whenever they were attempted, were repelled with great slaughter. The barbarians at last found their condition was desperate. The streams of water, and all access to provision, were cut off. They could refresh them-a themselves with neither fruits nor vegetables of any kind, while they were pent up within foultry sands exposed to the scorching beams of almost a vertical sun. What increased their misery, was to behold their enemies supplied abundantly with every necessary, and sheltered by tents from the melting heat. In this situation they lost courage, their obstinacy yielded to necessity, their pride and confidence were entirely broken, and they readily submitted without trying the utmost extremity; but not before the prince sent them a message, that, unless they surrendered within the space of eight days, he would destroy the whole nation, without distinction of age, sex, or condition.

WHEN the capitulation was settled, the prince admitted the curaca to his presence, and received the submissions of that brave general with equal dignity and grace. He encouraged b him, with many kind expressions, to hope for the favour of the inca, without endeavouring to palliate the crime of which he had been guilty in opposing the will of so mighty a potentate. He made him presents of the finest cloaths, received his homage, placed magistrates in the different departments of the government, and acquitted himself equally to the satisfaction of the inca who had sent him, and of the people whom he had subdued (G). Solemn festivals were ordered upon his return, and the most splendid processions made to the temple of the Sun that ever were beheld at Cuzco.

AFTER being honoured with these marks of the royal approbation, and of the people's esteem, the prince once more took the field with a fresh army; and entering the territory of Huarca, began a bloody war with Chuquimanca, a lord of four valleys, who had rejected his c proposals, and refused submission to the inca. This general was at the head of an army of 20,000 men, his reputation was great in war, and he hoped by the valour of his forces, the situation of his country, and his own ability, to foil all the endeavours of the imperialists. On the other hand, the prince, tired with the effusion of blood, used every expedient to effect his purposes by reason and argument. Yet it was impossible to avoid skirmishes, into which his out-parties were drawn by the impetuosity of the enemy, who attacked them whenever they appeared. Eight months were consumed in this war, during which time the imperial army was three times exchanged for fresh forces; a practice first introduced in this reign, and essential to the supply of the troops, who suffered greatly by the variety of climates in which they were obliged to serve. Pedro de Cieça, a Spanish writer of some reputation, affirms, d that the reduction of this province was not effected in less than four years. Be that as it may, it is agreed on all hands, that Chuquimanca made a valiant defence, and the prince a masterly attack; cooping up the enemy gradually into a smaller compass, until at length he forced them to surrender for want of water, provision, and even of room to fight; and all this with very little bloodshed. These were the motives of this obstinate barbarian's submission, to which we may add his apprehensions of being deserted by his people; for they had already, without his consent, dispatched proposals to the imperial general, which were accordingly accepted, and Chuquimanca constrained to accede to them; upon which he obtained pardon; notwithstanding his refractoriness.

THE government of this country being established, the prince, without loss of time, proceeded to the conquest of the vallies of Pachamac, Rimac, Chancoy and Huamac, all under e obedience of a powerful prince, called Cusmanco, who assumed the title of king. The im-perialists no sooner arrived on the frontiers of these vallies, than the prince sent the customary summons, exhorting Cusmanco to submit to the inca without resistance, and thereby to avoid the unnecessary effusion of human blood. He desired no more than his acknowledging himself subordinate to the inca, renouncing his gods, his worshipping the Sun, and admitting the laws and custom of Peru into his dominions. He promised to confirm him in all his rights and privileges as a sovereign, and assured him that the homage required was rather titular than a real subjection. However moderate and reasonable these proposals might seem to the prince, they appeared in a quite different light to the Curaca, who, alarmed at the rapid conquests of f the incas, had provided for his defence. Confident that he should be able to resist all the power brought against him, he assembled his army, and, in the hearing of his soldiers, desired

(G) It is worthy remark, that the Chinche were the most valiant people who had yet acknowledged the yoke of the incas. They boasted that they had twice defeated the imperial armies, though we find no account of this in the Spanish writers. They reported also, that after resisting the whole power of the Peruvian empire for a series of years, the war was at length ended upon certain conditions mutually beneficial.
They also alledged, that before their subjection, or rather their union with the inca, they were dreaded by all their neighbours for their power and valour;
that they laid all the surrounding countries under contribution; and that they extended their fame as far as the province of Colla; or the space of 200 leagues.

Whatever truth there may be in these assertions, certain it is, that their defence was brave and obstinate, beyond what is generally found among nations enfeebled and enervated by the excessive heat of climates;
and, indeed, it is extremely remarkable, that the people living within the tropic to the south of the equi-noctial, were found, even in the days of the Spaniards, more warlike than those in the same degree to the north; a circumstance which may naturally be ascribed to some difference in the climate, since in every thing besides there appeared a perfect equality. The fact, if true, is curious, and deserves the consideration of the philosopher.

the imperial herald to acquaint his master, "That his people wanted no other ruler besides a himself; that the laws and customs, which they observed, had regulated the conduct of their forefathers; and that they found their religion so excellent, as to leave them no room for desiring an alteration; that among other gods, they adored the Pachacamac, who was the creator and governor of the universe, even of the Sun himself; that they had built a temple to this great and invisible deity, where they offered sacrifices, and the blood of their men, women, and children; that he was so awful as prevented their approaching his image to the face; they therefore paid their adorations to the hinder parts, their very priests not being able to support the splendor of those emanations which issued from his countenance. He therefore demanded, as an essential preliminary, that no change should be required in the mode of religion; and promised, if this should be granted, to relax in other b particulars." The answer was no way disagreeable to the imperialists, who, says La Vega, worshipped in their hearts the great Pachacamac; the prince, therefore, resolved to subdue this people without war, and to gain over their sovereign by gentle usage and arguments. With this view he entered the valley of Pachacamac, where he saw the enemy drawn up with a resolution to oppose his progress. Upon this he sent a message to them, desiring that before they engaged in battle, and shed the blood of their countrymen, they would confer together touching the subject of religion, in order to settle those points which occasioned difficulty in relation to the honour and worship of the gods. The prince acquainted them, that besides the Sun, whom the Peruvians adored, they also held Pachacamac in profound veneration, although they erected no temples, nor offered sa- c crifices, to a deity invisible, and above their comprehensions. Wherefore, since they worshipped the same god, and were in fact of the same sentiments, which they only expressed in a different manner, there appeared to him to be no foundation for a quarrel; on the contrary, reason dictated that they should live in the strictest bonds of friendship and amity. He therefore proposed by way of accommodation, that they should acknowledge his brother the inca for their lord and sovereign; that they would believe him a true descendant from the Sun and a real divinity, as his acts of justice and mercy daily evinced; and that they would accept of laws and regulations, the principal intention of which was to promote their own felicity. He entreated Cusmanco and his people to reflect dispassionately on his offers, and not constrain the inca to impose by force and violence what he wished d might be instilled by reason and persuasion. After some debates in the enemies councils, at last a conference was agreed to, and this produced the desired effect, through the prudence, the moderation, and the affability of the prince Yupanqui. The inhabitants of the vallies contented to abolish human sacrifices, on condition they might preserve the other rites of religion intire, and that the incas should pay all due reverence to the oracle of Rimac, and consult it occasionally. With respect to the Peruvian civil institutions, they admitted of little debate; their own excellency appeared so notoriously to the enemy, that they were no sooner explained than they were accepted. To shew Cusmanco that he was treated rather on the footing of an ally than of a vassal, he had an invitation to Cuzco, e where his curiosity was gratified with a sight of that celebrated city, and he was indulged with the honour of kissing the inca's hand. In the triumphal entry of the prince, the inca ordered that Cusmanco should take rank with the princes of the blood; a mark of respect with which he appeared to be as much delighted, as if he had obtained a victory over the imperial forces. Loaded with honours, favours, and presents, he returned to his own country, and there proclaimed that the inca was the genuine offspring of the Sun, and a real divinity, who ought to be obeyed and worshipped.

INCA PACHACUTEC, having thus extended his dominions, established his security, and spread his fame, resolved to desist from military exploits, in order to recover breath, reap the fruits of his victories, and attend to the full establishment of the civil government of f his new acquisitions. As some reformations in religion were also intended in consequence of the late agreement with the sovereign of Pachacamac, it was necessary to devote his whole attention to that important object; and indeed, so admirably did he acquit himself of this difficult undertaking, that his reputation is celebrated in Peru, not only as the greatest monarch, the wisest legislator who had ever wore the imperial wreath, but as the most devout and sanctified high-priest who had presided over their religion. Six years were employed in framing new laws respecting the civil and religious government of the empire, in building public edifices, and promoting the felicity of the people and grandeur of the state; towards the expiration of which, the inca resumed thoughts of extending his power still farther on the side of Cassamarca, by the reduction of the powerful kingdom of China. This expedition was entrusted to the young prince his son, tutored in the art of war for several years by his uncle Yupanqui, the greatest general in the empire, who now desired leave to spend the remainder of his days in tranquility, "and suffer his nephew to enjoy the honour, as he really had a great share in the conquests too partially ascribed to himself." With an g army

- a army of 30,000 men the young prince reached the frontiers of Chima, by way of the mountains; and summoning the king and people to surrender, was answered with contempt. The king sent him word, that his weapons were as keen as those of the Peruvians, his heart as bold, and his religion and laws as respectable; and that he would therefore defend them to the last drop of his blood. Irritated with this answer, the young prince, full of vigour and fire, marched directly to the valley of Pacmanca to give the enemy battle, and found them ready to engage. He attacked them in a narrow pass with the greatest impetuosity, but the resistance he met with was altogether unexpected. The enemy fought with a composed and cool valour, which he had never before seen in barbarians; insomuch that several thousands of his people were slain before he could dislodge them, although he was supported by all his forces. Sufficiently apprized of the difficulty of the attempt by this first encounter, he sent to his father for a reinforcement, and was soon joined by 20,000 chosen men, who revived the war, and enabled the prince to make a fresh attack; but just as he was preparing to fall upon the enemy, a dispute among his allies engrossed his whole attention. The Curacas of Pachacamac and Rhanabuanac had long been the inveterate enemies of the king of Chima, and now their ancient animosity was inflamed by the opposition which he made to the proposals of the inca, who had honoured them with such extraordinary marks of his regard. The princes served with their forces as auxiliaries under the young prince; and the two former imagining, that, swayed by his father's example, he shewed too much lenity to their rival, determined upon taking their revenge, and persecuting Chima with the most unrelenting fury; but they differed about the means, and vented the indignation intended against the enemy upon each other. The prince interposed; and by demonstrating to them the fair opportunity which their absurd conduct gave their enemy of destroying them both, at last reconciled them to direct their vengeance against the head of the king of Chima. They attacked him in a kind of phrenzy, fought several desperate battles, and proved greatly assisting to the inca in driving the enemy out of the valley of Pacmanca. The confederates pursued the Chimians to the valley of Huallmi, from whence likewise they were forced to retire after an obstinate dispute, in which some thousands were killed and wounded on both sides. Hence the enemy took shelter in the valley of Sancta, where it was resolved to make a stand, in confidence of the valour of the inhabitants of this district, who had always been celebrated for their martial disposition. Here such a variety of battles were fought with equality of fortune, that it became doubtful whether the prince would be able to reduce the province by force of arms. This raised the hopes of Chima, and flattered him, that a prince educated in the effeminacy and luxury of a court would not long be able to support the fatigue of so bloody a war, and that the ardor of the soldiers would give way to their tenderness and strong desire of visiting their wives and children. Full of these ideas, he refused all the offers made to him by the prince; and instead of ascribing them to his moderation, and wishes to stop the effusion of blood, accused him of cowardice. Collecting all his strength, he fell upon the imperialists suddenly with so much impetuosity as they were hardly able to repulse: notwithstanding which, his captains, who perceived things with less prejudice, became sensible that ruin was approaching with hasty strides, and therefore exhorted Chima to make his peace with the inca, which he persevered in refusing. However, when he perceived the prince was reinforced by fresh succours, that his own people were ready to desert him, and that every thing turned out contrary to expectation, he sunk into despondency, sent the most abject submissions to the prince, and promised to receive with gratitude whatever conditions he should chuse to impose. To put the best countenance upon his affairs to his people, he pretended that he was determined to continue the war, and still entertained hopes that their valour and perseverance would be attended with success; but when the inca's answer returned to his proposals, granting him peace, pardon, and friendship, on condition that he would own the sovereignty of the imperial wreath, he seemed to regard it with indifference, and would persuade his subjects that the proposals were made by the enemy, and not by him: however, he said that he would be directed by them in the answer. The captains, overjoyed to find their sovereign compliant to their wishes, and receding from those principles which must have been productive of their destruction, recommended to him, in the most earnest terms, to accept the offer of peace and friendship, as he had now already sufficiently evinced his courage, and might safely rely upon the promises of so just and generous a monarch as the inca. Accordingly the haughty Chima yielded to their entreaties, went to the imperial camp, prostrated himself before the prince, and having done homage to the inca, consented to the promulgation of the Peruvian religion and laws in his country.
- g BEFORE this war was brought to an issue, the inca Pachacutec began to sink under the weight of years; and having now made vast acquisitions to his empire, resolved to dedicate the remainder of his days to tranquility and repose. He honoured his son's glorious conduct with the most solemn and magnificent processions; and told him, that, as he now perceived his ability to support the load of government, he should die satisfied, and retire in comfort to the bosom of the Sun his parent. He lived, however, for some time longer, cultivating every virtue which could endear him to his subjects, and give beauty, grandeur, or happiness, to his empire. He planted many colonies in dry and barren countries, which he rendered fruitful by introducing streams of wholesome waters. He erected temples to the Sun, and monasteries for the select virgins, after the model of that at Cuzco. He built granaries, storehouses, and magazines, for the convenience of the people, to supply them in times of scarcity, in the most convenient situations. He reformed every abuse in the execution of the laws, and the conduct of the magistrates, which could possibly affect the liberty of his subjects, and introduced many laudable customs respecting the better regulation of moral life. He established a kind of militia in every province, in order to provide for the security of his dominions without the expence of a standing army. He founded military honours and rewards for the encouragement of merit. He enlarged and beautified the city of Cuzco, encreased the number of its inhabitants, and built a magnificent palace for the residence of the incas. In a word, after a prosperous reign of near seventy years, he yielded to the fate of mortality, and died as much honoured and esteemed as the most glorious of his predecessors, for which reason he was enrolled by the Indians among their gods (H).

No prince ever ascended the imperial throne with greater expectations than the inca Yupanqui, who, immediately after the funeral rites were performed, bound his temples with the coloured wreath. He possessed the intire confidence of the people, who esteemed him not only upon account of his excellent sire, but for his own virtues, so fully displayed in the late expedition. To render himself still more popular, he resolved exactly to tread in the footsteps of the late monarch, and began his reign, like him, with making a progress over all his dominions, and visiting the remotest provinces. The children, he used to say, should imitate the virtues of the father. He was descended from the Sun, and should, like that benevolent luminary, cherish with his beams every corner of his empire. After passing three years in this visitation, he turned his thoughts to a dangerous expedition towards the mountains of the Andes, being curious to learn something concerning the nations that inhabited the opposite side; of whom the Peruvians had as yet but a confused imperfect idea. Religion, the usual pretext for concealing the designs of ambition, was the colour also given to this project; though, in fact, the ultimate intention was to enlarge his empire, and exhibit further proofs of his valour. According to report, these countries were populous and fruitful, and this alone was sufficient inducement. It is supposed from a variety of circumstances, and particularly by the inca's crossing a great river, that this expedition was made against Paraguay, the country now possessed by the Jesuits, along the great river of Plata. Boats and floats were made for this purpose, and two years were consumed in great preparations. The inca commanded in person, and encountered such manifold difficulties, as were sufficient to overthrow the courage and constancy of a good soldier; but they made no impression on Yupanqui. At the head of a great army, he passed over deep morasses, crossed lofty mountains, and penetrated through forests almost impervious, without shrinking at the danger. While he was clambering up the steeps of the Andes, he was frequently attacked by crowds of bold savages; and forced to give battle in places where he could scarce get footing. When he fell down the river in floats and in boats, both banks were lined with troops of the natives, who discharged their weapons from either side, and kept the soldiers in a state of perpetual action, fatigue, and hazard. At last, after a variety of skirmishes, of which we have no particular account, all the nations on the banks of this great river submitted to the inca, and received the same laws as all the other conquered provinces. In token of their obedience, they sent presents of wax,

(H) There are a variety of adages ascribed to this prince, some of which we shall mention, to give the reader a more complete idea of his character.---“When the subjects cheerfully obey their prince, then is he truly honoured, and the nation happy.—It is better to be envied because one is virtuous, than to envy others who are good because you are vicious. The envious man treasures up misery to himself, just as the spider sucks poison from flowers. Drunkenness, anger, and folly, are equally pernicious, and differ only in the degree of their permanency. He who kills another without legal authority, passes sentence on himself. Adulterers are thieves, and despoilers of man's honour, the most precious of all their possessions, and therefore ought to be treated with the utmost rigour. A noble spirit is best tried in adversity. Impatience is the character of a little soul, and narrow education. Obedient subjects ought to be treated with indulgence and clemency; factious, turbulent spirits, with severity and rigour. Corrupt judges are the worst vermin generated in the fores of society. Legislators and magistrates should be especially cautious not to transgress those laws which they form and direct. The man who is not master of himself, is but little qualified to govern a kingdom. He who presumes to number the stars is a fool; and the man who pretends to measure the power of the great Pachacamac, worthy of being derided. The physician or herbalist, who knows the name only of plants, and is ignorant of their virtues, is an empiric.” Let the sovereign and legislator remember this (I).

a honey, fruits, and parrots, to the inca, and suffered him to appoint magistrates and officers to preside over the execution of the new laws.

After reducing all the nations called by the general name of Chuncu, he proceeded to the province of Musa, called Moxos by the Spaniards, inhabited by a numerous, bold, and warlike tribe. When he arrived on the frontiers of this country, his army was reduced to a very inconsiderable number; the inca, therefore, had recourse to arguments and persuasions, acquainting the people, that he came to instruct them in points of religion and morality of the utmost importance to society. Observing that the Musas gave earnest attention to his religious doctrines, he ventured to promulgate the Peruvian laws, which proved so rational and agreeable to the barbarians, that they embraced them without scruple, and entered into a perpetual alliance with the inca. La Vega reports that some monuments of this expedition might be seen in his time; yet, after all, it is probable, that the inca never descended lower down the river than the province of Guara, from whence, again crossing the river, he proceeded to Tucuman, and then to Chili (I).

Previous to any new undertakings, he returned to Cuzco, and raised a fresh army, more numerous than the former, and filled with officers of the blood royal, who desired leave to attend their sovereign. The inca then advanced to the large province of Chiribuna, situated to the eastward of Charcas, the reduction of which he thought necessary to secure his retreat. As this country was intirely unknown, it was thought adviseable to dispatch emissaries to gain such information, as might facilitate the project, and direct the route of the army. Their report was unfavourable to the people, whom they stigmatized as the most bloody and cruel of all barbarians, perhaps with a design to cool the inca's ardor; but this served only to animate him to the enterprize. He turned round to his courtiers, and said, "Now it is a duty incumbent on me to reduce those horrible savages to the laws of reason and civility." However, as the object was not deemed worthy of his presence, he entrusted the army to certain princes of the blood, who began their march at the head of ten thousand men; and soon found that the report given of the difficulty of the roads, was not exaggerated. Having passed over mountains, bogs, and fens, the soldiers were reduced to such extremity, that all must have inevitably perished, but for the seasonable relief sent by the inca; after all, they were recalled without accomplishing the end of the expedition, the natives taking refuge in places altogether inaccessible.

The misfortunes consequent on this attempt did not prevail upon the inca to lay aside the design of reducing the kingdom of Chili. Increase of dominion was a fundamental maxim of the Peruvian government, one reason of which was that, without an army, half the tribute paid by the provinces, in cloths, and warlike stores, would be useless to the state, unless consumed in this manner. This was the most arduous enterprize, ever attempted by the incas, and therefore every possible precaution was taken. The inca laid the matter before his council, consulted them in the means of conducting the war, and, having concerted every particular, he set out with a numerous army to Atacoma, the remotest province on that side of his empire, which was separated by vast deserts from Chili. From this place he sent persons in whom he had confidence, to examine all the difficulties of the march; and indeed, the affair was deemed of such consequence, that it was committed solely to the princes royal. Magazines were likewise to be formed in the most convenient places, and nothing was neglected that could contribute to the security of the army, or the success of the expedition. These discoverers having penetrated as far as Copayapac, and made the most accurate observations in their power, returned with an account to the inca, who detached a select corps of ten thousand men to pursue the route they directed, and reinforced this body with an equal party sent a few weeks after. On the arrival of the troops on the frontiers of Copayapac, under the conduct of Sinchirocha, an officer descended from the blood of the incas, the accustomed summons was sent to the natives, together with such menaces, as threw them into universal consternation. But when it was perceived how small the army was, which the inca detached to enforce those threats, the enemy took courage, assembled, and began hostilities. However, before any decisive engagement was fought, the reinforcement arrived, which struck the enemy with dismay, and determined them to submit to whatever terms the Peruvian general thought fit to propose.

A path being now open to farther conquests, the inca prepared a more powerful force, and immediately augmented the army to the number of thirty thousand men. With this armament Sinchiroca advanced, and gained footing in the valley of Chili, as la Vega terms it, after an obstinate resistance, of which we have no account; whence we may infer that the narrative would redound but little to the honour of the Peruvians, who never failed to transmit an accurate relation to posterity of all those expeditions, in which their valour appeared conspicuous and fortunate. We are only told of one battle, in which the Chilians are allowed to have behaved with equal courage and conduct. After the two armies had rested for some days within sight of each other, debating the conditions of a peace, they both suddenly broke off, and prepared for a decisive action. The Chilian army did not exceed eighteen or twenty thousand men, but they maintained the engagement for a whole day with such astonishing resolution, that when night separated the combatants, victory remained undecided. Next day the battle was renewed, and raged till night with the same fury and fortune. Unconquered and unspent, both sides returned to the horrid scene, the fourth, fifth, and sixth days, and, at last drew off the field of battle without yielding an inch to the opposite party. The carnage was dreadful, the fields were so covered with dead bodies, and the atmosphere so impregnated with putrid vapours, that the combatants were compelled to leave off fighting before they were tired with slaughter. Both proclaimed victory, but neither possessed the field, nor ventured to pursue the enemy; so that we may justly infer, that now for the first time, the power of the incas was fairly foiled in a pitched battle, by a people whom they reputed barbarous. How the war with the Chilians terminated is not known; Yupanqui is reported to have persevered obstinately in his purpose, and to have enlarged his empire to the extent of a thousand leagues from North to South. He might, indeed, possibly have subdued some of the provinces of Chili, and received the submission of certain nations of that great kingdom; but that he ever conquered the whole is extremely problematical.

(I) We must observe that the names of provinces have been so altered by the Spaniards, and the route of the inca's armies so imperfectly described by all the Spanish writers, that it is extremely difficult to fix the precise limits of the empire, and absolutely necessary to call in the assistance of conjecture occasionally.

WHILE his generals were carrying the reputation of his arms to the remotest countries, Yupanqui was beautifying his empire by a variety of stately edifices, especially temples and structures of piety and humanity. A large hospital was erected for the reception of the aged, blind, and lame, an institution scarce ever before seen in a barbarous country, immersed in the grossest ignorance, which conveys to us an amiable idea of the humanity and feeling of the people. In these employments, the inca spent his life in great tranquillity for several years, at the expiration of which he was seized with a malady that proved fatal. When he observed the hand of death upon him, he called his sons to his bed-side, and strictly recommended to them the observance of the laws and religion of their country. Above all he charged his eldest son, who was to succeed him in the throne, duly to administer justice to his subjects in the most equal scales, without which all his other virtues would serve only to gild oppression and give splendor to tyranny. Thus died Yupanqui, full of years, glory, and triumphs, having enlarged his empire beyond the conquests made by any of his predecessors, and obtained the well merited reputation of a magnanimous, just, and sage monarch. The fortress of Cuzco remained for many ages a monument of his power and magnificence.

TUPAC YUPANQUI ascended his paternal throne as soon as the customary rites were performed to the last remains of the deceased inca, his father. It was probably some time after his accession that he received the sur-name of Tupac, a word signifying splendor or brightness, and importing the greatness of his exploits. It was an established custom for the new monarch to shew himself to all his people by visiting every part of the empire; and Yupanqui did not omit a practice founded upon true policy, and equally beneficial to the king and kingdom. Four years were spent in this progress, in the course of which he displayed so many virtues, as intirely recommended him to the affections and esteem of his people; though he now resolved to confirm their favourable sentiments by some farther proofs of his own merit. Under the specious pretext of civilizing savage nations, and promoting the interest of those unhappy Indians, immersed in the grossest idolatry, and ignorance, the inca planned an expedition on the side of Cassamarca, and raised an army of forty thousand men for this occasion, with which he immediately invaded the province of Chucupuya, or the country of warriors, as this word is translated by Blas Valerius. It lies eastward of Cassamarca, the roads to it were difficult, the situation mountainous and craggy, and the people above forty thousand in number, capable of bearing arms; whence we may judge of the hazard of the enterprize. This nation was distinguished from all the other barbarous tribes, by the peculiar custom of wearing a sling round their heads, as an emblem of their valour, and warlike disposition. The sling was their principal weapon in war, as it had been that of their ancestors, the Mayarkins. Before the inca entered upon the conquest of this people, he thought it necessary to subdue the Huacrachucans, part of whose country lay in his way. The Huacrachucans, were a fierce people, who, for distinction, bound their heads round with black wool, stitched with flies, and the point of a stag-horn before; whence they derived the name, which signifies horned-cap. The natives appeared in defence of their country, in full confidence that it was impregnable. They blocked up all the passes, and were dislodged with great difficulty and considerable slaughter. Having gained footing in their

a their territories, the inca thought proper to save the effusion of blood, if possible, and accordingly sent a summons to the natives, and the most soothing professions of friendship and regard. He gave them assurances, that the ultimate design of his expedition was to promote their happiness, and instruct them in arts essential to their well-being; at the same time, to prevent their ascribing his lenity to fear, he denounced the most signal vengeance, in case they rejected propolis so moderate, and so evidently calculated for their welfare: but while the enemy were deliberating upon the terms offered, he divided his army, and renewed the assault on different quarters, with so much vigour, that he gained several very important posts, and terrified the enemy into submission.

b The reduction of Huacrachuc took up the whole summer, and because the rainy season was now approaching, the inca resolved to quarter his troops on the frontiers, and re-inforce his army with twenty thousand men before the ensuing campaign. The cessation of hostilities proved very advantageous to his new subjects, who were all this time learning the art of agriculture, and informing themselves in the Peruvian laws and religious worship, from the officers and soldiers, nor did the inca himself refuse his assistance; the chiefs he taught in person, and after they were fully instructed, he appointed them to govern certain districts, and propagate their own knowledge among the inhabitants. The season for action being arrived, the inca Tupac drew out his army into the field, and marched directly for the province of Cbuchupuy, dispatching a herald before him, with offers of peace and friendship, which were rejected. Both sides prepared for war, soon began hostilities, and fought with such resolution and courage, as occasioned great slaughter. The Cbuchupuyans, aware of the ambition and growing power of the incas, expected this invasion, and had made preparations for two years past. Their country was of considerable extent; it was strong by nature, and they improved their situation with all the advantages which their skill in the art of war dictated. All the passes were strongly fortified, and several camps formed in inaccessible situations, surrounded with deep intrenchments, or strong walls, and well supplied with provision. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the inca pursued his design with so much perseverance, that the enemy were driven from many of their strong holds, though with great loss to the imperialists. The inca stormed one camp on the top of a high hill, skirted by craggy rocks twenty feet in height, and accessible only by steps of stairs, which the Indians had cut out for their own conveniency. Here great numbers of old men, women, and children, were taken prisoners, and treated with all possible humanity and kindness by the inca, in hopes by this usage to impress the enemy with a favourable opinion of his disposition and government. Advancing after this fortunate incident, to a breach on the snowy mountain, called the dangerous Gap, he detached three hundred men to examine the passage, which party was buried in a prodigious mass of snow that tumbled down from the mountain; not an individual having escaped to report the circumstances of the calamity. When a thaw came on, the bodies were discovered, and the inca then ventured to proceed on his march, after the enemy had flattered themselves there was a stop put to his career. Perceiving the very elements were favourable to him, as the barbarians judged by the thaws happening at an unusual season of the year; they gave up all for lost, and submitted without further resistance to the inca's pleasure.

c HAVING settled the necessary ministers and officers for the government of the country, inca Tupac proceeded to the reduction of another people, called Cassa Marquilla, who defended themselves within their rocks and fastnesses; and who followed the example of the Cbuchupuyans, after having tried their fortune in divers unsuccessful engagements. Thence he marched against the people called Passamarcas, from a large excrescence on their necks, like the inhabitants of the Alps, and from causes nearly similar. These, with several other nations, he subdued with little difficulty, as they lay contiguous to each other, and were terrified with the report of the misfortunes of their neighbours, and the irresistible power of the inca; upon which he returned to his own dominions to repose himself during the wet season, and make preparations for extending his conquests the ensuing campaign. An army of forty thousand men was raised, and ready to take the field early in the spring, with which the inca proposed marching into the large province of Huancapampa, possessed by different tribes and nations, who had no kind of intercourse, nor resemblance in manners, except that all were completely savage. All were in a state of hostility with each other, which rendered them an easy prey to the inca; but, though he found it easy to gain possession of the country, he encountered many difficulties in taming and civilizing the inhabitants.

d MATTERS being settled here to his satisfaction, he advanced to the reduction of the great provinces of Cassa, Ayahuaca, and Callua, all the inhabitants of which resolved to defend their liberties; they raised an army, and in a pitched battle, slew eight thousand of the imperialists, though they were forced to yield the field of action. The inca, enraged with his loss, pursued them in their retreat, and destroyed the country with all the horrors of war.

war, which they supported with great patience, and equality of mind, preferring the most a cruel persecution and misery to the loss of freedom. They retired from post to post, disputed each with unparalleled obstinacy, and would have persevered to the utter extirpation of the whole people, had not the inca's persuasion, rather than his power, at length, prevailed, by convincing them, that all the nations, who now acknowledged his sovereignty, enjoyed an equal degree of liberty with his subjects, and much more rational happiness.
With these arguments they were at length induced to submit, or rather to put an end to the war; for, after all the bloodshed, it was rather a treaty of peace they made with the inca, than an acknowledgement of subjection.

THE activity of these last campaigns now heartily disposed the inca to taste the sweets of b tranquillity. He returned therefore eagerly to Cuzco, shut himself up for some time in his palace to relax his mind and body, fatigued with the cares of war, and then applied his whole attention to the pacific arts, and particularly to building, for which he had an excellent taste. Some of the best constructed aqueducts, granaries, fortresses, and temples, which the Spaniards found in Peru were the works of this monarch, equally magnificent in peace, and formidable in war. The fine arts, imperfectly as they were then understood, he cherished and advanced; but he laboured particularly to bring to a conclusion that noble monument of imperial grandeur, the citadel of Cuzco, the plan of which had been projected, and the foundation laid, by his father. After he had thus indulged himself for some years in the exercise of his taste and genius, he resumed the thoughts of further c conquests to the Northward, and raised an army for the reduction of the vast province of Huanuca, inhabited by a variety of nations, who lay scattered in the fields and mountains, without intercourse with each other, or any regular plan of society among themselves.
They had some fortifications erected on the tops of the highest mountains, in which they took refuge against the fury of their enemies, whenever they had the misfortune of being defeated in the field; but now they neither hazarded fighting, nor chose to rely upon the strength of their retreats. Hearing of the clemency of the inca, and the excellency of the Peruvian constitution, they quietly submitted, and without a single blow, became peaceable subjects to the empire.

THE next enterprize was against Cannari, a province so formidable that the inca thought d it adviseable to augment his army to sixty thousand men. The people were fierce and warlike; they distinguished themselves by an extraordinary custom of binding the heads of their children with fillets, so as to mould them into particular forms, which gave a very strange and peculiar appearance when they grew up. The forehead was generally of an uncommon and hideous breadth, the nose extremely flat, and the neck distorted, so that the whole nation might be deemed ugly and deformed to a high degree. The Cannarians adored the Moon as the supreme deity; but they likewise worshipped a great variety of sublunary deities, such as trees, pebbles, and especially jasper, because this kind of stone was rare in their country. It was conceived these barbarians would have made great resistance to the inca, but the event proved otherwise. The imperial army no sooner appeared on their frontiers, than they sent their submissions, and voluntarily received the Peruvian laws and e religion, of which they had heard the strongest commendations. This province was among the most valuable conquests made by the incas, as it abounded with the richest metals, precious stones, and the most valuable commodities, and was, for that reason, cherished in a particular manner by the sovereigns, who adorned it with publick edifices of the finest structure, which their knowledge in architecture could achieve. Pedro de Cieca's words are; "In short, whatever I can utter or express of the riches with which the incas adorned these buildings (of Canuari) will fall short of the true value;" and a little farther he alleges, from the report of the Indians, "that the greater part of the stones used in those those buildings was brought from the great city of Cuzco, by command of the inca Hu-ana Capac, by force of men, who drew them with cords and cables, though of an immense f weight and size." Hence we see, that it was in the succeeding reign particularly, that the Cannarians began to experience the favours of the incas, and to be distinguished from the natives of the other provinces.

SUCCESS served only to whet the inca Tupac's ambition; for he scarcely reposed himself after this conquest, but he prepared to reduce all the nations who extend themselves quite to the frontiers of Quito, and opened the way to the reduction of that important province to his successor, though he was foiled in all the attempts he made to bring the haughty monarch of Quito to terms of friendship. Forty thousand men were sent in this reign to reduce the province; they encountered the enemy in divers bloody engagements, but could never establish a footing in the country in the life-time of this inca. Whether Tupac commanded in per- g son we know not; certain only it is, that the glory of this acquisition to the empire was left for his successor; and that Tupac died with the mortification of seeing his designs frustrated
by a by a barbarian, and that his power was not irresistible, as he had been taught to imagine from a flow of good fortune^a (K).

HUAYNA CAPAC, who succeeded to the imperial throne upon his father's demise, had been employed for the two last years in a military capacity, in which he exhibited extraordinary proofs of valour and ability. Hence he received the name of Huana Capac, which implies a variety of heroic qualities. When he was sent to conduct the expedition against Quito, he was only in the twentieth year of his age, and knew nothing more of war than what he had been taught in the closet by his masters; yet did he appear in the field to all the advantage of an old experienced general. In the midst of the most furious hostilities, he never so far lost his temper as to omit any opportunity of effecting his purposes by treaty and negotiation. To his humanity, rather than to want of vigour, the tediousness of the war is ascribed. The people of Quito were fierce, obstinate, and warlike; they fought a great variety of bloody battles, but were always defeated, though the victory never proved decisive on account of the prince's moderation, who would not suffer the enemy to be pursued, imagining that so many unfortunate trials of their strength would certainly bring them to a sense of their own inferiority, and the necessity of yielding to a power they could not resist. La Vega speaks as if most of these battles had been fought in the life-time of Tupac Yupanqui; but there is reason to believe, that the war never went on with such alacrity as after the accession of Huana Capac, at least that the kingdom of Quito was not conquered before the present reign. The new inca no sooner perceived himself at the head of the empire, than he determined to shew himself worthy of sovereignty by enlarging his dominions. Accordingly he brought a prodigious army into the field, hemmed in the enemy on every side, gained possession of several of their provinces, and reduced them to such extremity, that the king of Quito, chagrined with disappointment, harrassed with fatigue and care, deprived of great part of his territories, and unable to defend the remainder, fell sick, and died, as is supposed, of a broken heart. This event was of the utmost consequence to the inca; the enemy's generals fell into confusion; having no head, they disputed about the command, and became successively a prey to the imperialists. Thus Quito was at last subdued, after a vigorous war that continued for the space of three years since the accession of this prince, and more than two during the reign of his father.

d Not long after his return to Cuzco, the inca began a progress through his dominions, in imitation of that laudable custom established by his predecessors; and he was every-where received with the greatest joy and satisfaction, the curacas coming forth to meet him, and the people strewing the roads with flowers, erecting triumphal arches adorned with roses and odoriferous herbs, and filling the air with their shouts and acclamations. Acosta alledges, "That he was adored by his people in his life-time as a god, and with that divine worship which was never before used towards his ancestors, his antient men, still living, do remember, and relate of their own knowledge." He was twice married before he came to the crown; and while he was visiting the provinces, the news arrived that his second queen was happily delivered of a son, which caused his return to Cuzco to celebrate the joyful occasion by festivals.

e It was now he commemorated this event by that extraordinary gold chain of which the Indians relate such miracles, and after which the Spaniards made such diligent but fruitless search. Garcilasso acquaints us, that the following circumstance gave rise to the chain: All festivals were celebrated by dances, which differed in the mode in different provinces. There was a royal dance in which the incas themselves condescended to take part, as it was grave

^a Acost. l. 6. c. 29.

(K) For the two last years of his reign, according to Garcilasso, the inca Tupac Yupanqui desisted wholly from wars, and employed himself in the civil government of his empire, visiting the provinces, and cherishing the arts, to the unspeakable joy of his subjects, who flourished and grew happy under the benign influence of his presence. Several sayings are reported of Tupac Yupanqui, some of which seem to prove that he entertained a faint idea of the true God from the light of reason. "Many think, says he, that the sun lives, and is the creator of all things: now it is necessary, that whatever creates all things, should be assisting in the operation of creating those things; but we know of many things created in the absence of the sun; therefore the sun is not the maker of all things." This syllogism favours too much of the scholastic pedantry of the Spaniards to be entirely credited of the illiterate inca, whom we must allow to be a tolerable logician, if he argued in the manner alledged by Blas Valera. Another of his sayings was, "That avarice was a vice the least becoming a prince of all others, as it rendered him incapable of governing himself, who was born to rule over thousands, and diverted all his attention from the public welfare to his own private interest." "Avarice, said the inca, corrupts the mind, renders it incapable of counsel, and checks every great, manly, and generous sentiment." He used to repeat the saying of inca Roca, "That the sciences should be taught only to the nobility. Knowledge made the vulgar proud, insolent, conceited, lazy, and unfit for the professions suitable to their sphere of life, while they qualified the nobility for the government of the state. Politics, especially, would he say, is a science with which the vulgar should not be permitted to meddle." (1.)

and solemn, consisting only in a sort of decent gesticulation, and taking hands in circles. From this manner of clasping and linking hands, the inca conceived the idea of the gold chain, thinking it more agreeable to the royal dignity to have these dancers joined together by a chain rather than by hands, especially as custom rendered it a kind of sacrilege to touch the skin of the monarch. As these dances were performed in the great square of Cuzco, the inca ordered the chain to be made of sufficient length to surround the square; so that, according to the computation of Garcilasso, it must have been 700 feet in length, and so heavy, if we may credit the accomptant-general, Augustine Carate, that being fastened to the ears of 200 Indians, they could scarcely raise it from the ground. After all the search made by the Spaniards, this chain could never be found, it having been buried with other treasures carefully in the bowels of the earth; insomuch that, if the Indians did not speak of it as a thing beyond all doubt, there might appear good reason to question its existence. Hence we may perceive why the inca's new-born son and unfortunate successor was surnamed, and generally known by the name of, Huascar, that word signifying a chain in the language of Peru. It was by a daughter of the deceased king of Quito, that Huayna Capac soon after had another son, called Atahualpa, who, as we have seen, disputed the imperial crown with the legitimate heir Huascar, at the time of Pizarro's arrival.

THE inca having sufficiently relaxed his mind with these diversions and amusements, raised a great army, and descended to the plains on the sea-coast to the valley of Chima, the utmost boundary of the conquests of his forefathers. From thence he sent heralds to the bordering nations, requiring their submission, and met with no resistance, because they had for some time carried on a regular intercourse with his subjects, and received from them a very favourable opinion of the Peruvian government. All the vallies acknowledged his sovereignty, and gladly received all such laws and ordonnances as he was pleased to establish; after which the inca went to the kingdom of Quito to adorn that country with stately buildings, and render it fertile and commodious by beautiful aqueducts and canals. Having finished these works, he again descended to the coast with an army of 50,000 men, and encamping in the valley of Sullama, sent a herald with offers of peace and friendship to the inhabitants of Tumpez, on condition they would acknowledge his sovereignty, embrace his religion and laws, and own themselves his subjects. They were a luxurious, effeminate, and cruel people who spent their whole time in feasting, diversions, and the society of buffoons and parasites. The terror of an hostile army soon destroyed their mirth; but, instead of standing on their defence, they yielded themselves up, with the most implicit and servile obedience, to the inca's pleasure, who immediately practised every possible method to reform their corrupt manners, and render them sober and industrious. To keep the rod over them, he built a fortress in the country, and garrisoned it strongly; a temple also was erected to the Sun, in order to draw them from their abominable human sacrifices, and the worship of tigers and lions, or rather fierce animals more resembling a wolf, which the Americans generally called a lion.

HE was now at leisure to punish the inhabitants of Huancavillca, and those nations situated about Puerto Veijo, as it afterwards called by the Spaniards, for having in the late reign massacred the governors set over them, and entered into a kind of rebellion. Huayna Capac gave orders that the perpetrators of the murder should immediately be sent to court to take their trials; and as he was then at the head of an army, the criminals were obliged to obey, although they knew they merited death, and did not doubt but they should feel the full weight of the inca's displeasure. When the criminals approached his person, they fell upon their faces with the utmost humility, in which posture they remained while one of the inca's officers represented to them the heinousness of their offence, the reverence due to the royal officers, and the obligation which they owed to the inca, for having brought them to a rational and social method of living. He set forth their ingratitude as a crime of too deep a stain to be washed away by the blood of their whole nation: however, he said, the inca was desirous, out of his great mercy and humanity, to pardon the common people, whose fault he ascribed to their ignorance, and to rest satisfied with decimating the authors and contrivers of the conspiracy. Yet there was one condition of his lenity upon which he must insist, that the memory of their offence might be transmitted to future ages, as a lesson of obedience; namely, that the curacas and principal personages of the nation should have two fore-teeth drawn from each of the jaws; and that the custom should remain to the latest posterity, as a reproach for their perfidy and breach of promise.

WHEN this act of justice was finished, the inca passed to the valley of Rimac to consult the famous oracle of that country, agreeable to the treaty formed with the Incas; and having received his answer, which was filled with ambiguities and the most fulsome adulation, he dispatched the usual alternative of peace or war to the inhabitants of the island of Puna in Peru. Tumpalla, a prince of a haughty spirit, was at this time curaca of the island. He was vicious a vicious in his manners, and extremely oppressive and tyrannical in his conduct, by which means he raised up a great number of enemies among his subjects. When he received the inca's message, it was with such an air of disdain as plainly evinced his intention to stand on his defence; but this resolution he could not execute on account of the strong factions among his people, which now broke out with redoubled animosity. However, he assembled his principal subjects, and spoke to them in the following words, if we may credit the Spanish writers: "Here now appears at the gates of our houses a certain tyrant, who threatens to rob us of all our houses, estates, and property, and to extirpate our nation, if we refuse to receive him for our lord and master. In case we admit him, we must renounce our antient liberty, our command and authority over other nations, and those rites and institutions which have descended to us through many ages from our ancestors. Nor is this all; for this foreigner, not reposing any confidence in our promises, will compel us to labour in erecting fortresses to serve as scourges over us, and the sure means of never regaining our freedom. He will seize on the best of our possessions, and despoil us of our wives and children, and the most beautiful of our daughters. What is still more grievous, he will trample upon our laws and antient customs, impose new bonds upon us, make us worship strange gods, and abolish our own religion. In short, he will oblige us to live according to his will and pleasure, which, to a noble mind, is the most irksome of all servitudes. In these circumstances, I leave it to you to consider, whether we had not better heal up all our divisions, unite in one common cause, and die in the defence of liberty, c than tamely to deliver up ourselves as slaves to the capricious will of a tyrant."

This speech produced warm debates; a few were drawn over by the spirited manner of the inca; but the majority was of opinion, that it was better to resign themselves to the government of so great, prudent, and merciful, a prince as the inca, than to remain the enslaved vassals of a petty tyrant. At last, it was agreed on all hands, that the present situation of affairs required temporary compliance, until a proper opportunity should occur for recovering and establishing their freedom. Upon this resolution, Tumpalla returned a mild answer to the messenger, who had been detained to know the sentiments of the council. He also sent an embassy with presents, and an offer of all his dominions; beseeching the inca to favour the island with his presence, which all the inhabitants would d consider as the greatest honour and felicity. The inca accepted the invitation: having no suspicion of treachery, he passed over to the island with a part of his forces; and while he was engaged in settling the police, furnished the perfidious natives with an opportunity of massacring a great number of his people, the bodies of whom they threw into the sea. Several princes of the blood perished in this unfortunate affair, which so deeply affected the inca, that he expressed his sorrow externally, and clothed himself in a kind of grey wool-len cloth, which was never done except upon very signal calamities. But his grief soon gave way to indignation and sentiments of revenge. He assembled his army with the utmost expedition, and with great facility subjected the inhabitants, utterly devoid of counsel, policy, and military skill. Some writers speak of this event as if it happened on the main e land, the islanders having no share in the plot; but, from circumstances, it is probable that Tumpalla was the author of the conspiracy, and that he was assisted in this treacherous design by the bulk of his subjects both on the island and continent.

As soon as the reduction of the island was accomplished, the inca gave orders that all the captains, soldiers, and officers, engaged in the revolt, should be brought before his tribunal, which was placed in the midst of a circle of his armed soldiers. From these the authors of the conspiracy were selected, bound, and severely reprimanded by one of the imperial officers; after which they were ordered to prepare themselves for a punishment adequate to their offence. The sentence passed on them was, that they should suffer the same kind of death to which they had cruelly, wantonly, and perfidiously, exposed the soldiers of the inca. Accordingly, some of them were thrown into the sea, with great weights to sink them to the bottom; others were pierced through with lances, and fixed up in the most conspicuous places as an example; a few were quartered and exposed to public view in the same manner, and great numbers were hanged upon trees and gibbets. In this manner was justice executed upon no less than a thousand of the wretched inhabitants, which melancholy story afterwards became the subject of those songs which were repeated to the Spaniards. A fortress was erected at Tumpez, and the island put under the jurisdiction of the governor of the neighbouring provinces of the continent; after which he attempted to lay a magnificent bridge over the river Guayquille, that was never finished.

On his return to Cuzco, he was met by the Curacas of all the provinces in his way, and presented with the richest gifts which their country afforded, in token of their vassalage and esteem. When he entered his capital, his first care was to visit the citadel which was almost finished, to his great satisfaction; and then he sent proper persons to enquire into the state of the more remote provinces, particularly Charcas and Chili, sending rich presents to a the governors, to be distributed among the chiefs and leading inhabitants. While he was thus employed, news was brought, that the inhabitants of the province of Chu- chupuayas seeing him embarrassed with the conquest of Tumbez, and revolt of Puna, had rebelled and massacred all the imperial officers and magistrates within their jurisdiction.

 When this advice arrived, the inca was ordering his army to the sea-coasts; but he now altered the destination of his troops, appointing them to march directly to Chuchupuyas, and punish the rebels to the extremity of rigorous justice. Before the army entered their country, he sent notice to the inhabitants, that if they would now lay down their arms, and return to their obedience, they should still be entitled to pardon; but they rejected the proposal with the most brutal contempt, relying upon the natural strength and mountainous b situation of their country. This heightened the inca's indignation; he exerted his utmost diligence in assembling forces, and laying bridges over rivers, and, when he had prepared every thing necessary to the accomplishment of his designs, he set out in full march for the rebellious province, arrived on the banks of a broad river, that separated him from the enemy, linked all his boats together so as to form a flying bridge, marched down with the utmost regularity, and, by his formidable appearance, struck the enemy with dread and confusion at the consequences of their own rashness and cruelty. Sensible they could expect no mercy, after such acts of barbarity, which they aggravated by the insolence of the answer returned to his message, they demolished their huts, and retired with their families to the most inaccessible mountains, to avoid the resentment of a prince whom they could not with- c stand in the open field. However, great numbers of the old and infirm remained behind, either because they were unable to undergo the fatigue of scaling mountains, or that they had greater confidence in the generosity of the inca. To screen themselves from punishment they addressed a lady, who had formerly been concubine to the late inca, imploring her intercession with Huayna Capac, and beseeching with tears, that she would endeavour to appease the inca's just resentment. Wrought upon by their intreaties, she undertook the task, and set out to meet the army, accompanied by women of all degrees and ages, unattended by a single person of the other sex. The novelty of the appearance of such a croud of females struck the monarch, and he made little difficulty about admitting the petitioners into his presence. Chuchupuya, for that was the name of the principal lady, immediately threw herself at d his feet, and spoke to the following effect: "Where is it, sire, you are going? Do you not reflect, that full of rage and indignation, you are about to destroy that very province, which your pious father was at the trouble of gaining and annexing to his empire? Consider, I beseech you, that you are proceeding directly against the nature of that clemency, upon which you have founded the most durable part of your reputation; that you are going to execute those desolations in your anger, which you will be sorry for in your cooler moments. Remember how many more nations have been rendered faithful and obedient to your crown by mercy, than by the sword. Exercise a virtue now, that never can be displayed more seasonably, and which will eternize your memory. There is no merit in pardoning slight faults, because they scarce deserve punishment; let it be your glory e to forgive the worst of all crimes, treason and murder, for the sake of a whole nation.
 Your father, great sire, reduced this people, which, though undeserving of such a protector, are nevertheless your subjects; and therefore let not your fury so far transport you in the punishment and the effusion of human blood, as to forget that you are yourself a man, and consequently subject to frailty, although the offspring of the brightest of all the heavenly bodies. Eclipse not the splendor of a character, worthy of so divine an origin, by suffering yourself to be betrayed into the weaknesses of mortality. Let me repeat it, that the greater the crime is which you pardon, the higher must your piety be exalted, and the splendor of that virtue, derived from your ancestors, shine with the more distin- f guished lustre. My earnest prayer therefore is, that you would vouchsafe upon your own account, as well as theirs, to receive this people once more under your protection; that you would vent your anger first against me, and let my blood atone for the crimes of my deluded and infatuated countrymen." When she had finished her discourse all the women in her train lifted up their voices, and cried out: "O! the child of the Sun, thou refuge of the distressed, have pity on us, and pardon our parents, husbands, brothers, and children." The inca was moved with their piteous lamentations; for a while he was silent, but, recovering himself, he raised the matron from the ground, and exclaimed in a transport of tender passion, "Well dost thou deserve the name of Mamencu, or mother of the people, who art so provident, not only of their good, but of my honour. I heartily thank you for the salutary advice you have administered. If I have given way to my rage, g I might very possibly have repented to-morrow of the rashness of this day's conduct. Well hast thou preserved the duty of a mother towards thy people, in redeeming their lives from destruc-

- a destruction: for which, as you have pleaded so successfully, you shall be gratified with the accomplishment of any wish in my power. Return with the tidings of peace and happiness to the people, and consider if there be any thing else you would require of me. Pardon the criminals when you please, and offer them whatever grace or favour you think proper; nothing shall be denied that you promise; and, for the better assurance of this my sincerity, take with you these four incas, my brothers, who are your sons, without any other attendants than their own menial servants, to whom I shall give only this commission; namely, that they will settle the people under a good and wholesome government." Convinced by this act of lenity of their error, the Chuchupuyas ever afterwards became faithful and loyal subjects to the inca, of whose good understanding we may sufficiently judge from
- b the manner in which he received the admonitions of the matron Chuchupuya.

THE rebels being thus pardoned, Huayna Capac resumed his former intention of sending troops to the sea-coast, in the way to which lay the province of Manta, which had scarcely as yet acknowledged the dominion of the inca. In the metropolis of this province, the inhabitants worshipped an emerald of extraordinary size, which they kept in a place consecrated for the adoration of this unfeeling deity; and, in the surrounding country, the same degree of reverence was shewn for wild beasts and reptiles, from the largest snake to the most diminutive maggot (L). They were also strongly addicted to the abominably unnatural passion of sodomy. They slayed their prisoners; and marriages were contracted on condition that the parents and friends of the bridegroom should enjoy the bride before the husband for a trial of her virtues. The inca determining to abolish those horrible customs, sent them a severe summons immediately to surrender, and receive the Peruvian religion and laws, or prepare to expect the worst effects of his vengeance; and they, from conviction of their inability to resist, cheerfully submitted to whatever he thought fit to propose. To the conquest of the Mantase was added the reduction of several other adjacent nations, equally barbarous, with whose uncouth names we think it unnecessary to trouble the reader's memory; as they were distinguished only by different kinds of savage ferocity, and yielded without resistance to the menaces of Huayna Capac. It is reported of this prince, that when he observed the barrenness of the country, and the bestiality of the people, he cried out—"Come, let us be gone; neither this country nor its inhabitants deserve the honour of our dominion." However, he bestowed the utmost pains to bring them to a more regular and civilized way of life, and had the satisfaction to find that his labour was not altogether fruitless, although upon the arrival of the Spaniards, the province of Manta was far inferior to the other provinces, in the arts of life, and in civil polity. If we may credit the Spanish writers, La Vega, Cieca, Carate, and Acosta, this country was formerly inhabited by men of a gigantic stature; and La Vega expressly affirms, that he has seen human bones of prodigious and indeed incredible size, dug up in the neighbourhood of Puerto Viejo, where the giants were said to have put to shore in junks, and afterwards founded a colony. Many instances of this nature have been found in Europe; and we have heard of bones, that were presented to the several learned academies, which would seem to prove that the human species is greatly degenerated, unless the bones undergo some change in the bowels of the earth, which we think extremely probable; although it is the business of the philosopher, and not of the historian, to explain this phenomenon.

AFTER an absence of some years, the inca returned to his capital, about the time that the principal feast of the Sun was to be celebrated. Upon this occasion, he is reported to have uttered some of those memorable sayings, which were thought by the Spanish writers to demonstrate the knowledge he had of the true God, the author and preserver of the universe. He was one day observed by the high-priest, his brother, with his eyes fixed upon the Sun in profound contemplation. As this was a liberty altogether unknown, and esteemed a shocking profanation, the high-priest spoke to the inca, asking whether he reflected on the impiety of which he was guilty, by lifting his eyes to the sacred luminary? To this the inca replied, that he would ask him two questions to convince him whether this action was really so prophane and impious as he imagined. "I am your king and sovereign; is there any of you, who dare presume to command me to rise from my seat for your pleasure, and take a journey to such remote countries, as you shall think fit to direct?"—"No, said the high priest, there is none who will be so daring and presumptuous."—"Is there among you any curaca, returned the king, who would venture to dispute my commands, if I should think proper to dispatch him to Chili, or any other remote country?"—"Certainly no, answered the high-priest, no one

(L) The emerald was exposed to publick view upon solemn festivals, the Indians coming from all quarters to worship it and make offerings of smaller emeralds, which the priests persuaded them were the children and offspring of the great stone deity, and the most

would presume to dispute your commands even to death."—"Then, said the inca, if it be so, there must be some other Being, superior to our father, the Sun, by whose commands he every day visits the heavens without intermission or repose; for were the Sun absolute and supreme, he would undoubtedly allow himself some cessation from labour, and, at least, the liberty of changing his occupation." From this speech it was that the Spaniards conceived so high an opinion of the wit and subtilty of Huayna Capac, as persuaded them he would have embraced the doctrines of christianity, had they been preached in his time in Peru. It is somewhat remarkable that the superstitious Indians regard this unpractised liberty of the incas, of beholding the Sun, into a bad omen, as if that bright luminary would certainly forsake the interest of his ungrateful offspring.

ABOUT this time the inca resolved to make another visit to all the provinces, in order, as he was growing old, to leave his dominions in the most tranquil state to his posterity. While he was employed on this circuit, news was brought him, that the province of Caranque was in rebellion, and had formed a league with several neighbouring nations, who were to assist each other in breaking the yoke imposed on them by the Peruvians. With this view, they held secret meetings, and concerted the means of destroying all the inca's officers, soldiers, and garrisons, appointed to keep the province in obedience. To conceal their designs, they pretended the most submissive regard to the will of the magistrates; but carried their hypocrisy to such a length, as to give suspicion of some treachery, though too late for the magistrates to provide for their defence. In consequence they were all massacred, a few Peruvians only making their escape to report the calamity to the sovereign, and to rouse his vengeance. The heads, hearts, and blood of those unfortunate victims to popular fury were offered to the gods; and then the Caranques took every possible measure to guard against the consequences of so bloody and treacherous an action. Immediately the inca sent an army to punish the murderers, and bring all the rebels to justice; ordering his general however to send proposals of peace and pardon to the nation, upon their surrendering the ringleaders; terms which they refused with so much scorn, that they even maltreated the ambassadors, and with the utmost difficulty suffered them to escape the fate of their countrymen. Such gross violations of the laws, regarded among the barbarous nations, wound up the inca to the highest pitch of fury. He determined to attack the rebels in person, and accordingly advanced with the remainder of his forces, destroying all before him with fire and sword. He gave battle to the enemy with great resolution and courage; but they sustained all his efforts with so much constancy, that, after several thousand men were slain, both sides prepared again to dispute the victory. In this manner, several battles were fought, before the rebels would yield an inch, or at all abate of that fury, which had at first impelled them to such dreadful acts of inhumanity. At length, perceiving that the inca was re-inforced, that his resources were inexhaustible, and his power invincible, they began to relax from their usual vigour, suffering their rage to subside, and listen to the dictates of reason and self-preservation. They now quitted the open plain, and took refuge in the mountains; guarding the passes with all possible caution. After all, they were intirely defeated, and several thousands taken prisoners, the most active and culpable of whom, to the number of two thousand, were put to death, after having first undergone a variety of tortures. Pedro de Cieca computes the number of the sufferers at twenty thousand; but he probably, as La Vega remarks, includes those who were slain in battle.

It was immediately after crushing this rebellion, that the inca vested his natural son Atahualpa, with the sovereignty of Quito, a circumstance that we have already related as the ground of that civil war, which raged in Peru on the arrival of the Spaniards, laid the foundation of the ruin of the empire, and violent death, both of the inca Huascar, and his ambitious brother Atahualpa. Of these events the reader has already been so minutely informed, that it would be unnecessary to resume the subject (M).

WE shall close this reign, and the history of the incas, with observing, that all the Spanish writers take notice of a tradition, universally credited in this country, that the empire would be subverted by a strange people, cloathed in a very uncommon manner, and looking terrible with their long beards. Among a variety of other omens, reported to have been observed before the death of Huayna Capac, there is one which to this day is credited by the Peruvians. It is reported that, while the inca was celebrating the annual festival dedicated

(M) La Vega repeats the opinion of some writers, that Huayna Capac was terrified with the intelligence he received of a strange fleet which sailed along his coast, which these writers call the squadron of Francisco Pizarro; whereas, in fact, the inca died eight years before the first expedition of this commander (1.)

The critic, however, falls himself into a mistake, by observing, that this might have been the fleet of Buice Nunnex; yet, it is certain that Nunnex never penetrated beyond the coasts of that division known by the name of Terra Firma.

(1) L. 9. c. 14.

- a to the Sun, a royal eagle, which they call anca, was seen hovering in the air, surrounded by a great number of hawks, which attacked him with so much fury, that he fell down among the princes, who stood round the inca, as he marched to the temple, and seemed to beg their protection. He had lost most of his feathers, and was so severely handled, that notwithstanding they nourished the eagle with the utmost care, he died in a few days. The inca, his priests and diviners, were all terrified at the spectacle, from whence they drew the most unfavourable presages; especially as it was succeeded by some dreadful earthquakes, which shook the neighbouring mountains off their foundations: and yet demonstrated nothing more than the superstition of the ignorant inhabitants, equalled only by the credulity of the Spanish writers, who relate these phænomena, not only as facts, but
- b as presages of the succeeding subversion of the empire. La Vega relates, that the moon, in the midst of a clear starry night, was observed to be encompassed with three halo's, or luminous circles, (no uncommon appearance, nor difficult to explain) the first of a bloody colour, the second black, and the third resembling a fog or smoak. This was no sooner beheld by one of the celebrated magicians of the court, than he came with tears in his eyes before the inca, and declared, "That his mother, the moon, like a tender parent, intimidated by this strange appearance, that Pachacamac, the creator and sustainer of all things, threatened his royal family and empire with grievous judgments. The first bloody circle, said this conjurer, denotes, that, after you are gone to repose in the bosom of your father, terrible wars shall arise in your own family; in which there shall be such effusion of blood,
- c that, in a few years, your whole race will be extinct. The second black circle prognosticates the total destruction of your subjects, and subversion of the religion and government established by your ancestors, a calamity that shall be brought on by the dissensions of your own children. And, as for the third circle, it plainly forebodes, that all your grandeur will vanish into smoke and vapour. If you have any doubts of the fact, come and observe it with your own eyes; if you hesitate about the interpretation, let the other magicians and diviners be consulted."

THE inca, though greatly terrified with these predictions, assumed an air of resolution, and sternly bid the magician be gone, telling him that these were the visions of a disturbed imagination; yet, after all, it must be confessed, that the magician might fairly,

d without any supernatural pretensions, have predicted the calamities that succeeded, from the character of Atahualpa, and the dismemberment of the empire. Notwithstanding the inca had banished the magician from his presence, he still entertained such doubts and fears as obliged him to assemble the whole college of interpreters, who all confirmed the prognostic of their colleague, and threw the inca into the greatest consternation; which he endeavoured to conceal from the people, by affirming, that unless the great Pachacamac himself would reveal a secret of such importance, he must refuse his assent. "Is it possible, said he, my father, the Sun, should abhor his own blood, and consign it over to perdition." Yet, reflecting upon what the magicians advanced, and considering how consonant it was to an ancient tradition of a celebrated oracle: he was in a manner confounded and perplexed with different

e opinions; but he did not despair, nor neglect the necessary measures for preserving the tranquility of his dominions. At this time, he kept his court at Quito, and finding the weather extremely hot, took it into his head to bathe in a neighbouring lake, the consequences of which were fatal. He was immediately seized with a fever, which carried him off in a few days, after he had for many years wielded the imperial sceptre with equal integrity, ability, and applause.

WHEN the necessary duties were paid to the memory of his royal father, Huascar ascended the throne, and governed for the space of five years without giving Atahualpa any molestation in his kingdom of Quito. Some writers ascribe the dissensions that followed to Huascar's reclaiming Quito, as part of the empire of the incas, incapable of being dismembered. Others impute it to the ambition of Atahualpa, who was desirous of extending the limits of his jurisdiction. All agree, that Huascar promised to confirm the cession made by his father, upon two conditions; namely, that Atahualpa should hold his dominions as a feudatory of his empire, and do homage for them; and that he should not endeavour to make any addition to his empire. To these conditions, Atahualpa gave his assent, promising in a short time to attend his brother at Cuzco, with all the curacas and lords of his kingdom; instead of which he raised an army, broke out into open war, defeated his brother, and took him prisoner in the manner we have already related, himself soon after becoming the prey of the Spanish invaders. Thus ended the empire of the incas, after it had continued for the space of thirteen generations, the most potent, civilized, and magnificent state in the southern continent of America. We have dwelt the longer upon the subject, because it hath not been explicitly related by any modern writer, and is explained without order, method, or elegance of style or composition, by the old Spanish writers.

S E C T. XIII.

Containing a general view of all the Spanish and Portuguese settlements on the continent of America, and more particularly of California, New Mexico, Florida, and Mexico Proper, or New Spain.

General reflections on the state of the Spanish dominions in America.

WHEN we reflect upon the vast extent and immense wealth of the Spanish colonies, we cannot but ascribe it to some error in government that his Catholic majesty is not the most formidable potentate in Europe. On the continent only, besides the richest islands of the West-Indies, he possesses a territory stretching from thirty-four degrees of north-latitude to fifty-three degrees of south, filled with gold and silver mines, or with the most valuable commodities. From Cape Sebastian, the most northern point of California, to the straits of Magellan, contains a space of between six and seven thousand miles, the whole coast of which, on one side, is entirely Spanish, while, on the other side, the Catholic king's dominions comprehend all that tract of land lying between the above straits in latitude fifty-three south of the equinoctial, to our colony of Georgia, in about thirty-one degrees north the line, except the Portuguese colonies in Brazil, and a few inconsiderable French and Dutch settlements. Great part, indeed, of the interior part of this country is possessed by the natives; but Spain claims the dominion, and her right hath not hitherto been disputed.

WITH respect to the climate, in so wide an extent of country, it must differ according to the latitude and other circumstances; and thus the general opinion, that the Spanish West Indies and boundaries in America are unwholesome, is both true and false at the same time, like many other general propositions. Those colonies within or near the tropics, are undoubtedly in a climate exceedingly hot; yet, where they possess other natural advantages, they are both healthy and pleasant. Several of the provinces in New Spain and Peru are blessed almost with every advantage; and the habitable world cannot instance finer and more delightful scenes than are to be found in New Mexico in the north, and Buenos Ayres in the south, and several other countries on both sides the line in the temperate zones. Where the lands have not been cleared, where the soil is marshy and swampish, and were periodical deluges of rain pour down from the heavens, there we may easily believe the climate must be unhealthy; and this is certainly the case with some of the Spanish dominions in America: whence it is usual to pass an unfavourable judgment upon the whole.

NOR does the soil differ less than the climate; some countries within the Spanish jurisdiction consist of the most beautiful lawns, pastures, fields, and meadows, watered with fine streams, shaded with groves, and variegated with hills and vallies; while others present to the eye nothing besides dreary deserts, dreadful mountains, vast forests, and the most tremendous scene of wild and rough nature. Several of the Spanish plantations are wonderfully rich and fruitful, abounding in corn, the most beautiful pastures, trees for fruit, shade, ornament, or the purposes of mechanics, odoriferous shrubs, medicinal plants, flowers delightful to the senses, herbs, and roots; in short, whatever nature or art produces in any quarter of the globe may here be found spontaneous, or raised by labour, in its greatest perfection. In the bosom of the earth the greatest treasures of the precious metals are combined; and, for the conveniency of navigation, America is furnished with several of the noblest rivers in the world. Let us instance La Plata, the river of Amazons, the Mississippi, and the river St. Laurence; the two last of which, indeed, are without the Spanish and Portuguese jurisdiction. We may, indeed, affirm, that were the Spanish councils vigorous in the prosecution of commerce, these colonies open the noblest field for wealth and glory. They contain every valuable material of trade which the encrease and refinement of luxury hath rendered necessary to life; but it requires industry at home to set this complex machine in motion. Here the first principle resides; and, unless it be properly directed, all those vast resources serve only to impoverish, weaken, and enfeeble, the whole constitution. The gold, silver, emeralds, pearls, rich drugs, dying woods, tobacco, ginger, coffee, cotton, and sweetmeats of America, are properly the rewards of those nations, who, by dint of genius and industry, render themselves essentially necessary to the very existence of Old Spain.

IF we now take a view of the country with respect to its inhabitants, we shall find another reason why her colonies have proved less serviceable to Spain than might otherwise be imagined. The impolitic expulsion of the Moors proved an irreparable blow to this monarchy, and the colonization of America encreased the evil; for notwithstanding this discovery preceded the event we have just mentioned, yet, for many years after the conquest, the constant drain of people made from Old Spain was not felt or perceived; perhaps the consequences appear at this day more manifestly than at any preceding period. Yet, though Old Spain was almost depopulated by the constant migration of her people to the continent

- a continent of America and the West-Indies, still the number was very inadequate to the purpose of rendering the plantations populous and flourishing; especially as the cruelty of the first conquerors had almost extirpated the natural inhabitants. To this we may add, that the very nature of the constitution is the greatest obstruction to the encrease of inhabitants, and the propagation of the species. When America was first reduced, it was thought necessary to establish great numbers of ecclesiastics in the country for the instruction of the natives in the Christian religion; as the surest method of bringing them under obedience, and the rules of regular and civilized society. At first the clergy proved of the utmost utility, as they laboured with the utmost diligence in the vineyard of salvation; but they soon proved extremely troublesome to the civil power, and have since multiplied to such a degree, as hath evidently the most pernicious effect on population. Every province is filled with monasteries, nunneries, and persons condemned by superstition to celibacy, and doomed by the tyranny of the church from the gratification of the most natural passion. The corruption too, and spirit of avarice and oppression, which reigns among all the officers deriving their authority from the crown, who are generally chosen out of families of distinction of broken and shattered fortunes, sensibly affects the state, not only by ruining the revenue, but discouraging industry, and extinguishing public spirit. We may subjoin, that the unaccountable attention which the Spaniards have shewn for gold and silver, has been equally prejudicial to the mother-country and to the colonies. This has not only prevented the government from cherishing those commodities and manufactures which in themselves would prove more valuable than the mines of Potosi, but has diffused such narrow and sordid principles through all the subjects of Spain, as is visibly productive of the most fatal effects: but as it would be foreign to our subject to enter upon a political detail, we must content ourselves with this general view of the advantages and disadvantages of Spanish America, and now descend to particular descriptions of the several provinces that compose this vast empire. Already the reader has been informed of our reasons for treating this subject in strict geographical order; and it will only be necessary to observe in this place, that the history of the conquests of Mexico, Peru, and Chili, forms the military history of all America, no other nations having made any considerable resistance to their invaders.
- d CALIFORNIA, the most northern of all the Spanish dominions on the continent of America, towards the Pacific Ocean, is also distinguished in some writers by the names of New Albion, and the Islas Carabiras; but the most antient appellation is California; a word which, in the opinion of the ingenious Jesuit Miguel Vinas, owes its origin to some accident, and possibly to some words spoken by the Indians and misunderstood by the Spaniards. This province, which for a long time was supposed to be insular, is a peninsula in the Pacific Ocean, issuing from the north coasts of America, and extending to the south-east as far as Cape St. Lucar, another cape, called St. Sebastian, forming the northern extremity; not but that the land runs farther, but that it has not yet been sufficiently discovered. In general, it is agreed among geographers, navigators, and particular narratists, that St. Lucar's cape lies in twenty-two degrees thirty-two minutes north latitude, and Cape St. Sebastian in forty-three degrees thirty minutes of the same latitude. California is divided from Mexico by a gulph of the name of the province, the opposite coasts lying nearly parallel, and the intermediate body of water being filled with islands; upon some of which the Jesuits have established settlements. The breadth of the peninsula is very unequal. Towards the north, it is near 200 miles broad; but at the southern extremity it tapers away, and is scarcely fifty miles over. It is bounded on the north by a continent scarce at all known, on the east by the province of New Mexico and the Gulph, or, as some call it, the Lake of California, or the Vermilion Sea, and by the great Pacific Ocean on the south and west.
- e We may judge of the temperature of the climate by the parallels within which it is confined: lying altogether in the temperate zone, the natives are neither chilled with cold, nor scorched with intense heat; and indeed the improvements in agriculture, made by the indefatigable Jesuits, are the strongest proofs of the excellency of the soil and climate. In some places the air is extremely hot and dry, and the earth wild, rugged, and barren, overrun with rocks, sands, and mountains, without water in a sufficient quantity to render it fit either for pasture or tillage. In a country stretching about 800 miles, there must be variations of soil and climate; and thus, in effect, we find, from good authority, that California produces some of the most beautiful lawns, as well as many of the most inhospitable deserts, in the universe. The lands to the westward of the river Colorado are level and fruitful, interspersed with delightful woods, cool refreshing springs and rivulets, and the most enchanting pastures and meadows. Upon the whole, although California be rather rough, craggy, and unpromising, on a general view, we are assured by Venegas and other good writers, that it furnishes every necessary of life and felicity, with due culture; and that where the atmosphere is hottest, vapours rising from the sea, and dispersed by pleasant breezes, renders it of a moderate temperature. a Animals.

THE peninsula of California is now stocked with all sorts of domestic animals which are commonly used in Spain and Mexico. Horses, mules, asses, oxen, sheep, hogs, goats, and all other quadrupeds imported, thrive and encrease in this country. Among the native animals of California is a species of deer, which, in the language of Mianqui, is called Taye. It is of the size of a young heifer, greatly resembling it in shape, the head like that of a deer, and the horns thick and curved, resembling those of a ram. The hoof of this animal is large, round, and cloven, the skin spotted, but the hair thinner and the tail sharper than that of a deer. The flesh is greatly esteemed, and eat with the same relish as venison is by our epicures. There is another species of animal peculiar to this country, b larger and more bulky than a sheep, but greatly resembling it in figure, and covered like it with a fine black or white wool. The flesh of this animal is nourishing and delicious, and, happily for the natives, it is so abundant, that nothing more is required than the trouble of hunting, as these animals wander in droves about the mountains and forests. Here too is a peculiar species of wild dog, somewhat different from the coyotes of New Spain, and greatly resembling the European fox in disposition, cunning, arts, and stratagems. Some years since an Indian killed a wolf, the first of the kind ever seen in the country, as all the natives declared. Father Torquemado describes an animal which he calls a species of large bear, something like a buffalo, of the size of a steer, and nearly of the figure of a stag. Its hair is a quarter of a yard long, its neck aukward and long, and on c its forehead are horns branched like those of a stag. The tail is a yard in length and half a yard in breadth, and the hoofs cloven like those of an ox. But the greatest curiosity of the quadruped kind, is a species of amphibious animal exactly resembling a beaver, and probably the very same animal, though not endowed with that extraordinary ingenuity and sagacity which peculiarly distinguishes the beaver of Canada and other northern countries.

WITH respect to the feathered kind, we have but an imperfect account. The natural history of California is still in its infancy; for we are only told, that, besides the birds produced in other parts of America, it has also a great number peculiar to itself, which are described by no author within our knowledge. Even the ingenious and sensible Venegas affords no satisfaction in this particular. He only relates in general, that the coast is plentifully stocked with peacocks, bustards, geese, cranes, vultures, gulls larger than geese, d cormorants, mews, quails, linnets, larks, nightingales, and most of the birds found in other parts of the world.

As to insects, they swarm here as in most warm countries; but they are neither so numerous nor troublesome, on account of the dryness of the soil and climate. With respect to fish, the multitude and variety with which the gulph of California and the Pacific Ocean are supplied, is almost incredible. Salmon, turbot, barbel, skate, mackarel, pilchard, thornback, soals, bonetos, and all the rest of the finny kind, are caught here with very little trouble; together with pearl-oysters, common delicious oysters, lobsters, and a variety of exquisite shell-fish. However, of the testaceous kind, the most remarkable and abundant e is the tortoise, caught in the utmost plenty upon the coasts. On the Soub-Sea coast are some small shell-fish, or conches, peculiar to it, and perhaps the most beautiful in the world; their lustre surpassing that of the finest pearl, and darting it rays through a transparent varnish of an elegant vivid blue, like the lapis lazuli. The fame of California for pearls drew forth great numbers of adventurers, who, stimulated by avarice, have searched every part of the gulph, and are still continually employed in that work, notwithstanding fashion hath greatly diminished the value of this elegant natural production. Father Torquimado observes, that the sea of California affords very rich pearl-fisheries, when the hostias, or beds of oysters, may be seen in three or four fathom water, as plain as if they were on the surface. f

Trees.

As neither the air nor the qualities of the earth are uniform in California, the effects must appear in the arborious, as in the other productions of the earth. The extremity of the peninsula towards Cape St. Lucar, is more level, temperate, and fertile, than any other, and consequently more woody. In the more distant parts, even to the farthest missions on the east coast, no large timber has yet been discovered. In the territory of Guadalupe alone are found large quantities of timber fit for ship-building. Among the shrubs of this country, the most remarkable is the pitabaya, a kind of beech, the fruit of which forms the great harvest of the natives. The tree is peculiar to California; its branches are finely fluted, and rise vertically from the stem, so as to form a very beautiful top. The shrub bears no leaves, the fruit growing to the boughs without shade or cover. It resembles a horse-chestnut externally, but the pulp comes nearer a fig than any other fruit. In some it is white, in others yellow, and sometimes red; but always exquisitely delicious; being a rich sweet, tempered with a grateful acid. It would lead us beyond our design, were we to g enumerate a enumerate all the different fruits with which this neck of land abounds; most of them are to be found in other parts of America: we shall therefore close this short sketch of the natural history, with mentioning a species of manna supposed to fall with the dew, and to become inspissated on the leaves of the trees. Father Pinolo says, that without the whiteness of refined sugar, it has all the sweetness; and botanists are now agreed, that this manna is a juice exuding from the tree, although the natives firmly believe that it drops down from heaven.

There have been a variety of opinions with regard to the nations inhabiting California, Nations and also concerning their languages. It is usual to distinguish barbarous nations by this circumstance, and to call all those of the same nation, who speak the same language, or dialects nearly similar of the same root. Accordingly some missionaries relate, that there are six different nations and original languages in California; while father Taraval, a very curious and learned missionary, affirms there are only three; namely, the Chachimi, Pericu's, and Loretto's, each of which hath its own language. From the Loretto two dialects have been formed; namely, Guayamu and Uchiri; and the difference is so considerable, that a person not perfectly conversant in languages would be apt to conclude they were all original and unconnected with each other. Since the arrival of the Europeans the names of nations have been greatly multiplied, as they called them by the names of the places where certain tribes happened to reside. The general appellation is Manqui; but then there are Edues, Periques, Laymones, and an infinity of other terms expressive of greater or smaller numbers, or circumstances of language or situation, by which they happen to be characterized. It would be endless, and indeed useless, to specify the subdivisions into which each of these nations run, all of whom have certain peculiarities of diction, and variations in the idiom, termination, and pronunciation.

It must be confessed that no other people on earth produce fewer instances of deformity than the Californians, who are in general handsome in their features and genteel in their persons, strong, vigorous, and robust, of a healthy countenance, but very swarthy. The paintings with which they daub themselves, and the holes with which they disfigure their ears and nostrils, are, however, great disadvantages to their appearance in the eyes of an European, though deemed a great beauty in their own. There is no reason to believe that the Californians have hitherto had any knowledge of the wonderful contrivance of letters, by which we communicate our ideas to each other at the greatest distance of place and time, converse familiarly with our remotest ancestors, and transmit our own opinions to the latest posterity; and indeed of all the American nations, the Mexicans and Peruvians alone possessed the art of rendering themselves intelligible by certain types or symbols of ideas; rude and imperfect, indeed; but demonstrative of their address and genius; the former in their hieroglyphical signs and paintings, and the latter by their quipos, or strings of different colours. It is the observation of the ingenious Jesuit Venegas, that had the Californians been acquainted with the use of letters, we should easily have discovered whether the founders of the American nations passed from Asia to the continent of America, as hath been supposed by many of the learned, and whether this happened before or since the invention of letters in Europe and Asia. We should also be able to draw probable conjectures with regard to the particular nation of the first peoplers of this extensive country. As matters now stand, the Californians, if ever they were possessed of any such invention to perpetuate their memoirs, have entirely lost it; nothing now remaining besides some obscure oral traditions, that their ancestors came from the North; which might reasonably be inferred from their situation, without any information from them, California being surrounded by the sea, except on the north, where it joins the continent. They speak more particularly of the cause of this migration; alledging, that it arose from a quarrel at a banquet, at which the chief inca of every nation was present. This was followed by a bloody battle; the consequence of which was, that the defeated party fled to the South, to establish settlements in a distant country, where they might at least avoid servitude and oppression. Such is the imperfect idea the Californians entertain of their first migration, which shews nothing more than that the country was peopled from the continent; there not being a clear monument in all America, among the nations on either side the equinox, of their coming originally from Asia. Nor is there in the farthest parts of Asia, to which the Russians have hitherto penetrated, the least vestige or tradition that the inhabitants ever had any communication with, or knowledge of the Americans; and, indeed, the Russian voyages, lately published by the ingenious professor Muller, seem to place it beyond all doubt, that both continents, however contiguous, are nevertheless separated by an arm of the sea; —a discovery rather curious than likely to be attended with any important consequences either to science or commerce.

Except in the two great Empires of Mexico and Peru, where there was a greater intercourse and union, productive of the cultivation of reason, in the establishment of laws, policy, and military conduct, and of all the endearing relations and reciprocal friendly dependencies dencies of society; all the other nations of America differ only in the modes of barbarity; a being nearly similar in capacity and disposition. The characteristics of the Californians, as well as of most Indian nations, is insensibility and a degree of stupidity; want of knowledge and reflection; inconstancy, impetuosity, and violent appetites; excessive sloth and abhorrence of labour; an insatiable love of pleasure and dissipation, however trifling and brutal; and, finally, a total deprivation of every quality which gives worth to humanity, and renders man ingenious, inventive, and useful to himself and society. This is the picture drawn by the masterly hand of the Jesuit Venegas, and applied by him to the bulk of the Americans, though with too much rigour and severity; as many instances may be produced of the tractable, docile, and ingenious dispositions of the natives both of North and South America, b proper allowance being made for the state of total ignorance and rude simplicity, in which they were found when the Europeans first invaded their country. The Californians have only faint glimmerings of the virtues and vices; actions appear good or evil rather from habit or accident, than from reflection in the moral sense. The most that is observed in the natives of this country is some sensibility of emulation, and ambition of applause. To see their companions praised or rewarded, kindles up some latent sparks of rivalry, and this sometimes stimulates them to shake off their innate sloth. The general extent of their desires soars no higher than to get daily provision with the least fatigue possible, taking little concern about the future; and as for their household furniture, it consists entirely of the implements of fishing and hunting, or of war. There being no such thing as property, they have consequently no idea of wealth, as their notions of right extend no farther than that of being the c first in gathering the spontaneous productions of the earth.

AFTER this general description of the disposition and genius of the Californians, we can entertain no great expectations from their form of government. It is perhaps impossible for an European to annex any ideas to what is commonly called civil government, if he be not allowed to join property. We have already observed, that the Californians know no division of lands or possessions, and consequently no succession to immoveables, nor any claim of patrimonial inheritance; nor, on the other hand, any complaints of illegal intrusions. Every nation or language consists of certain Rancherias, more or less in number, according to the fertility of the soil, and other adventitious circumstances, and each Rancheria is united by d consanguinity. On the first arrival of the missionaries, these little tribes acknowledged no chief by any kind of tribute, homage, or external ceremonies. Families governed themselves according to their company; and the authority of parents over their children ceases as soon as the latter are able to provide for themselves. A kind of forcerers, in whom they had great confidence, found means to impose on the understandings of this simple people, and gain considerable influence and power; but this authority, founded on imposture, lasted no longer than their festivals, or in sickness, or other incidents, which excited their fear or superstition. Yet there was in each Rancheria two or more persons who gave orders for gathering the products of the earth, directed the fisheries, and, in case of rupture with any neighbouring clan, headed the forces. This dignity was not acquired by blood, descent, age, or e formal election; but by merit solely and popularity. It was unanimously agreed, that he who was brave, expert, artful, or eloquent, should be promoted to the command; but his authority was limited to terms, imposed by the fancy of those who submitted to his directions. This occasional leader conducted them to the forests and sea-coasts in quest of food; he sent and received messages to and from the neighbouring nations; he gave the earliest notice of any impending danger; he spirited up the clan to revenge injuries; he directed the execution, and he headed the people in their wars, ravages, and devastations. In all other particulars, every one was intire master of his liberty.

THE Californians distinguish their want of ingenuity in their dress and houses. The latter consist of wretched huts, built near those few streams, wells, or ponds, found in this country. As they are under the necessity of frequent migrations in search of nourishment, they f easily shift their residences, it requiring only a few hours labour to build a little habitation fitted for all their purposes. In the severity of the winter, it is usual with them to live in subterraneous caverns, either natural or artificial, and the nations near Cape St. Lucar make tents of the branches of trees, like those of shepherds, which the Jesuits think they must have learned from seamen, who have been forced upon the coast; although we think the contrivance so simple, that it might easily have occurred to the most ignorant people. In some places the Californian houses are only a little space enclosed by stones or earth half a yard high, and without any covering. In general these habitations are so small, that the wretched inhabitants, not having room to stretch themselves at full length, sleep in a kind of a sitting posture. The missionaries taught them how to build, and even prevailed on some to erect g little houses of unburnt bricks, covered with sedges; but, notwithstanding this convenience, there was no bringing them to live under cover, or to relish advantages to which they had not been a been accustomed ; an evident proof that most of those things, which are deemed the necessities of life, arise purely from fancy, example, and custom.

With respect to their dress, it is uniform over the whole peninsula, consisting of a few ornaments and decorations of the hair, and a girdle round their waists ; all the rest of the body being entirely naked. Venegas acquaints us, that the Edues adorned their heads with strings of pearls braided with their hair, and interwoven with the most beautiful feathers ; some wear fillets of neat net-work ; others neck-cloths of well-wrought figures of Nacar, and sometimes strings of round small fruit. Their arms are likewise frequently adorned with fruit, net-work, or strings of pearls, in the form of bracelets. The Indians of the North wear their hair short, and, instead of pearl-strings, decorate the head with a splendid crown, formed of Nacar, which they make of the mother of pearl, detached from the shell by a flint, and finely polished on both sides. Although many of the women went naked like the men, yet they shewed great regard to that decency, so necessary to the security of virtue. In general, indeed, they wore a kind of petticoats made of palm leaves, and all carefully concealed those parts, which nature intended should be concealed ; perhaps for the wisest reasons, the rendering them the more sacred by the mysteriousness in which they were wrapped. The dress made of palm-leaves is peculiar to the women of the Edues. They beat these materials until the filaments are separated, which they afterwards weave into a kind of soft stuff, superior in fineness and beauty to what is commonly composed of hemp in European countries. A love of ornament also prevails more among the Californian women than the men ; this is a female weakness, that seems common to all countries. Here the women are set off with pearls, and all the other splendid trinkets, which nature affords, or their ingenuity can invent. In the northern parts, the women wear a meaner garb, made of sedges ; but, as this proceeds from their displaying less genius and invention, than those of the more southern climes, we may affirm, that all are equally taken up with the love of dress, and ambitious of making a handsome appearance.

In their fishing-nets only the Californians displayed any degree of ingenuity and invention : these were made with admirable skill of various colours, and such diversity of texture and workmanship, as cannot be described. Father Toraval's words are, " I can affirm, that of all the nets I ever saw in Europe and New Spain, none are comparable to these, either in whiteness, the mixture of the colours, or the strength and workmanship, in which they represent a vast variety of figures. The nets are woven by the men, but the women spin and manufacture the materials, which they prepare from plants, and a coarse sort of thread made from the palm." These nets serve also for decorating the head and neck, as well as for catching fish, or holding fruits and the vegetable productions of the earth.

The Edues, or southern Pericues, admitted a plurality of wives, who took care of the sustenance of the family, and were diligent in collecting the fruits of the field, to keep their husbands in good humour. It was allowable for the husband to dismiss his wife, in which case the discarded disconsolate woman was regarded as an outcast from society. Thus the more wives any man possessed, the better he lived ; great part of his maintenance depending on their industry, and his power over them keeping the wretched creatures more diligent and obedient ; a particular which greatly contributed to the conservation of this brutal custom. In some other nations there appeared more moderation. The chief men among them never exceeded two wives, while only one fell to the share of the vulgar. Adultery was reckoned a crime deserving the severest punishment, except on two occasions ; at their festivals, and public trials of strength and agility, the most beautiful woman, whether married or single, was, for that night only, the scandalous reward of the victor. The manner of contracting the matrimonial alliance was as peculiar, as some of its restrictions and privileges. In the nation of Loretto, it was customary to present the bride, by way of earnest, with a bottle, or jug, in their language called ola, her acceptance of which denoted her consent. On her part, she was to make her return by presenting the bridegroom with a net, the reciprocation of which testimonies of friendship confirmed the marriage. There were some nations in California, where the marriage was concluded at the end of a ball, the whole ceremony consisting in the mutual consent of the parties before the tribe, or Rancheria, upon which they retired and lived together.

Among other ridiculous customs of this country, one is peculiarly absurd, and hardly known in any other part of the world, except in Brazil. The women, immediately after delivery, go to some water and wash themselves and the child, then fall forth to the forest, and use the same diligence in collecting wood and food, as if nothing had happened, returning home laden with heavy burdens ; while the lazy husband lies stretched at his ease in his cave, or at full length under the shade of a tree, affecting the pangs of labour, extreme weakness and illness ; a farce that usually continues for the space of three days. Mothers have been known to destroy their children with impunity upon any scarcity of food, until until a stop was put to this shocking practice by the Jesuits, by ordering that a double portion of provision should be given to women in child-bed. We must likewise observe, that it was an established custom among the Californians, like the Jews, for the widow to marry the brother, or nearest relation of the deceased.

ALL the high festivals are kept during the time of gathering the Pitabayas, when the natives throw aside the little reason with which they are endowed, and resign themselves to feasting, dancing, buffoonery, and every species of absurd and ridiculous mirth. Whole nights are spent with the utmost delight in riotous and tumultuous jollity; but acting comedies is the principal entertainment. The actors are selected for their talents in mimicry and imitation, and if we may credit the reverend Jesuit fathers, these barbarians have carried pantomime to an astonishing degree of excellence. The Californian dances are excellent, and various in their kinds, and the performers acquit themselves with much agility and gracefulness, representing the different motions of war, fishing, hunting, marrying, and whatever is most important among them, by gesticulation and dumb shew. Even children act their parts to admiration, and perform a variety of action in the most natural manner, which require practice, and long assiduous application.

the Californians.

THE most interesting subject of curiosity is the ancient religion of the Californians; but it will be impossible to avoid obscurity, or fully to gratify the reader, because of the general or prejudiced relations given by travellers. All, indeed, agree, that no idolatry has hitherto been found among the Californians. They neither worshipped any living creatures, or formed images of false deities, to whom they paid any kind of adoration. They had neither temples, altars, oratories, nor any other place set apart for religious exercises. In a word, no outward profession of religion appeared in festivals, prayers, vows, or expiations. There were, however, the Jesuits affirm, a set of speculative tenets, which must surprize the reflecting reader. They alledge that the Californians not only had an idea of the unity and nature of God, as a pure spirit, but also some faint glimmering of the Trinity, the eternal generation of the word, or logos, and other articles of faith mixed with a thousand absurd superstitions. As the following account is curious, we shall venture to transcribe it on the authority of Venegas, a most sagacious observer, and excellent writer. Speaking of the Pericues, he says, "they believe there is in heaven a lord of great power, called Niparaya, who made the land and the sea, gives food to living creatures, created the trees, and every thing we behold, whether animate or inanimate, and is possessed of unlimited power. He is invisible, because he is without a substantial body; he has a wife called Anayicoyondi; but he uses her not carnally, because he has no flesh, though has begot three sons upon her, one of whom was Quaahap, or man. It was from this prince of divine origin, they were taught many arts: he was very powerful, and had under his command a great number of men, whom he raised from the bowels of the earth. At length he was put to death by the Indians, and crowned with a crown of thorns, though to this day he remains beautiful, and without corruption. His wounds are continually streaming blood, and although he does not speak in his own person, all his thoughts are communicated through the organs of an owl, or Tecolate." A figment, which, we must confess, we think owes its birth to the Jesuits, or other missionaries, who would insinuate from hence, that the Californians have a glimmering notion of the birth and passions of Christ.

It is farther alledged, as a religious tenet of the Californians, that formerly there were violent wars and commotions in heaven, which is more populous than the earth. A person of eminent power rebelled against the sovereign lord, and being joined by numerous adherents, ventured to give battle, but was totally defeated, expelled heaven, and confined to a vast cave under the earth, with a great sea round him, and whales placed as guards, that he might not-escape from his confinement. This rebellious lord they call Wac, or Tuperen; he delights in fighting and slaughter, because all who die in battle go to his cave; whereas the great lord Niparaya is pleased with peace and concord. Should any truth really exist in this monstrous relation, we should only infer from it, that some Christians had entered this country before the date of the earliest accounts we have of the missions undertaken to California, and that these superstitions are the remains of the Christian and Jewish religions, which were but imperfectly understood by the simple and ignorant natives.

BESIDES Niparaya, the Californians believe in two other invisible spirits of inferior power, called Qumongo, and Guyaiquai. The former sends pestilence, and sickness; whereas the latter is reputed the author of the greatest blessing; namely, a plentiful harvest of Pitabayas. His employment was to make vestments for his priests, of the skins of wild beasts; he likewise made a great many creeks on the coast, which he stocked with fish; and after having shed his bounty on mankind, he took his flight to the skies, and left a painted table, which his priests now use at their entertainments, as a memorial that he once resided on earth. The sun, moon, and stars, they believe to be human creatures, thrown every night into the western sea, where they are under the necessity of swimming out by the east. But as it would be

- a be tedious to enter upon a detail of the religious absurdities of the Californians, we shall only touch upon a few particulars of the creed of the Cachimies, who are not only the most numerous and extended tribe of the whole country, but the most ingenious, rational, and least addicted to absurdity, and superstition, or brutality. According to them there is in heaven a Lord, whose name in their language signifies he who lives. This lord begot a son without a mother, who went by two names, implying his swiftness, and perfection. There is besides in heaven another great lord, who is the creator of lords; but the first mentioned is the greatest, as his power extends over the brute, the vegetable, and every other part of the creation, except some individuals among mankind. They have also a notion of a rebellion in heaven, and the expulsion of evil spirits, to whom
- b they give the appellation of liars, ensnarers, or seducers; from all which we would infer, that some Europeans or inhabitants of the Philippines, of whom no memory now exists among the Indians, had been driven by some accident to the coast of California, and being obliged for a time to take up their residence among those barbarians, endeavoured to propagate the doctrines of christianity, which, in process of time, became disfigured into the figments we have related.

As to the priesthood, it was just what might be expected from this shadow or phantom of religion. In most narratives they are called Diminobos, Gnosmas, or Heckicheros; according to the different language of the tribes to whom they belong. The latter of these terms signifies a forcerer, or magician, supposed to communicate with infernal spirits; an opinion

c which they endeavoured to impress on the minds of the people by a thousand frauds and impostures. This pretended commerce with spirits gained the priests great influence, and they heightened the reverence by a variety of ceremonies, gestures, and the introduction of different mystical rites; an art practised with success in countries where a purer religion is professed, that requires not the aid of imposture. The sole and ultimate intention of all these pious frauds was interest; the people imagining that success was to be obtained, and misfortune avoided, by bringing the priests the first fruits of whatever sustenance they collected. This was a principle carefully inculcated by the priesthood, who thundered out anathemas and the curses of sickness and famine, whenever the people happened to grow remiss in their offerings. They affirmed they were possessed of sufficient power to bring on

d the most dreadful calamities, by means of their friendship and intercourse with spirits; and it heightened their reputation with the people, that they were the only physicians from whom they could hope for relief in their distempers: whatever was the medicine, it was administered with great ostentation and solemnity. One was very remarkable, and the good effects which it usually produced augmented the reputation, and elated the confidence of these religious empirics. They applied to the part affected of the patient's body the Chamac, or a tube formed of black solid stone, through which they sucked, and sometimes blew, with all their force, supposing that by this means the disease would either be exhaled or dispersed. Frequently the tube was filled with Cimmaron, or wild tobacco lighted, the smoke of which was sucked in or swallowed by the patient, according to the physician's directions; and this plant alone, without other remedy, has been known to operate so powerfully, as to remove the most dangerous maladies. In most other transactions of life, they practised a variety of deceits, by which they gained an unlimited ascendant over an ignorant people, whose gross stupidity opened a way to those inseparable companions of ignorance, credulity, fear, and superstition. Schools were erected in certain provinces of California, in which the youth were instructed in these impostures and puerilities, which they regarded as truths of the greatest importance. The pupils attended their masters to caves and solitary places at a distance from the dwellings, where they were taught to draw certain figures in tablets, in the same manner as our children are taught to write; a secret first discovered by father Salva Tierra, who observed, that, about the season for gathering pitabayas, f all the boys about the garrison of Loretto disappeared, and from one of these he drew the secret; but not without artifice and trouble; for silence is one of the strongest injunctions imposed on the noviciates.

At the public festivals celebrated by the whole nation, it is that the authority of the Californian hierarchy appears with peculiar splendor, whose presence makes the most riotous assemblies be considered as religious orgies. They act the principal parts, and dress themselves in the most solemn habits of their function, which are never wore but on extraordinary occasions. These consist of a large cloak, covering them from head to foot, entirely composed of human hair. Their heads are adorned with a very magnificent plumage made of hawks feathers, and in their hands they hold a large fan composed of the longest

g feathers which the country affords. When the southern Edues cannot procure a sufficient quantity of feathers, they deck out the head with the tails of deer, adding two strings of the hoof of the same animal; one round the neck, and the other as a girdle round the loins. The ridiculousness of this dress is still heightened by daubing the body over with red, black, and different colours; so that the appearance they make is equally absurd and ugly. The priests open the entertainment with sucking the chacuaco, until they are become frantic and almost drunk with the smoke, when they pronounce a panegyric on their tenets, delivered with the wildest gestures, and horrible vociferations; pretending they are inspired by those spirits which the people acknowledge, and denouncing vengeance, or imploring blessing, just as the fumes of intoxication inspire. Sometimes they affirm, that they are the very identical spirits so much revered by the people; at others, that they had visited the skies, and just conversed with the deities; in proof of which they will produce a piece of deer's flesh, of the skin of that animal, or of an herb, with which they pretend they can kill at pleasure. But their most usual device is to hold up in their hands some little tablets of wood made with great labour, on which are painted certain grotesque figures; asserting this to be the true copy of the tablet which the visiting spirit left with them on his departure to heaven. During this frantic harangue, the audience is feasting and dancing; and being inflamed by gluttony and intemperance, the whole concludes in the most lascivious scenes and abominable gratification of their appetites, all mingling indiscriminately, as if determined to violate every principle of shame, reason, and modesty.

Mod. Hist. Vol. XIV. 5 Q red,

THERE is another public festival on piercing the ears and nostrils of the children; at which the priests do not fail to exercise that authority which they found on the simplicity of the people, celebrating, according to their private passions, some as brave and generous, upbraiding others as cowardly and factious, enjoining penance and abstinence, and sometimes laying a whole tribe under interdiction, and prohibiting them, for a certain time, to taste fish, flesh, or fruit. Nor is this the only method of venting their spleen and demonstrating their power. They frequently order the people to make roads and clear ways over the most rugged and difficult mountains, for the more easy descent of the visiting spirit; and what cannot be read without horror is, that these inhuman impostors sometimes even order them to throw themselves down from precipices, which they obey implicitly, in the full persuasion their lives will be saved by invisible powers, although repeated experience demonstrates the absurdity of their faith. In recompence of these services, the priests raise contributions on their flocks by way of tythes, and in consequence are enabled to live more luxuriously than any other set of people. A yearly tribute of the best fruits, and daily tythes of fish and flesh is paid to them. The first is the acknowledgment made by the children for their instruction, and the adults recovered by their skill and care from dangerous diseases. The priests even find means to lay a tax upon the dead, under pretence of recommendations given to departed spirits. When a Californian was seized with a malady, the priest was sent for, consulted as an oracle, and all his prescriptions were followed with the utmost exactness; but if the distemper proved too obstinate to be removed by herbs, juices applied internally or externally, the chimaco, or simarion; then all the patient's relations were assembled, and the little finger of the nearest female relation was cut off, under pretence that the blood which streamed from the wound would either effect a cure, or at least remove all sorrow for the deceased from the family. This barbarous ceremonial was followed by visits from the whole tribe, each conversing in their turns with the dying patient, and, if the case be desperate, setting up a melancholy howling, covering their face with their hands and hair, and repeating this ceremony, from time to time, divided into separate companies. The cries of the bye-standers ceasing, the patient desires they will suck and blow him in the same manner the physicians had done, which is obeyed, each using his utmost strength to testify the degree of his affection. When he is just expiring, these rational humane doctors thrust their hands into the patient's mouth, saying they pluck death forcibly out of his body; and the women still continuing their yellings, give him many severe strokes to awaken life, at the moment they are extinguishing it with pain and torture.

No sooner has the patient yielded his last breath, than the friends proceed to the funeral rites, either burning or burying the body, just as it is found most convenient. The first care of those barbarians is to remove every spectacle that can possibly give them uneasiness, and immediately to resume their former mirth and festivity; to which end they inter the body before it is well cold, consuming by fire or burying all the deceased's effects with him. So little do they enquire into the reality of his death previous to the funeral, that father Salva Tierra acquaints us, that hearing lamentations, and seeing the fire, in the neighbourhood of San Juan de Lando, he hastened to the spot, where he found them just going to burn a man, who, he could perceive, had life and motion. He snatched him from the fire, administered medicines, recovered the patient, and severely reprov'd them for their rashness and barbarity.

WE shall close this account of the genius, manners, and religion of the Californians, with the words of father Torquemado, speaking of the island of St. Catharine. "In this island are several rancherías, or communities, and a temple with a large level court, where they perform

- a form their sacrifices. The place of the altar was a large circular space, with an inclosure of feathers of several birds, of different colours, which, I understood, were those of birds they sacrificed in great numbers: and within the circle was an image, strangely bedaubed with a variety of colours, representing some devil, according to the manner of the Indians of New Spain." How different is this, and the account given of the religion of the Californians by Venegas, from what is asserted by most of the Jesuits, who first entered that country; namely, "that the natives had no external signs of worship; that they neither offered prayers, sacrifices, nor expiations, but adored an invisible, all-creating, and omnipotent being, in silent and mental reverence. However, as these are inconsistencies that cannot be rectified by us, who pretend to nothing more than compiling from the most authentic journals, it may be agreeable to the reader that we should pursue Torquemado's account, which places the absurd superstition of the natives in the strongest point to view. "The inhabitants of St. Catherine, says the reverend father, place in the hands of this image a figure of the sun and moon; and when the soldiers came to see this temple, they found within the circle of the altar two crows of larger size than common, which flew away at sight of the Spaniards, but alighted along the neighbouring rocks. The soldiers, observing their extraordinary size, fired their pieces, and shot them dead; at which an Indian, who attended them for a guide, fell into perfect agonies. I was informed that they believed the devil spoke to them by means of these crows, whence they paid them the greatest reverence. Some time after, one of the religious going that way, saw some Indian women washing fish along the shore, in order to dress them for their families. The crows came and picked them from their hands, while they observed a profound silence, without daring to lift up their eyes, or frighten them away."

To conclude the history of this peninsula, we shall observe, that notwithstanding it was discovered soon after the conquest of Mexico, and some expeditions were made to the Gulph by Cortez and his officers, yet it was for a long time wholly neglected by the Spaniards, who to this day have but one settlement, we believe, on this valuable coast. In the year 1595, a galleon was sent to make discoveries on the Californian shore; but the vessel was unfortunately lost in port des los Reyes. Seven years after, the count de Monteroy, then viceroy of New Spain, sent Sebastian Biscaino on the same design with two ships and a tender. He sailed as high as Cape Mendocina, but discovered nothing of importance. In 1684, the marquis de la Laguna, also viceroy of Mexico, dispatched two ships with a tender to make discoveries in the lake of California, of which, after all his pains, he brought back but an indifferent account; though he was among the first who ascertained its being joined to the continent of America, and contiguous to that of Asia. Father Martinez reports, that during his residence in Pekin, in China, a Christian woman of Mexico was brought thither as a slave, who affirmed, that she had come by land all the way from her own country, except two days spent in passing an arm of the sea, which he supposes must have been the straits of Anian. Be this as it will, we owe to father Caino, a German Jesuit, the absolute certainty that California is a direct peninsula joining to the continent of New Mexico and the more southern parts of South America. He landed on the former from the island of Sumatra, and passed to the latter without crossing any other water than the river Azal, into which the Rio Colorado falls in about the thirty-fifth degree north-latitude. Since the first ingress of the Jesuit missionaries into this country, they have laboured with indefatigable zeal to propagate the Christian religion and civilize the inhabitants, though the fruits have hitherto proved inconsiderable. To them Spain certainly owes the first reduction of this barbarous people; but they are taxed, possibly not unjustly, with enslaving the minds of the simple natives, propagating false doctrines, and laying the foundation of an independent hierarchy and empire, as they certainly have done in Paraguay. The reader who is anxious to be fully informed upon this subject, may consult the writings of father Miguel Venegas^b, so frequently referred to in the above account, as it would greatly exceed our limits to enter upon a detail of the several missions made to California, and treat the matter with historical precision. Let us only observe, that were the court of Madrid to push their interest with half the zeal of the Jesuits, California might become one of their most valuable acquisitions, on account of the pearls, and other valuable articles of commerce, which, without all doubt, this country contains. At present, the little Spanish town near Cape St. Lucar is made no other use of than a place of refreshment for the Manila ship, and the head residence of the missionaries (N).

(N) The coast of California, especially towards the Pernilian Sea, or Gulph, are covered with inhabited islands; such as those of St. Clement, Paxaros, St. Anne, of Cedars, so called from the great number of these trees which it produces of the largest size; St.

Joseph, and a multitude of others, which may be seen by casting an eye on the map of that country. But the islands best known, are three lying off Cape St. Lucar, towards the Mexican coast. These are called The Three Marys, Les Tres Marias. They are but small, have

New Mexico.

WE come now to describe New Mexico, upon which subject the reader must not expect we should be very minute or explicit, as the Spanish accounts themselves are extremely defective. The boundaries of this province are by no means ascertained, and the greater part of it is still in the hands of the natives, who might easily be reduced, if the Spaniards found it advisable to render the colonies less populous, in order to render their dominions more extensive. This vast region, sometimes called the kingdom, and sometimes the province of New Mexico, lies eastward of California, being divided by the Gulph from that peninsula. It extends a great way towards the North Pole, and is bounded on that side by very high mountains, and a country never pervaded by Europeans, and indeed utterly unknown. On the east it has the spacious, new-discovered country of Louisiana, on the west the Californian lake and Rio Colorado, while, on the south, it is hedged in by some of the provinces of Mexico Proper, or New Spain. With respect to its situation geographers differ; but, in the best maps, we find New Mexico laid down between the thirtieth and forty-fifth degrees of north-latitude, and between two hundred and sixty and two hundred and seventy-three degrees of longitude; but whether we ought to extend or contract these limits, is what we cannot affirm with any degree of certainty. The longitude indeed is the most precarious, some giving the province much greater breadth than we have allowed; affirming, that it stretches above six hundred miles from east to west, and about nine hundred from north to south. Until the frontiers of Louisiana are perfectly ascertained, we shall never be able to fix those of New Mexico to the eastward.

THE division of the country is equally uncertain with its limits. Most geographers divide it into fifteen provinces, many into five only: but the bulk of the Spanish writers reckon eighteen provinces; concerning which they give us nothing besides a dry catalogue of the names. A favourable judgment of the excellency of the climate will be formed from its lying within the Temperate Zone. The summers are warm indeed, and the winters pretty sharp; but then the former are neither scorching hot or unwholesome, nor the latter intensely cold, or deluged with floods of heavy rain; on the contrary, they are clear, healthy, and bracing, neither partaking of the stifling moisture of the West-Indies and some parts of South America, nor of the rigorous congealing colds of Canada and the countries round Hudson's Bay. In general, the weather is just what is desirable in the season, and extremely refreshing to an European constitution.

THE greatest encomiums are lavished on the fertility of the soil, the richness of the mines, and the variety of the valuable commodities produced by New Mexico, which abounds with fruit and timber, fields and meadows, precious stones, silver and gold, fine rivers, and the most beautiful variety of hill and vale, land and water. All kinds of wild and tame cattle, especially cows and oxen, are found here in the greatest plenty. The hills are stocked with fowls of different kinds, and the rivers abundantly stored with the most delicious fish. Upon the whole, we may safely affirm, that New Mexico is among the pleasanter, richest, and most plentiful countries in America, or any other part of the world, which might one day probably induce the French to extend the frontiers of Louisiana quite to the Gulph of California, if their ambition had not been seasonably checked by the loss of Canada, their principal strength in North America. The British legislature may likewise find it necessary to the security of their own colonies, and to prevent encroachments on the Spanish territories in America, to deprive that restless enterprising people of their settlements on the west of the river Mississippi, and connect their frontier immediately with that of the Spaniards.

NEW MEXICO is finely watered with rivers and rivulets, although few of these are large, or at all navigable. The Rio Solado and Rio del Norte alone deserve notice, the last of which flows the whole length of the country, and then, making a sweep eastward, runs through the province of New Leon, and discharges itself in the Gulph of Mexico. There are also several smaller rivers which fall into the Mexican Sea, and divers bays, ports, and creeks, on that coast, which might easily be converted into excellent harbours, were the Spaniards possessed of any portion of that diligence and commercial spirit which animates the other maritime nations of Europe to the most arduous enterprizes. Gemelli Careri, who was in this country in the year 1698, gives the following account of the produce and natives, the conquests of the Spaniards, and the force they maintain in New Mexico. Part of this country, says he, is already reduced, but there still remains much more to conquer. The natives are easy, generous, and pacific; yet extremely formidable, on account of the dexterity with which they handle their bows and arrows. They are better provided for their defence than any of have good wood and water, abundance of game, as in California, salt-pits, &c. and therefore the English and French pirates have sometimes wintered there, when bound on cruizes in the South Seas. Many years since it was proposed by captain Dampier, with great judgment and knowledge of the terraqueous globe, to search for a north passage, by doubling Cape Blanco, towards the northern extremity of California, on the Pacific Ocean, and in about forty-one degrees fifty minutes north-latitude; but though the proposal merits, in our opinion, the concern of the several maritime powers of Europe, it has been neglected.

- a the other inhabitants of the New World, except in one particular, instead of being united in one society, and under the same prince, like the empires of Mexico and Peru, they are divided into tribes, each commanded by its curaca, or petty sovereign, which renders them an easier prey to invaders, than if their whole strength was combined. When the Spaniards first entered this country, they found the natives well clothed, their lands cultivated, their villages neat, and their towns built with stone and some knowledge of architecture, not drawn from the rules of art, but the convenience dictated by nature. Their flocks of cattle were numerous, and they lived in a state of more comfortable barbarity than any other nations in America, unless we except the subjects of the two great monarchs of Peru and Mexico. So skilful were they in shooting, that with an arrow they could shake all the grain out of an ear of corn without breaking it, at a considerable distance. They were great lovers of mules flesh, and upon this account frequently fell upon the Spanish travellers, leaving their chests of silver upon the roads, because they set no value upon this metal. They were idolaters, and worshipped the sun and moon; but in what particular manner, or whether they offered human sacrifices, we are not informed; and as to their government, it was free; their princes being little more than leaders of their armies, and the chief persons in the state, elected, at the pleasure of the people, for their wisdom or valour. They discovered a greater readiness to embrace the doctrines of Christianity than any other of the American nations, and only expressed their dislike to the new tenets proposed, lest they should oblige them to part with their freedom, to which they were extremely attached. It was usual with them to paint their bodies, and to lodge the colours in scars made in the skin, by which they rendered them indelible.

- It is reported by the Spanish writers, that New Mexico is inhabited by a great variety of different nations totally unconnected with each other; but the principal are the Apaches, the several tribes of whom are distinguished by their towns and settlements. They are a brave, warlike, resolute people; fond of liberty, and the inveterate enemies of tyranny and oppression, of which the Spaniards had fatal experience about the close of the last century, when they rebelled against the Catholic king, massacred several of his officers, laid desolate the plantations, ruined the towns, and committed the most dreadful enormities. At length they were rather appeased than subdued, and ever since they have remained the allies not the subjects of Spain. A more formidable garrison and greater number of troops have since been maintained by the viceroy of Mexico; but not a single advantage deduced by the crown of Spain. As the Spaniards are themselves so negligent in cultivating the commercial advantages deducible from this country; so abundant in gold, silver, turquoises, emeralds, and other precious stones, it is matter of astonishment that no attempts have been made by any of the maritime powers, when at war with Spain, to penetrate into this country by the Gulph of California; a scheme first suggested by captain Dampier, and extremely rational in the design, especially if we confine our notions to Great Britain; for it is certain this country runs the hazard of one day becoming subjected to France, should the settlements of that nation ever become powerful and numerous on the banks of the Mississippi (O).

- e THE capital Santa Fè is a well-built, handsome, and rich town; but its immense dis-

- (O) It has not been in our power to describe the geography of New Mexico, by distinguishing it, after our usual method, by its towns and provinces; the reader must therefore be contented with a general view of the country, extracted from the account of father Afonso de Bonavides, with some inconsiderable additions from Herrera, De Lact, and other writers. Santa Fè is the capital of the whole province or kingdom, seated on the Rio del Norte, in thirty-six degrees of north latitude, and about one hundred and thirty leagues from the sea. The way to it is through the province of Conchos, which is parted from New Biscay by a river of the same name. Then follow the Tobosos, Tarrahumares, Tupcanes, Sumas, Tomites, Hanos, and other barbarous nations, for the space of an hundred leagues north and west. Nearest to them are the Apaches, a powerful people mentioned in the preceding text; and here again we fall in with the Rio del Norte, where New Mexico properly commences, and extends an hundred leagues north from St. Anthony of Seneca, the first town of the Biroros. In New Mexico, properly so called, are the following nations, placed in the order in which we shall mention them. At the Rio Norte begins the territory of the Piros, a civilized people, who are clad, dwell in houses, are subject to their chiefs, possess a fertile soil, and have abundance of cotton, wheat and other grains, and articles of traffic. In the neighbourhood of these are the Tebas, who have fifteen towns; then the Queres, who are lords over seven towns; and next Tompies to whom belong fifteen towns, the chief of which are the Chilili. Next to them is the city Santa Fè, in which dwell about two hundred and fifty Spaniards, not more than half of whom are soldiers, although they keep this whole adjacent country in awe; than which there cannot be a more forcible argument of the pacific disposition of the natives: however, as this account of Bonavides was written more than a century ago, there is great reason to believe the number of Europeans has been greatly encreased, not only in the capital, but in the other towns. Not far from Santa Fè live the Teos in eight villages, being the first who embraced Christianity, and expressed an affection for the Spaniards. West of them are the Hemes, and to them, north, the Picaries, beyond whom are the Toasites. Again, west of the Queres is the town of Acoma, and farther west the Zanis, masters of twelve towns; next to whom come the Moquis. All of these have now embraced Christianity, and pursue every species of industry, especially the cultivation of the soil, with an ardour which promises that this will one day become the finest country in North America (1.)

tance from the sea, and the caution of the Spaniards, prevent our receiving authentic accounts of this and other towns of New Mexico. We believe the whole province is subject to the jurisdiction of the viceroy of Mexico, although Santa Fe is honoured with the residence of a particular governor, who is enjoined to maintain a constant force of six hundred horse, half of which number is seldom kept up, their pay going into the governor's pocket; which alone would make a considerable salary, no less than four hundred and fifty pieces of eight being allowed for the annual support of every soldier. If we may credit Gemelli, the governor almost monopolizes the whole sum allotted for the support of the army; for as he furnishes the troops with provision and cloathing, he fixes his own price, and obliges them to pay twenty pieces of eight for what could not cost a tenth part of the sum. In Gemelli's time, the Spanish soldiers were armed with a shield, musket, and half-pike, or spear; not to fight, says our author, but to hunt down the natives like wild beasts, notwithstanding their orders from the government are not to kill the savage inhabitants, but to subdue them by reason and instruction, and the powerful charms of civilization. By order of his late Catholic majesty, the viceroy of Mexico sent every year a certain number of poor families into these northern countries, which was certainly a wise measure; not only as it provided for the poor Spaniards, but the effectual reduction of these barbarous provinces, by rendering them populous, and instructing them in those doctrines of religion and policy, and principles of the arts, conducive to society and good government. Such is the unsatisfactory account of New Mexico, which we are able to lay before our readers, after having consulted all the materials, which should furnish us with more explicit information. Whether we are to ascribe this deficiency to the caution or to the indolence of the Spaniards, is not worth enquiring; possibly both may contribute.

Florida.

Discovery.

WE come now to the province of Florida, the most eastern frontier of the Spanish dominions in North America; being washed on the South by the gulph of Mexico, on the North by the mountains Apalaches, and French settlements behind; on the East by the British province of Georgia, and the channel of Bahama; and on the West by the French settlements in Louisiana, and the great river Mississippi. It hath been already observed, that this country was first discovered in 1497 by John Cabot, a Venetian mariner, in the service of Henry VII. king of England. It was more completely discovered in the year 1512, by Juan Ponce de Leon, a Spaniard, who gave it the name of Florida, because it was seen first in Easter, called Pasqua de Flores in the language of his country; or, as Herrera alledges, because it was covered with flowers and the most beautiful blossomsⁱ. This voyage turning out to little account, another was undertaken, in the year 1528, by Pamphilo de Narvaez, who sailed with four hundred men from the island of Cuba, few of whom returned. As for Pamphilo, he was never more heard of, some imagining he penetrated quite to the South Sea. At last, it was intirely subdued, in the year 1539, by Ferdinand de Soto, one of the bravest officers in the Spanish service, whose name has been mentioned with applause in the preceding history. It cost the Spaniards seas of blood before they established themselves in this country, which is of scarce any other utility than to secure their navigation to the islands of the West Indies: formerly was comprehended under the general name of Florida, all those parts of Louisiana and New Mexico, which were then discovered. At present, the limits of the province are confined, narrow, and inconsiderable in value to the Spaniards, although to the French, or English, it would prove an acquisition of the last importance.

Produce.

THE air is pure and temperate, and the country generally speaking, exceeding salubrious. The power of the sun would sometimes prove intolerable, were it not tempered by refreshing sea and land breezes; while the air towards the Apalachian mountains is in general cool and even sharp. Hence it is, that the natives of Florida are supposed to derive that strength and robustness of constitution, which distinguishes them from the more southern Indians, and once was deemed so formidable by the Spaniards. The stories related by the Spanish writers of their ferocity and gigantic stature, are altogether incredible and inconsistent with what daily experience now evinces. The soil is rich and fertile, producing in great abundance all kinds of timber and fruit-trees, especially pines, laurels, palms, cedars, cypress, and chefnut-trees, which grow to an extraordinary height and size. But the wood most prized, and in great plenty, is the sassafras, quantities of which are annually exported. There is no species of vegetable, but may be raised with little trouble in Florida; and even with the mean culture at present bestowed, it produces corn, pulse, roots, herbs, and fruits, in abundance for the inhabitants; also flesh, fowl, and fish, where sufficient industry is exerted to collect those gifts of nature. For the distance of two hundred miles from the sea, every part almost produces two crops of corn, and some would yield three, with a small share of labour; besides, the root Mendiboca of which the Cassavi flour and a bread are made, grows in the utmost plenty : there also is another kind of grain, like our oats, that shoots up spontaneously in marshy places, and by the sides of rivers. Limes and prunes grow wild, and the latter are plentifully eat from the tree by the natives, or dried and laid up for winter provision ; but the most delicious fruit is the Tuna, so exquisite and wholesome when ripe, that the Europeans call it their cordial julep. Excellent beef, veal, and mutton are the produce of the country, together with horses fit for draught and carriage, so cheap that they may be purchased for the value of a crown in European commodities. Not to enumerate the valuable articles of commerce and living found in this country, we shall only mention the pearls found on the coasts of Florida, the ambergrease, cochineal, and indigo, produced in the country ; also a kind of stone-pitch, called Copea, b used by the Spaniards as tar for their shipping. Nor ought we to omit the hemp, flax, silk-grass, amethysts, turquoises, lapides lazuli, and other precious stones ; nor the copper, quicksilver, pit-coal, and iron-ore, discovered in different parts of this invaluable province. As to cotton, it is so plentiful that most of the civilized inhabitants are clothed of a manufacture composed of that useful natural production. The country is well-watered ; but it must be confessed the sea-ports are so indifferent and difficult of access, that, in this circumstance, the Spaniards place their chief security.

THE natives of the country are of an olive-colour, robust, active, and well-proportioned. They go naked, men and women, unless we except a deer-skin, wrapped in the nature of an apron, round the loins. Those, indeed, who have come into the manners of the Spaniards, c dress in cotton garments, nearly in the Spanish fashion. They are stained over with the juice of herbs, which leaves an indelible mark, and preserves them, as they imagine, from the inclemency of the weather. Their hair is long and black, falling down loose on the shoulders, and floating carelessly in the wind, or twisted in beautiful shining wreaths, fastened up in a knot upon the head in a manner extremely agreeable and becoming. The women are also remarkably handsome, well-shaped, and they not only support the fatigue of all domestic offices, but accompany their husbands in the field, either in war, or the chase ; swimming over rivers with their children on their back. No people on earth are more hardy, bold, and persevering, but the women are more particularly so, and it is difficult to determine, whether most to admire their beauty, their courage, or their conjugal d fidelity. We cannot alledge so much of the men, who are charged by the Spaniards with several vices, especially a fraudulent disposition, and strong inclination to cheat and deceive in traffick. As an instance of this, we cannot but take notice of one piece of fraud, which displays more ingenuity than might be expected from such unpolished people. They counterfeit the ambergrease so dextrously, that they often impose upon those who are not perfectly acquainted with this elegant production. As the Spaniards have lived in a state of constant warfare with these Indians, we are to make some grains of allowance for the prejudices which they naturally entertain ; they have always represented them in the blackest colours, although such of our countrymen as have traded with them tax them only with subtilty, and an inclination to knavery in trade, in a stronger degree than any of the other ine habitants of America.

THE religion of the Floridans favours of the same absurdity and ignorance, as that of the other barbarians of the continent. The Sun and Moon are worshipped as supreme deities, the people are immersed in the grossest idolatry, and the more irrecoverably, because they bear the most irreconcilable hatred to the Christians, whom they believe to be cruel, ambitious, and covetous to an extreme. With respect to government, the Floridans are subject to petty chiefs, whom they call Paraousti. These are their leaders in war, and the presidents of their councils in peace, to whom they are extremely obedient and submissive. To these princes only polygamy is allowed ; they are indulged with three or four wives, as a mark of sovereignty ; but the children only of the first are deemed legitimate, f and capable of succession. Next to the authority of the princes, the most powerful is the influence of the priests, who act in the triple capacities of priests, conjurers, and physicians. They are clad in long robes made of skins, always preserve a very grave appearance, speak little, live abstemiously, and practise every part of hypocrisy necessary to maintain that ascendant they have gained over the minds of their countrymen. As priests, they pray and sacrifice to the Sun and Moon ; as magicians, they pretend to foretel future events ; under the quality of physicians, they bleed, bathe, vomit, sweat, and purge the sick ; in all which cases they levy heavy taxes upon the ignorance of their employers.

IN Mr. Coxe's description of Carolana, which the Spaniards call Florida, we meet with a variety of ingenious and interesting particulars, respecting the produce of this country, g and the genius of the natives. He likewise specifies the names of a variety of tribes or clans, to enumerate which would serve only to burthen the reader's memory. From him we shall extract the subsequent account of the rivers of Florida, and the adjacent provinces ; as upon a just knowledge of these depends the success of any attempts which in time may be be made to add Florida to our more southern settlements (P). About twelve miles above the mouth of the river Mississippi, a branch runs off in the east side, which after a course of 160 miles, falls into the north-east end of the great bay of Spirito Santo. Sixty leagues higher up, on the east side, is the river Tosona, which falls into the Mississippi, near three hundred miles out of the country, and is inhabited by the nations of the Tasones, Tonnicas, Kowronas, and others; and sixty leagues still higher is the river and nation of Chenque, with divers other tribes to the eastward. The river Onespere, about thirty leagues to the north-east of the lake, divides into two branches, the most southern of which is called the Black River, its rise being in the vast ridge of mountains running along the back of Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland. Through these mountains, there is a short passage to the sources of the great river Polomachy; and as the Indians are perfectly acquainted with all these passes, it affords them an opportunity, in conjunction with the French on the Mississippi, to insult our colonies. A variety of other rivers are specified in Mr. Coxe's description, which we shall omit, as they properly belong to Louisiana, or our provinces of Carolina, Virginia, New York, and Maryland; but it is necessary to observe, that a fine river discharges itself in the bay of Mexico, on the east side of the harbour of Pensacola, which flows a course of an hundred miles out of the country.

Fort St. Augustine.

THE only towns or fortresses possessed by the Spaniards in the whole province of Florida, are St. Augustine and St. Mattheo, against the former of which an expedition is now in agitation. St. Augustine stands on the eastern coast of the peninsula, about seventy leagues from the Gulph of Florida, and Channel of Bahama, thirty south of the river Altamaha, and forty-seven from the town and river Savannah. It is situated in latitude 30, and lies along the shore at the bottom of a hill, in the form of a parallelogram, the streets cutting each other at right angles. The fort is formed by an island, and a long point of land divided from the continent by the river, which falls into the sea two miles above the fort. About a mile to the northward of the town stands the castle, defended by four bastions, built during the last war, and reported to be considerably strong. Before the last attempts made by the English upon this place, the fortifications were very indifferent, but they were repaired on that occasion; fifty pieces of heavy cannon were mounted, sixteen of which were brass, and strong intrenchments formed. The Spaniards were scarce established in Fort St. Augustine, when they were attacked, in 1586, by Sir Francis Drake, who reduced and pillaged the fort and town. It underwent a similar fate in 1665, being attacked by captain Davis, at the head of a considerable body of buccaneers. In 1702, an attempt was made by colonel More to annex St. Augustine to the British dominions. This gentleman was governor of Carolina, and was persuaded by the assembly to undertake the conquest of what the Spaniards still possess in Florida. Considering the restrictions under which the governors of the British colonies are laid, it cannot be imagined, that the troops with which he entered upon this enterprize were considerable; in fact, they did not exceed five hundred English and seven hundred Indians, with which corps he had to march about three hundred miles by land. After destroying the farms and villages in the open country, he sat down before St. Augustine, and besieged it for three months; at the expiration of which the Spaniards, though extremely dilatory in their motions, sent some ships to the relief of the garrison, which obliged colonel More to raise the siege, and retire precipitately, just as he was on the point of accomplishing his enterprize. His retreat has been stigmatized as too hasty and favouring of timidity; for had he continued in his camp, it is more than probable the enemy would not presume to attack him, as their numbers were not considerable, and it was besides attended with this bad consequence, that, notwithstanding the war continued for the space of ten years between Great Britain and the crowns of France and Spain, the provincials of Carolina were so discouraged with their late repulse, that they never repeated the attempt. The great distance, indeed, and the difficulties under which they laboured, that are now happily removed, leave us no cause of astonishment at the conduct they pursued.

If the Spaniards dreaded the British power in Carolina, and the adjacent provinces, at so early a period, they had much more reason to be alarmed when the danger drew nearer, a colony was settled in Georgia, in the year 1733. Accordingly, the Spanish general in Florida complained of encroachments, made dispositions for a rupture, and spoke in such high terms, that all expected he would use his utmost endeavours to ruin the infant settlement; but whether it was from a sense of his own weakness, or that he received no instructions from his court, certain it is, that, in the year 1736, he thought proper to conclude a treaty with the English, for which he afterwards lost his head on his return to Spain. The last expedition against Fort St. Augustine was set on foot and conducted in the year 1740, by general Oglethorpe, who made all the preparations that circumstances would admit, though a greatly inadequate to the occasion. The Spanish governor, who was an officer of prudence and experience, having intelligence of the designs formed by the English, had augmented his garrison to near a thousand men, all well disciplined troops, and taken every precaution which his knowledge of the art of war dictated. He had in particular laid traps for general Oglethorpe, by abandoning a number of out-posts of no consequence to the defence of the place, although the general's taking possession of them served to weaken his army; a circumstance which the governor improved to such advantage, that he cut off above an hundred and thirty English posted in the negro fort, under the command of colonel Palmer. This unfortunate incident immediately turned the scale against the besiegers; to which was added the fruitless toil of erecting batteries in the island of Eustatia, which were found incapable of doing execution on the fort. Reflecting upon these circumstances, general Oglethorpe perceived that pursuing his project would answer no other purpose than that of sacrificing his troops, and giving the Spaniards greater cause of triumph, accordingly raised the siege towards the close of the month of June, and thereby blasted the sanguine expectations entertained, that our southern settlements would have been secured against any attempts of the Spaniards by land; that we should henceforward be able to annoy their commerce, and possess the most convenient station for cruising on their homeward-bound shipping from the Gulph of Florida and the Straits of Bahama, though it certainly lies too far from these streights to be so useful to that design as the Havannah, the distance being about seventy leagues. It must be observed that Fort St. Augustine, as well as the whole province of Georgia, is certainly within the English dominions, according to the limits of South Carolina, fixed in the charter of the second Charles, in the year 1665; but the Spaniards alledge that this grant is an invasion of their rights; and we have no other refuge than the claim of being the first discoverers of the country, as they never admitted the limits of that charter in any subsequent treaty.

To this account of Florida, we shall only subjoin, that St. Mattheo is situated about fifteen leagues north of Fort St. Augustine, and is a place of much less consideration, though it likewise was unsuccessfully besieged by the English, not to speak more harshly of the miscarriage of an expedition, which, in the beginning, afforded the happiest prospects. St. Mattheo.

Geographical order next brings us to describe Mexico Proper, or New Spain, the first valuable acquisition of the Spaniards on the continent of America, and that glorious monument of the courage, conduct, and perseverance of the brave and fortunate Cortez. This vast country extends for the space of twenty three degrees, from seven degrees thirty minutes, to thirty degrees forty minutes, north latitude. It is bounded on the south-east, lengthways, by the Isthmus of Darien, or Panama; and on the north-west, by New Mexico; the north and south seas washing it on both sides. Along the Pacific Ocean, it stretches above two thousand miles, and the coast toward the north sea cannot extend less than sixteen hundred miles; but the breadth of this great empire is unequal. Towards the north-west we may safely reckon it between six and seven hundred miles over; while towards the south-east, the breadth cannot exceed sixty miles. To ascertain the number of solid miles contained in the area, it will be necessary to trace the out-lines of an accurate map of the country, which we shall leave to the curious reader. Mexico, or New Spain.

The greater part of Mexico lies within the torrid zone, yet the air is temperate and healthy. As you approach the equinoctial, it necessarily grows hotter; but in no place is the atmosphere heated to such a degree as to render the climate insupportable. This arises from the land and sea-breezes, which blow alternately, and the great number of lakes and rivers, the vapours from which refrigerate the air, and render it mild, soft, and pleasant. The greatest heats are during the months of February, March, and April, when the sun is seldom obscured by clouds; and the waters are dried up in such a manner that it is difficult to meet with any in a variety of places. The rainy season begins towards the close of April, and continues till the month of September; it is always preceded by tempests or tornadoes, thunder, lightning, and hurricanes, when the wind blows almost from every point of the heavens, increasing daily in fury to the month of June, at which time the rains fall as if a second deluge was to ensue. Its extent;

No country under heaven abounds more with grain, delicious fruits, roots, and vegetables of every kind; many of which are peculiar to the country, or at least to America. The woods on the tops and declivities of mountains consist either of fine forests, or delightful groves of trees of various kinds, large, and unincumbered with brush-wood; so that a traveller may pass through them on horseback, without any inconvenience. The coasts are covered with bamboes, mangroves, log-wood, and other species of timber; either serviceable to the natives, or valuable as articles of commerce. Among the most curious species of woods in this country, may be reckoned the red and white cotton trees, the cedar, log-wood, blood-wood, mangrove, maho, of which the natives make ropes and cables, light-wood, white-wood, and other trees, equally curious and valuable. Of the fruit trees, we shall only specify the cabbage, babbage, bage, calabash, cacao, and venella, which the Spaniards call Bexuco or Bainilla, plantains, a bananas, pine-apples, sapadillo, avogato pear, mammee, mammee sapota, grape, prickles, bibby, and other curious fruit-trees; besides which the Spaniards have introduced most of the European fruits. Mexico also produces the poisonous manchineel apple, gourds of a prodigious size, melons, silk grass, tamarinds, and locust trees; the little black, white, and Ber- rachio sapotoz trees, the last of these taking its name from the inebriating quality of the fruit.

 To these we may subjoin the Grenadillo de China creeping plant, and the maykey, which furnishes the natives with thread for linnen, and cordage, and also a balsam and liquor, which, when fermented, is as pleasant and strong as wine. From this too is distilled a strong spirit, not unlike brandy. The particular description of these trees, fruits, and plants, we must leave to travellers and naturalists, it being sufficient for our purpose to observe that b they are produced in Mexico.

AMONG the valuable commodities of New Spain, may be reckoned the following drugs; namely, copal, anime, tacamahaca, caranna, liquid amber, oil of amber, balsam of Peru, also found in Mexico, guiacum, China root, sarsaparilla, and the root mechoacan; all of which are known in the shops of our retailers of medicine, and of excellent use in a variety of distempers. Besides the maiz, or native grain of Mexico, the Spaniards have introduced the use of barley, wheat, peas, beans, and other grains, pulse, roots, and vegetables, which are now to be met with in every province. Rice grows abundantly, and flourishes extremely, on account of the long wet seasons. Trees are all the year in leaf, blossom, or fruit, and every month in the year presents an appearance of Spring, Summer, and Autumn, altogether. c

THE principal commodities of New Spain are wool, cotton, sugar, silk, cochineal, chocolate, feathers, honey, balsams, drugs, dying woods, salt, tallow, hides, tobacco, ginger, amber, pearls, precious stones, gold and silver. It was an insatiable thirst after those precious metals, more than zeal for religion, which first led the Spaniards to the conquest of this country, then overflowing with the riches of the great Moteczuma. In most general accounts of New Spain, we are told that mines of gold and silver are found in the greater part of the provinces of Mexico. Of silver, it is reported, there are no fewer than a thousand different mines, but gold only in Veragua, and New Grenada; although, by the way, the latter of these provinces is entirely without the Mexican frontier, and in Terra firma; d and therefore scarcely within what constituted the limits of the empire. Notwithstanding this, they are considered as provinces of Mexico, because they are under the jurisdiction of the same viceroy. Gold is found either in the mines, or in grains at the bottom of running streams, and Acosta affirms that he has seen grains of pure gold weighing two pounds, although, in general, they seldom exceed a twentieth part of that weight. In the mine, the gold runs in veins, through a hard stone, to separate which requires great labour and expence; especially as it is generally incorporated with silver or copper. Both the mines of gold and silver are usually found in barren rocks, mountains, and such places as are entirely unfit for pasture and tillage; as if nature had wisely provided, that soil fit for bearing every thing necessary to the life of man, should not be mangled and torn in search of those metals, which generally turn to his prejudice. As we shall have occasion to touch e upon the method used by the Spaniards in refining the precious metals, when we come to describe the present state of Peru, we will here only mention that some of the mines are of an extraordinary depth. That of Pachuca is above three hundred yards deep, and above a thousand negroes are continually employed in digging. From the mine called la Trini- dada no less than forty millions of pieces of eight were drawn into the royal treasury in the space of ten years, deducting all expences. Whoever discovers a mine of gold or silver, is at liberty to work it, paying the king a tenth of the product, and limiting himself within sixty yards round the place upon which he has fixed. Beyond this space, any other person may open a mine, leaving five yards between to serve for a partition. All the silver and gold, either dug or found in grains, is entered in the royal exchequer; and it is f reported, that, notwithstanding great quantities are run and concealed, not less than two millions of silver marks, weighing eight ounces each, are entered yearly, out of which they coin seven hundred thousand marks into pieces of eight, half pieces of eight, quarter pieces, ryals, and half ryals, the value of the latter being about three pence sterling. As to the Indians, they have no coin; formerly gold and silver served them only for ornament, and now they value it only as the means of purchasing the comforts of life from their masters the Spaniards. Their whole commerce consisted in bartering one commodity for another, and with cacao-nuts they purchased things of small value.

BUT the wealth of Mexico does not entirely consist in the particulars we have mentioned;
 there are quarries of jasper, porphyry, and exquisite marble, in this country, of which the g temples and palaces of the antient inhabitants were built. In the old Spanish historians we read of the valuable jewels which adorned the crown and royal robes of Moteczuma; but their

a their names are not mentioned, and at present there are only pearls, emeralds, and turquoises, found in Mexico.

NEW SPAIN is at present inhabited by a mixed people, consisting of the native Indians; the Spaniards and other Europeans; the unmixed descendants of the Spaniards, who are called Creols; the Mestizos, or issue of the Spaniards by Americans; the Mestiches, or the issue of such issue; the Terceroons dez Indes, or the children of the last, married to Spaniards; and the Quarteroons dez Indes, whose descendants are allowed the same privileges as true Spaniards. The negroes are likewise pretty numerous, being imported from the coast of Africa for various purposes, and many of them admitted to their freedom. The issue of an European and a negro constitutes another distinction, called Mulatto; besides which there is a mixed breed of negroes and Indians, which is generally deemed the lowest rank of the people.

As to the persons of the Mexicans, they are like those of the Americans in general, tall, clean, well-proportioned, and handsome. They are active, nimble, and remarkably swift. The complexion is a deep olive; the eyes large, lively, and sparkling; the face round, and the features usually good and agreeable. All are proud of their hair either flowing loose in the wind, cut short, or twitted and plaited on the head; but this is the only hair which they suffer to remain on their bodies, the rest being pulled off by tweezers as soon as it begins to appear; and this is generally the employment of the old women, where their own sex is concerned. Some nations, indeed, within the limits of this vast empire, differ widely from the general appearance and manners of the country; a few there are who deem flat noses the greatest ornament, and practise very early upon their children to produce that beauty on the faces of their infants; while others mould their tender skulls into a conical or pyramidal form by means of compression. Almost all the Mexicans disfigure themselves with paint, or rather daubing, and anoint their bodies with oil or fat, not only to preserve the skin against the intense heat of the sun, but to render the joints supple and pliant. On the body are represented the figures of various birds and beasts; and, in times of war, many of the Mexican nations paint their faces with red, to give them a warlike, bloody appearance. In general, however, the people are clothed, tho' in a manner extremely different from the Spaniards, and still retaining part of their antient barbarousness. In Veragua there is a nation, which we have already mentioned, where the men clothe nothing besides the penis, which the vulgar wrap in a leaf, and the great enclose in cases of gold and silver, of a conical fashion. This they adorn with jewels and precious stones, letting the scrotum fall under in full view. In general, the Indians are fond of pendants, bracelets, and neck-laces; the Mexicans are so in particular, the nose, lips, ears, necks, and arms, being all adorned with pearls, and other jewels, or trinkets made of gold, silver, or some other metal. Those who live in the Spanish towns wear a short waistcoat and wide breeches, with a short cloak of various colours, resembling the Spanish dress; but their legs are bare, and only a few cover their feet with sandals. The women wear a short jacket of cotton or linen, over which flows a loose robe, or a strait petticoat, and frequently both. There are, however, such varieties in dress, depending upon fancy or necessity, that it would be endless to enter upon particulars.

Persons and habits of the Mexicans.

With respect to genius, temper, and manners, the Mexicans appear to be greatly degenerated since the conquest. Once ingenious, hospitable, generous, and civilized, except in the article of human sacrifices, they are become cruel, cowardly, treacherous, and altogether vicious and stupidly unconcerned about futurity, if we may credit Gemelli. The buildings, images, paintings, carvings, cotton cloths, manufactured feathers, and many other elegant arts, evince the genius of the antient Mexicans, and the total privation of these is equally demonstrative of the decline of that genius; nor is the cause difficult to be assigned. Their temples and images, on which they had lavished all the powers of art, being destroyed, themselves reduced to a state of servitude, and forced to labour in the mines to gratify the avarice of their new masters, it is no wonder they were effectually discouraged from cultivating any kind of talent, which could only turn to their own destruction, and gain stripes instead of rewards. Besides, the introduction of European manufactures, arts, and the implements of mechanics, made the Indians despise the inferiority of their own, all knowledge of which they soon forgot, without being able to acquire any degree of skill in the other, to the drudgery and lower branches of which they were confined. To what purpose should an Indian labour to improve talents that can serve only to make his bondage more irksome? Why should he strive to accumulate wealth, of which he knows he shall be stripped by his avaricious, arbitrary master? Hence it is that necessity renders the Mexicans mean, thievish, and pilfering; insomuch that Gemelli reports he has seen above four hundred natives take their trials before a judge, all at the same time, for burglary. The mulattoes are still more knavish; and such is the sloth, indigence, and im-

immorality, of the lower class of people, that a traveller can scarcely escape being robbed; which, by the way, shews a great defect in the Spanish police. Those Indians who have preserved their freedom in the open country and mountains, are still a brave, generous, and humane people, totally untainted with the sordid vices and corrupt manners of the inhabitants of the Spanish towns and cities. They spend their time in fishing, hunting, and field-exercise, and discover a natural spirit of generosity and humanity even towards the cruel Spaniards, who never fail to treat them with the utmost rigour, whenever the occasion offers^k. They cultivate but little soil; they sow and plant just sufficient to answer the purposes of nature, and allow nothing for the gratification of appetites founded wholly upon luxury. This is the business of the women, after the men have cleared the ground. The females execute, besides, all the domestic offices, spin, weave, and dress cotton and linen cloths for their own and their husbands apparel. They are obedient and respectful, and meet in return with all the tenderness of connubial affection; at least this is the picture given us by French and English travellers, although the Spaniards, perhaps in palliation of their own conduct, speak less favourably. They still preserve the religion of their ancestors, and are, with little alteration, what we have already described in our relation of the conquest of this empire. But, to give the reader more distinct ideas, we must descend to particulars, and treat of this country under the three divisions of Guadalajara, Mexico, and Guatemala, all under the same viceroy, but, for the convenience of government, split into audiencias, as those tribunals are called by the Spaniards.

GUADALAJARA, also called Galicia, is bounded by New Mexico on the north, by the audience of Mexico on the south-east, and by the Gulph of California on the south-west, containing a space of eight hundred miles in length, and above five hundred miles in breadth. This audience is divided into seven provinces, is the most temperate division of this empire, and in general pleasant and healthy. The capital, likewise called Guadalajara, is the seat of the royal courts of judicature, a bishop's see of considerable revenues, and pleasantly situated on the north banks of the river Barenja, and to the north of the lake Chapala, reported to be forty leagues in compass. About the year 1531, this country was first entirely reduced and colonized by the Spaniards under Nunez de Guzman, who found it inhabited by a bold, warlike people, well armed, well clothed, obstinate lovers of freedom, and who, for a long time, resisted all the power of the Spaniards. Their towns were well built, the people were comparatively civilized, and conducted their affairs, both civil and military, with great address and regularity. Notwithstanding their women were remarkably beautiful, the Spaniards charge them with a certain unnatural vice; apologizing for their own unjust usurpation and barbarous usage by raising a report that favours equally of malice and falsehood.

FORTY leagues north of the city Guadalajara stands the city Zacatecas, capital of the province of that name. It consists of about six hundred houses, and is defended by a considerable Spanish garrison, on account of the silver mines, the produce of which is lodged in the capital. The western parts of the province are celebrated for the richness of the silver mines, and the eastern for their fertility in corn, fruit, and herbage.

THE province of New Biscay is the next in situation, and is reputed to produce some of the precious metals, and to be extremely rich in corn, cattle, and the other conveniences of life. Its principal towns are St. John, and St. Barbara, concerning which we know no particulars.

NEXT in order comes the province of Cinaloa, abounding in corn, cattle, and cotton, and rendered extremely picturesque, by a number of beautiful cascades of chrystal water, which tumble down the mountains. The chief town in the province goes by the same name, and stands in twenty-six degrees of north-latitude.

THE province of Culiacan, bounded by Cinaloa on the north-west, has the Gulph of California on the opposite side, and a city of no great consideration, of the same name, for its capital.

ANOTHER province, called Chiamettan, is bounded by the foregoing on the north-west, and has for its capital the city of St. Sebastian, situated on a river of that name, and about forty miles to the eastward of the South Sea. This province is reported to contain mines of gold and silver.

THE seventh and last province of this audience is Xalisco, which hath three considerable towns; namely, the capital of the same name; Compostella, a rich town, lying in the midst of divers mines; and Santa Pecaque, where the Spaniards maintain some hundred slaves. In the year 1686, this town was plundered by the English buccaneers, of whom Dampier was one; but being attacked by a body of Spanish cavalry, they were forced to retire precipitately, with the loss of fifty men. It is affirmed, that jealousy of attracting a the attention of other nations to this defenceless audience, has prevented any Spanish writers from giving a minute description of Guadalajara; a country which abounds not only in silver, but the richest gold mines, if the accounts left by some of our buccaneers with their friends in Jamaica, may be credited. The sea-coasts are purposely deserted, that strangers may find nothing to invite them to land, or to gratify curiosity; and this precaution is deemed the more necessary as the Spaniards are not very numerous, except in the cities Guadalajara and Compostella, and the natives but too ripe for revolt, if the occasion offered. Indeed, the chief strength of the audience is in the Mextizos, who are considerable in point of property and number, extremely civilized, and a brave, hardy, warlike, people, well affected to the government. In the reduction of these, a foreign enemy would find the only difficulty; and indeed they so soon over-awe the natural inhabitants, or pure Indians, that it is a question whether these would presume to take up arms, even though they were supported by a vigorous descent. It is observable, that not only the natives but the Spaniards live to a very advanced age in Guadalajara, and the climate is daily rendered more healthy by the pains taken in clearing the woods and draining the marshes; insomuch that several towns in the audience are regarded as the Montpeliers of the Mexican empire, and visited by the sick for the recovery of their health.

WE come next to the audience of Mexico, which is beyond comparison the most valuable part of the Spanish dominions north of the Equator. On the east it is bounded by the Gulph of Mexico, on the west by the Pacific Ocean; Guadalajara forms the frontier on the north-west, and the audience of Guatemala skirts it on the east. The extent of this audience is great, its soil fruitful, its appearance beautiful, and the climate pleasant, though situated under the Torrid Zone; but in rich commodities, in gold, silver, and precious stones, it far surpasses all the rest of the empire. The variety likewise of great lakes, rivers, and sea-ports, with which it abounds, furnish it with every commercial advantage; but to acquire a just notion of the country, it will be necessary to consider it under its present division into seven provinces. The first of these is Mechoacan, bordered on the north by Panuco and Guadalajara, on the east by Panuco and Mexico Proper, on the south by the Pacific Ocean, and on the west by Guadalajara and the South Sea. The soil is admirably fertile, and the climate so wholesome, that the Spaniards imagine it is possessed of some peculiarly restorative quality, for which reason the sick and infirm flock to it from all quarters. Here are the most beautiful corn fields, the richest pastures, the most numerous herds of cattle, the finest breed of horses, and greatest abundance of fish, fowl, and game; but the commodities for which the province is celebrated, are sulphur, indigo, sarsaparilla, saffraas, indigo, cacao, venillas, ambergrease, hides, wool, cotton, silk, sugar, the root mechoacan, sometimes called white rhubarb, and silver. Some gold is likewise found in this province; but it is not so considerable as to merit a place among the native articles of commerce. Mechoacan formed an independant kingdom at the time Mexico was reduced by Cortez. The sovereign had long been the inveterate enemy of the Mexicans, who had made repeated unsuccessful attempts to reduce him, and he was considered, next to the republic of Tlascala, as the most formidable barrier against the extension of the imperial frontier. However, he submitted to the reputation of Cortez, being intimidated by the wonders he had performed with a handful of men; and thus Mechoacan became a Spanish province without striking a blow, and a valuable addition to the antient limits of Mexico. At that time the country was exceedingly populous; but the natives are since thinned, rather by the luxury and manners introduced by the Spaniards, than in consequence of their rigour. The capital of the province is the city Mechoacan, called Valadolid by the Spaniards, standing pleasantly on the banks of a large river at an inconsiderable distance from a large lake of the same name. It lies in the latitude of nineteen degrees, ten minutes, and forty-seven leagues, from Mexico; large and beautiful, adorned with a fine cathedral, full of handsome houses, the property of rich Spanish merchants, who are proprietors of the mines of Guanaxoto. Besides this city, there are other rich and handsome towns in the province; Colima in particular, situated not far from the South Sea, is reported to be spacious, well built, and populous. Navidad has a good harbour, and here the Spaniards build some of their larger shipping used in the commerce of the South Sea. To conclude, in this province are several kinds of trees remarkable for their odoriferous gums and balsams. Here are flocks of cattle and herds of swine without owners, wild boars, multitudes of hares and rabbits, and, among other quadrupeds, the bezoar goat. Ximenes alledges, there is a kind of bezoar formed in the river Mechoacan, which is washed down from the mountains, where there is great store of bole-armoniac. In the neighbourhood of Colima, cassia and the famous plant alcacazon are produced, the latter of which is reckoned a catholicon in all decayed, enervated, and emaciated constitutions. The natives apply the leaves to the parts chiefly affected, and judge of the success of the application by its sticking or falling off.

PANUCO, the next province, is bounded by Mechoacan on the west, by the Gulph on the

the east, by Tlascala and Mexico Proper on the south, and, on the north, it has part of Florida and of the audience of Guadalajara. The province is fine and extensive. It was among the first conquests of the celebrated Cortez; its inhabitants made considerable resistance; however, they have been since thoroughly bridled by a variety of Spanish cities and garrisons, which occasioned great numbers to retire to Florida, and save their liberty at the expence of all their valuable possessions. This is the principal reason why the province is so thinly peopled. Its capital Panuco, at the distance of twenty leagues from the sea, is a neat well-built town, the houses being of stone, prettily thatched with palmetto leaves. It contains five hundred families, and has a large harbour, rendered almost useless by a dangerous bar, although the river is navigable for ships of five hundred tons, it is thought, as far as the mines of Zacoticas. Cortez was the founder of this city, originally called St. Isevan del Puerto; besides which there are several towns in the province, though of no consideration.

THE next province in the audience of Mexico is Tlascala, skirted by the south or north seas. This province is also called los Angeles, and the capital bears the same name, the ancient city of Tlascala being dwindled to a pitiful village. Puebla de los Angeles, or the City of Angels, vies in magnificence with Mexico itself. It is situated in nineteen degrees of north latitude, on the river Zacatula, in a fine valley, about twenty-five leagues to the eastward of Mexico. In the middle is a beautiful spacious square, from whence run the principal streets in a direct line, which are crossed by others at right angles. One side is almost entirely occupied with the magnificent front of the cathedral, while the other three consist of piazzas, under which are the shops of tradesmen. The city is the see of a bishop, suffragan to the archbishop of Mexico, and we may form a judgment of the wealth of the inhabitants, by the revenue of the cathedral and chapter, which amounts to three hundred thousand pieces of eight annually. True it is, indeed, that the wealth of the laity bears no proportion to that of the clergy; yet still it is very great, and we may justly reckon this among the most opulent cities in the empire of Mexico. What adds exceedingly to the convenience and riches of this province, is, that here is situated the city of la Vera Cruz, or Ulva, in the gulph of Mexico, lying about seventy leagues from the city Mexico. As this is the great mart of all the Spanish trade in the North Sea, no pains have been spared to fortify a place naturally strong. Old Vera Cruz was built, as we have seen, by Cortez; but, as the situation was inconvenient, unhealthy, and defenceless, a new city was built at the distance of sixteen miles, on a safe and strong, though not capacious, harbour. At first only a fort was erected on a triangular rock, merely for the protection of the shipping in port; but the Spaniards soon began to remove their habitations thither, and, in course of time, old Vera Cruz was almost entirely forsaken by the new. Even this situation is so unhealthy, that no Spaniards of distinction make it their constant residence; though it is a place of great convenience. On the one side, it is exposed to clouds of dry sand, and, on the other, to the putrid exhalations of bogs and marshes, which impregnate the air with the most pernicious vapours. La Vera Cruz receives from Acapulco over land a prodigious quantity of East-Indian commodities, which the Spaniards dispose of chiefly in the West-Indies. It is the natural center of the American treasures; and the magazines of the greater part of all merchandize exported from New Spain, or imported from Europe. The warehouses are constantly full of European manufactures and commodities; insomuch that the trade of this city alone may be reputed nearly equal to the commerce of almost all Spanish America. The merchants in this part trade not only with Mexico, but by Mexico with the East-Indies, with Old Spain, Cuba, Yucatan, Peru, and all the interior parts of the Spanish dominions. Here the flota winters, and, on its arrival, there is a great fair held, which entirely alters the face of the city for some days; nor does it intirely cease during the stay of the flota. Writers, who have not made accurate distinctions, report that La Vera Cruz is one of the richest cities in the universe, and this is certainly true, if confined to particular periods, and the arrival of the flota; but it cannot generally be reckoned so, as most of the rich merchants reside chiefly at Los Angeles, where they keep their plate, until an opportunity offers of securing it on ship-board; a necessary precaution, as experience evinces the possibility of surprising this harbour, the French and Dutch buccaneers having taken it in the year 1683, and the number of inhabitants not exceeding four thousand men, including slaves, upon whom there is no great dependance in case of an attack.

THE province of Guaxaca, having the Gulph on the north, Tabasco on the east, and the Pacific Ocean on the south, is one of the best situated provinces in the audience of Mexico. It produces great abundance of those valuable commodities, venillas and cochineal; yet, though the soil be fertile, and the climate tolerable, the province is but thinly inhabited, for which we can assign no reasons; especially, as it is furnished with excellent ports. Among these may be reckoned Guatulco, or Aquantulco, situated on the South Sea, a safe and coma commodious harbour, now intirely abandoned; because it had been frequently plundered by pirates and privateers. The capital of this province is Guaxata, standing upon the river Alvarado, which flows through the beautiful valley that bears the name of the province.

To the eastward of this province stands that of Tabasco, extending along the Gulph of Mexico, and inconsiderable in its dimensions. Neither the soil nor the climate are inviting; yet it is tolerably well inhabited, because it produces great abundance of fruit, and excellent pasturage, by which means, they make great profits of their cattle. The principal, and indeed the only, town worth mentioning, stands in the eastern corner of the province, and is called by the Spaniards Neustra Señora de la Vittoria.

b THE three remaining divisions of the audience of Mexico, except the province of Mexico Proper, which we reserve for a more particular description, are the provinces of Yucatan, Chiapa, and Soconusco. The first is a peninsula in the Bay of Mexico, situated between the bays of Campeachy and Honduras. The chief produce consists in cotton, salt, and log-wood; and the only town possessed by the Spaniards on this extensive coast, that deserves any notice, is Campeachy. Its situation, exposed to the sea, gives it a fine appearance, and this is encreased by a strong citadel placed at one end, and mounted with several pieces of heavy cannon; notwithstanding which, Campeachy was taken in 1659, by Sir Christopher Mims, who, though he was advised to make use of fraud, marched boldly up to the walls, with drums beating and colours flying, telling his men, "that he came not to steal, but to gain a victory." As to Chiapa, it is an inland province, fertile, and well-stocked with cattle; but neither rich nor populous, its whole trade consisting in an exchange of commodities with the neighbouring provinces. The metropolis of the province is called Ciudad Real, situated about the sixteenth degree of north latitude, at equal distances from the North and South Seas. Here the courts of judicature are held, and it is a bishop's see; but it is neither rich, populous, nor splendid. With respect to the province of Soconusco, it has nothing, either in its productions, commerce, buildings, or inhabitants, to merit the attention of the reader, who peruses books for the sake of improvement.

c THE case is otherwise with the provinces of Mexico Proper, the finest country in the Spanish dominions to the north of the Equator, and incontrovertably the richest in the audience of Mexico. It is reported to exceed all the provinces of America in extensive, beautiful vallies, rich arable lands, and delicious pasturage. Fruits are in the greatest variety, perfection, and abundance; the great lakes, rivers, and the neighbourhood of the sea, afford fish of every kind. In a word, it enjoys every external and internal advantage, being washed towards the south by the Pacific Ocean, by which means the inhabitants trade with the other maritime provinces, while the richness of the country furnishes every article of commerce, and the roads, lakes, and rivers, every requisite of domestic industry and intercourse. The climate is indeed variable: strangers complain of its excessive heat, while the natives frequently shiver with cold; however both, who are blessed with sound constitutions, agree that it is temperate and pleasant in general. The soil is so fruitful, that notwithstanding the great abundance of money, and the external luxury of the Mexicans, the necessities of life are exceedingly reasonable, which affords a pregnant proof of the plenty that reigns in the provinces. The silver mines are much richer than those of Mechoacan, or indeed of any other province of the empire, and their value is still augmented by their containing a considerable portion of gold.

d THE royal city of Mexico is now the capital of the audience, and of all New Spain, as it formerly was of the Mexican empire. The situation is now, where it always was, in the midst of the great lake of Mexico; the Spaniards not thinking it necessary to desert a city so well built and magnificent. In point of regularity it exceeds all the cities in the universe, the streets being so strait and exactly disposed, that from any part of the town the whole is visible. The Spanish writers place it in nineteen degrees forty minutes, north latitude, but most other writers twenty minutes more to the northward. The want of gates, walls, and artillery, together with the great causeways leading to the city, renders Mexico extremely remarkable. All the buildings are convenient, but the publick edifices are magnificent. Here are twenty-nine cathedrals and churches, and twenty-two monasteries and nunneries, of the opulence of which we may form some judgment from the revenue of the grand cathedral that amounts to near eighty thousand pounds a year, out of which the archbishop has fifteen thousand pounds annually, besides vast sums that arise by way of perquisites. All the inhabitants are indeed immensely wealthy; and nothing can convey a higher idea of the vast grandeur and riches of Mexico, than the prodigious quantities which are daily exposed to sale in the streets of the most valuable commodities of Europe and Asia.

e THE great square in the middle of the town is extremely magnificent, and the palace of the marquis de Valle, as it is called, one of the noblest pieces of architecture any where to be met with. It is built in the very spot where formerly stood the palace of Moteczuma, and occupies nearly the same space. Several of the hospitals are superb; but what most strikes the eye of a traveller is the vast abundance of silver, gold, and jewels, exposed in plate and toys in the streets by the goldsmiths and shopkeepers. A sensible writer of our own country gives the following method of calculating the wealth of Mexico, which very well answers that purpose, as the account is by no means exaggerated, though different from many other writers. The king's duty from the mines, which ought to be one fifth of the whole, brought into the royal exchequer, in the year 1730, more than a million of marks of silver, at eight ounces to the mark; so that the inhabitants draw annually from the bowels of the earth above ten millions of money, without reckoning the vast sums secreted in order to defraud the king of his rights. Yet with these almost incredible treasures the people may be reckoned poor, as most of them live beyond their fortunes, and terminate a life of profusion in the most wretched indigence. The military power of Mexico is inconceivably low, there not being more than four or five hundred men about the viceroy's person, owing possibly to the jealousy of the Spanish government; for otherwise the viceroy might be much better provided against all danger at a very inconsiderable expence. The great dread indeed of the ministry, since the days of Cortez, has been lest the American governors should throw off the yoke, claim independency, and endeavour to establish a sovereign dominion in America; a dread which, we may venture to pronounce, is wholly imaginary. It might, however, be dangerous to put arms into the hands of this unruly people, especially as Mexico is but little exposed to the invasion of foreigners; for nothing is more common than to see the mob, upon the slightest grievance, threaten to burn the royal palace, and tear the viceroy to pieces.

It might reasonably be imagined, that the extraordinary multitude of people contained in the metropolis, which is reported to amount to near three hundred thousand souls, would prevent any other towns in the province from attaining to a pitch of grandeur; but the case is otherwise, for besides Petallan and Cataiutbi, which are maritime places of some consequence, there are the towns of Ostuma, Tasco, Cazruabaca, Atlisco, with several more, scattered up and down the province; and there are, even upon the lake, some handsome cities, within sight of Mexico: whence we may judge, that notwithstanding this country was stripped of myriads of its inhabitants by the sword, famine, pestilence, servitude, and all the miseries consequent on the Spanish conquest, yet that it is still populous. Next to the capital, the most considerable town, at least in point of commerce, is Acapulco, standing in seventeen degrees north latitude, in a bay of the South Sea, about two hundred and ten miles south-east from Mexico. The haven is large, commodious, and capable of containing several hundred large ships; and the entrance is secured by a flat island running across, at each end of which is a deep channel, sufficiently broad for the greatest vessels. The only inconvenience is, that ships must enter by the sea wind, and go out by the land breeze, which seldom fail to succeed each other alternately; so that frequently they are blown off to sea, after repeated attempts to make the harbour. The town is large, but ill built; and the considerable extent of the place hath occasioned false conclusions as to its wealth and importance. The great trade carried on with the East Indies and Peru requires such a multitude of warehouses, as would alone make no inconsiderable town; but Acapulco is poor and mean-looking, because the principal inhabitants retire from the sea-coast, except when business requires their immediate attendance, and the houses are built slightly on account of the frequent earthquakes to which this country is exposed. Besides the climate is exceedingly unhealthy, sweeping off great numbers of the inhabitants every year; it is always fatal to strangers, unless the greatest care be taken to conform to the necessary regimen, and not to expose the body to unwholesome dews and damps. Opposite to the town, on the east side, is a lofty strong castle, said to be mounted with forty pieces of very large cannon, and the ships ride near the bottom of the harbour, under the command both of the castle and platform; so that this place is by no means so accessible as is commonly imagined.

THERE is a general mistake with respect to the commerce between Acapulco and Peru, that it is confined to the annual ship from Lima. This ship arrives about Christmas, and all the rest of the year the trade is open, ships continually passing and repassing, from one part to the other with the commodities of their several countries. It is true, that Acapulco derives its chief importance from the annual Lima and Manilla ships; whence arises the mistake that no other shipping comes into this harbour. All the intercourse which the Philippine islands have with the rest of the world is by means of Acapulco, without we except the ships sent to these islands by our traders in the East Indies. For these forty years past, the Manilla trade has been carried on by two large ships, one laden with goods, and the other serving chiefly the purposes of a convoy. The galleon is generally about 1200

- a or 1000 tons burthen, while the convoy is a frigate mounting thirty-six or forty guns. What the intention of that strict regulation may be, whereby the inhabitants are obliged to send no more than this annual ship, we cannot presume to determine. The galleon is freighted with all the rich merchandize of the East; such as ambergrease, civet, bezoar, oriental pearl, piece goods, and gold-dust, to the value of fifteen hundred thousand pounds sterling; and we may conjecture what the profits of the voyage are, from the emoluments arising to the captain, which are reckoned worth forty thousand pieces of eight, twenty thousand to his chief mate, and a thousand to the meanest seaman. The truth is, these profits are purchased at the expence of great danger and fatigue, this being the longest possible voyage from land to land; for except touching at Guam, one of the Ladrones, the ship makes three thousand leagues, during which tedious course nothing besides the sea and sky is visible to the mariners. At Acapulco she meets with the Quira ship laden with the richest produce of Peru, and at least two millions of pieces of eight, to be laid out in the purchase of India commodities; upon which occasion there is a great fair, which lasts commonly for a month. Now the town is populous and gay, being crowded with the richest merchants of Mexico, Peru, and even of Chili, who come hither to provide themselves in whatever they want, either for the purposes of luxury or of commerce. All the houses in the town are not sufficient to lodge half the strangers, who are therefore provided with tents, which they pitch in the neighbourhood in the form of a large encampment. It is supposed that the Manilla galleon carries off from Acapulco at least ten millions of dollars for the purchase of goods, and the payment of the Spanish garrisons in the Philippine islands. Formerly the galleon went one year, and returned the third; but the trade is so much encreased, that the returns are quicker, and the burthen of the vessel greatly encreased.

BEFORE we conclude the description of this province, it may be necessary to shew in what manner the trade is carried on between Mexico and Europe. In the month of August, a fleet, consisting of eight large galleons, loaded with merchandize, chiefly on the king's account, and mounting fifty guns, and about sixteen merchantmen fraught with the goods of private adventurers, set sail from the port of Cadiz, in Old Spain, for the Spanish Main. This fleet of galleons is distinguished from the flota, because the former is employed chiefly in carrying military stores to Peru, Mexico, and the Spanish islands; whereas the latter is fraught chiefly with merchandize. The cargo brought back to Europe by the flota is not so rich as that of the galleons, though it is said to encrease annually. As soon as the galleons and flota arrive at the Havannah, the flotilla, so called because it is composed of the lightest and cleanest vessels, is detached to Europe, with a considerable quantity of money and merchandize, but principally with an exact account of the cargoes of the homeward bound galleons and flota, that the court may be able to judge of the requisite convoy, according to the value and the danger; as well as to regulate the indulto proper to be levied on the merchants, according to their respective interests in cargoes (P).

- THE last audience in the kingdom of Mexico is Guatemala, a fine country, inferior to the audience of Mexico in nothing except in flourishing cities, and as capable of improvement as any part of Spanish America. It contains about a thousand miles in length from the north-west to the south-east, being bounded by the audience of Mexico, and the bay of Honduras, on the north; by the North Sea, and some of the provinces of North America, on the east; and, on the south-east, being bounded by the Pacifick Ocean, thus enjoying every advantage of situation with respect to commerce. Some writers place the provinces of Chiapa and Soconusco in this audience, and some in the audience of Mexico; as we think this matter of very little consequence to the reader, we have followed the latter, almost without any cause for preference. The first province, therefore, according to this disposition, into which the audience of Guatemala is divided, bears the same name, extending itself along the coast of the South Sea, for the space of one hundred leagues, having the provinces of Vera Paz and Honduras on the north, Nicaragua on the east, the sea on the south, and the province of Soconusco to the westward. The country is mountainous, filled with volcanos, and subject

(P) As we have touched upon this subject, it may not be amiss to specify what is intended by a register-ship, which takes its name from being registered with all the effects in books kept for that purpose in the chamber of Seville. These register ships go every year to Buenos Ayres, St. Martha, Porto Cavallo, and other places neither frequented by the flota nor galleons; yet they generally return and go out with them, perhaps to save the government the expences of different convoys. When a set of merchants find that European commodities are much wanted in any part of America, or the West-Indies, they petition the council of the Indies for leave to send a ship of three hundred tons, or under, to such a port; and having obtained permission, they pay a sum, from 30 to 50000 pieces of eight to the crown, besides presents of considerable value to the king's officers. The ship and cargo are registered, to prevent any species of fraud; yet she is generally twice the burden specified in the licence, and contains double the cargo entered. When such glaring frauds are permitted in the Spanish ports by the king's own officers; need we admire that the endeavours of court to prevent an illicit trade with the West-Indies, have been vain and fruitless?

to earthquakes and dreadful fiery eruptions. It abounds, however, with rich and fertile a valleys, equally pleasant and healthy, notwithstanding it does not frequently rain for a whole year in some parts of the province. The pastures are so admirable, that the multitudes of cattle are incredible; but the principal commodities are corn, rich dying drugs, sugar, sugar-cane, and cotton. Great quantities of bees-wax are likewise exported out of this province. St. Jago de Guatemala, standing in fourteen degrees north latitude, about nine leagues from the South Sea, is the capital. Formerly this was among the noblest cities in New Spain, before it was destroyed in 1541, by a dreadful hurricane, in which an hundred and twenty thousand Spaniards and natives lost their lives. Never appeared a more terrible and awful scene than this; the day preceding a prodigious noise was heard from the bowels of the volcano, seated in the mountain above the city, which was succeeded in the night by a furious explosion, as if the earth had discharged all her bowels; and a torrent of water issuing from the mountain that swept all before it, and carried off houses and inhabitants. The horror of the scene was heightened by one of the most dreadful earthquakes ever felt in any part of the globe. New Guatemala, the present capital of the audience and province, the residence of the president and royal courts, the seat of a bishop, and the center of commerce in these parts, is situated in a beautiful plain at a good distance from the fatal volcano; however, all the precautions cannot secure it against the dreadful earthquakes, so frequent in this country. It is, nevertheless, well-built and well-inhabited, the citizens trafficking largely, not only with all the provinces of Mexico, but even with Peru. In this way immense fortunes are raised, with which the parties then retire to the neighbourhood of the capital of the empire, to spend the remainder of their days in the fullest enjoyment of riches. c

THE other places of any consideration in this province are La Trinidad or Sonsonate, situated in a bay of the South Sea, about two miles to the south-east of the capital, containing about five hundred Spanish families, besides Indians and mulattoes; St. Michael, another sea-port town, to the eastward of the former, having about six hundred families; and Amapalla, standing upon a fine bay to the eastward of St. Michael, with above a hundred Spanish families, who trade largely in cochineal, cocoa, hides, indigo, and the other commodities of the province.

BETWEEN the gulph of Honduras, and the province of Guatemala, lies the province of Vera Paz, so called because the natives submitted without resistance, and maintained the treaty made with the Spaniards religiously. The extent of this province is but forty-eight leagues in length, and about half that breadth; nor is it remarkable, either for being populous or fertile, to which the woodiness of the country, and the frequency of earthquakes, are great and insuperable impediments. As to the climate, the Spanish writers affirm, that half the province is very pleasant, healthy, and temperate, while the other half is insupportably hot; the air participating of all the bad qualities which can be expected from heat and moisture. With all these inconveniencies, the Spaniards find it worth maintaining, upon account of the admirable medicinal gums, dying drugs, and other valuable commodities produced here in abundance. Formerly there was gold in the Gulfo dulce, but now it is either exhausted, or so scarce as not to reward the trouble of searching. The capital is Vera Paz, a city pretty enough, but not magnificently built, and emblematical of the real situation of the inhabitants, who enjoy a sufficiency to live at ease, without opulence or grandeur. This town is also called Cobon by some modern travellers and geographers. e

HONDURAS province, lying from west to east considerably above a hundred leagues in length, and near eighty in breadth, is the next in situation. On the north it is skirted by the bay of Honduras, and on the east by the North Sea: it has on the south, the provinces of Nicaragua and Guatemala, and is bounded on the west by Vera Paz. No part of this continent is more healthy and fruitful; corn is abundant, the pastures rich, and the cattle numerous. Several rivers overflow their banks, and greatly increase the fertility of the province, which likewise furnishes divers valuable articles of commerce; such as Vigonia wool, cotton, wax, sugar, pearls, log-wood, gold and silver; but these two last particulars in no great abundance: nor are the pearls, found upon the coasts of the island of that name, at all so plentiful as formerly, and indeed the fisheries are much neglected. With all these advantages the country is by no means populous, the Spaniards having almost extirpated the original inhabitants, in revenge for their not discovering the rich gold mines, which they supposed were situated in the province, because they saw the natives adorned with trinkets made of the precious metals. There is indeed some silver dug in the mountains, which the Spaniards refine in Valladolid, the capital of the province, which the Indians call Comoagua. This city stands in fourteen degrees of north latitude, upon a river, which falls into the gulph of Honduras after a long course. It is now a bishop's see, removed in 1558 from Truxillo, and for an inland town, is rich, populous, and handsome. Truxillo is the only sea-port of consequence belonging to the province of Honduras, unless we except Porto Cavallo, chiefly f a chiefly famed for being the port of the city Guatemala, to and from which, all commodities are carried on horseback by a road cut in many places through the living rock. According to most geographers it lies without the limits of Honduras.

We come now to the province of Nicaragua, of which we have made frequent mention in relating the first expeditions of the Spaniards to the continent of America. It is washed both by the North and South Seas. The air is clear and healthy; the soil excellent and the whole country finely diversified with mountains, valleys, extensive lakes, and beautiful savannahs, or meadows, on which feed numerous herds of cattle. Corn, timber, wax, tar, cordage, and sugar are the principal commodities; but the province is so well furnished with all the necessaries of life, and so pleasant, that it is frequently called the Mohammedan Paradise. What adds equally to the beauty and convenience of Nicaragua is a delightful lake of the same name, that runs across from within twenty miles of the South Sea, until it discharges itself by a pleasant canal into the North Sea, at the entrance of which is the port of St. Juan. The tides rise quite up to the lake; so that every species of fish, peculiar to fresh and salt water, is found here in great abundance, almost together. Happy it is for the natives, that their country produces no mines; for otherwise their bonds must have been drawn tighter, and their lives destroyed in digging for the precious metals, to glut the avarice of their masters. For this reason, both the Spaniards and Indians employ themselves in husbandry and agriculture, for which no part of America affords more encouragement. They have erected divers manufactures, with which they draw large quantities of gold and silver from the other provinces; and hence it is observed, even among the Spaniards, that the industry of Nicaragua is the most permanent and secure treasure; because the money drawn from it remains in the country. It is also observed, that a more free and bold spirit of liberty reigns here than in any other of the Spanish provinces; for the people constantly refuse to stoop or truckle to oppressive governors. The capital is called Leon, and frequently the whole province is distinguished by the appellation of New Leon. This city stands in a sandy plain, directly on the edge of the lake, and at the distance of twenty miles from the Pacific Ocean. Round it are several beautifully enamelled meadows, though the spot in which it is immediately situated be dry and barren. It is the see of a bishop, and hath, besides a handsome cathedral, several churches and monasteries, with divers private buildings of magnificent appearance. The Spanish inhabitants do not exceed a thousand, but the city is pretty populous if we include all the natives, who live with more conveniency and under more regular social institutions, than in any other town in the Spanish American dominions; because the Spaniards do not require that servitude from the Indians, which they absolutely refuse to their own governors. In 1685, the buccaneer captains, Swan and Townly, attacked, plundered, and destroyed this city to the ground; but it has since been rebuilt with more lustre and beauty than before.

BESIDES the capital, this province is adorned with the handsome city of Granada, which carries on great trade by the lake to Carthagena. The buildings are splendid and elegant, every thing bearing the marks of wealth and industry; the latter of which is, through the misconduct of the government, turned into an illicit channel, the great part of the commerce of the lake consisting in smuggling. The Spaniards, indeed, discover such an attachment to ancient customs, that projects of the utmost advantage to the community have been rejected, merely because they were novel; nor can a stronger instance of this weak prejudice be given, than that the manner of navigating and constructing vessels on the lake, are directly the same they were before the improvements made in ship-building, and the art of sailing. The very constitution of the people seems to be altered with the climate; for we see the descendants of those bold, enterprising, and active conquerors, who hesitated at no danger, and stickled at no difficulty for pain and glory, now degenerated into a slow, cautious, unambitious, dastardly race, devoid of every principle of virtue and public spirit, and tamely suffering themselves to be trampled upon by their governors. One more place there is in the province of Nicaragua that deserves notice; this is Rialta, an excellent port on the South Sea, situated in a plain, by the side of a river. It stands twenty miles west of the capital Leon, and serves not only the purposes of a port to this city and province, but likewise to Guatemala, with which it carries on a very considerable trade. Dampier acquaints us that the situation is unhealthy, and reckons this the principal obstruction to its becoming populous and important.

THE province more immediately contiguous to Nicaragua, is that to which the Spaniards have given the name of Costa Rica, or the Rich Coast; and yet the communication is interrupted by an exceeding rough country, and a long chain of mountains, which run across it from east to west. It stands to the northward of Nicaragua, being hemmed in by the Pacific on the south, and by the province of Veragua on the west. The country is barren and mountainous, but it gained its name from the valuable pearls found on the coast, for which the Spaniards still maintain a fishery (Q). Cartbage, generally called Cartbago by the Spaniards, is the capital; but the city stands forty miles within land, is poor in trade, and inconsiderable in point of wealth and inhabitants. Nicoya, which is considered as only the second town in point of dignity; is beyond comparison more opulent, because it has a communication by rivers with the bay of that name, much frequented by the Spanish shipping (R).

It has been usual to class the provinces of Costa Rica and Veragua in the audience of Guatemala, and we have reason to believe they absolutely come within the jurisdiction of this tribunal; yet the ingenious Don Antonio de Ulloa places the latter within the division of Terra Firma, without taking the least notice of what is asserted by all other writers. We shall, however, adhere to the old division, and reckon Veragua a Mexican province. It is skirted by both seas, has in the east a part of Terra Firma, and the gulph of Panama; and, on the west, the province of Costa Rica. The country is mountainous, and unfit for culture, extending about fifty leagues in length, and twenty-five in breadth. The vast woods, which cover the country, add great beauty to the country, but no way improve the natural unwholesomeness of the climate. Indeed, such is the barrenness of Veragua, in all the productions necessary to life, that the Spaniards would certainly abandon it, but for the great quantities of gold found in the rivers, especially after floods of rain. In this particular, Veragua alone is more abundant than all Mexico, if we may credit some of the latest travellers. There are likewise some gold mines in the heart of the country; near Santa Fe; and the bars of gold, made out of the pure gold of the rivers, and extracted from the mines, is reported to amount to an immense revenue. The city of the Conception is reputed the capital, and is a large, rich, populous, and flourishing town, standing not far from the coast of the North Sea. Forty miles within the province stands the town of Santa Fe, considerable only for the gold mines in the neighbourhood. Puebla Nova is reputed to be a place of considerable extent, seated upon a river that discharges itself into the South Sea. —As we cannot specify every little town in each district, or even descend to a minute description of the larger places, the reader must be contented with this general delineation, since we profess to write a history, and not a geographical account of the countries of which we treat; adding a concise view of the present state of each, merely for the further satisfaction of the publick.

(Q) It is likewise more than probable that the great quantities of gold, of which the natives were possessed when the Spaniards first arrived on that coast, gave the adventurers the highest opinion of the wealth of the country; but as this gold was chiefly found in their rivers, the quantity decreased in proportion as the people were diminished, who used to search for it with more diligence than since it subjected them to the dominion of the Spaniards.

(R) The Spaniards trade from hence to Panama, in salt, maiz, wheat, fowls, and the purple juice of a shell-fish, found in the neighbouring bay. This may possibly be the antient murex, which, however, we cannot possibly affirm, because we can find no description of the animal, nor of the juice, any more than that it dyes wool of a fine purple, which the Spaniards use in their Segovia cloth. They call the fish Porpura, and it is described as not eatable, living for the space of seven years, and always hiding itself about the rising of the dog-star. Here also the shell is converted into a slimy soft wax, used by the dyers. We shall speak of the fish more particularly, when we come to describe Punta de St. Elena. (1)

Containing a short description and account of the present state of Terra Firma, called also the New or Golden Castile; and of Peru and Chili, Buyenos Ayres, Paraguay, Brasil, &c. In which the commodities and curiosities of each province are specified.

THIS vast peninsula, extending itself from the Isthmus of Darien to Cape Horn, in the form of a triangle, of which the Terra Magellanica and the Cape form the vertex; goes by the general name of Peruviana, which includes the whole of South America, although all the countries included within these limits do not acknowledge the dominion of the crown of Spain. The heart of the country hath not yet been reduced, or at least civilized; the Portuguese are in possession of a large tract, and some other nations have found means to establish themselves on the skirts of this noble empire. On the North Sea, the Spanish territories reach no farther than the Equinoctial; on one side; and commence again at Rio de la Plata, on the other, the fine country of Brasil occupying the middle place; and from this river quite to the Straits of Magellan, the Spaniards rather claim than possess a real dominion. Indeed the territories already in their hands are of such extent; and afford such vast treasures, that they have no temptation to make either conquests or discoveries; and, as the Portuguese are much in the same situation, with respect to Brasil, we may infer that there is a tract of interior undiscovered country, stretching for near two thousand miles from east to west, and above a thousand from north to south; part of which is only known even to the Jesuits, who have established themselves in Paraguay. The inhabitants consist not only of the natives, who first possessed the country, but of vast numbers of other Indians, driven by the cruelty of the European conquerors to seek repose and shelter in those remote parts. If we consider their multitudes, and the natural strength and situation of the country, it is highly probable, these barbarians will always preserve their liberty, unless they should happen to yield to the address of the Jesuit missionaries, who have, by dint of civil policy and religion, erected a more firm and permanent empire, without shedding a drop of blood, than the court of Spain has after the slaughter of millions; yet there is the greatest reason to believe, that it is infinitely rich in gold, silver, jewels, drugs, fruits, cattle, corn, and every conveniency of life and commerce.

THOUGH the Spanish dominions in South America are subject to one governor, stiled viceroy and captain-general, titles which have sometimes been disjoined by writers, and assigned to different persons, yet as it would be impossible to govern immediately territories of such vast extent and so remote from each other; his jurisdiction is therefore divided into several audiences, such as Panama, Terra Firma, Chuquisaca, Quito, Lima and Chili; of each of which we shall treat separately. Over these audiences, which are composed of a president and council, the viceroy enjoys only a pre-eminence, with a reservation in cases of appeal. We may compare an audience to a French parliament; each consists of judges appointed by the king of Spain, and a number of inferior officers dependant on them; the whole under a direction of a president. The business of these two tribunals is transacted by four chambers, called the chamber of justice, the criminal court, the exchequer, and the chamber of treasure, the various departments and proper business of which are implied in the names. Commonly the viceroys and presidents hold their authority for the space of seven years; and the inferior magistrates for four or three years, though the viceroy has power to renew their commissions, upon their exhibiting proofs of the able and honest discharge of their duty; a scheme of policy, which, at the same time that it is advantageous to the crown, is productive of the greatest miseries to the people. It prevents the great officers from establishing too extensive an influence within their several jurisdictions, but it encourages the subaltern magistrates to fleece and oppress; they know their power is only of short duration, and they lose no opportunity of making their fortunes at the expence of principle and reputation. They regard this season as a kind of harvest, which occurs but once in a life-time; and thus the royal officers are generally a set of legal thieves, and the rulers of the people only a succession of robbers screened by authority, and guarded against all inquiry by the royal mandate. The stated appointment of the viceroy of Peru is, notwithstanding the great dignity of the employment, no more than forty thousand pieces of eight per ann. but then he has occasional salaries and perquisites which exceed all computation; for this reason these employments are usually bestowed on favourite noblemen of broken fortune, who by this means soon lay up sufficient resources for new scenes of luxury and dissipation.

THE province of Terra Firma is a very extensive country, being bounded by Pern, the country of Amazons, and part of Guiana, on the south; by the river Oroonoko on the south-east; by the North Sea on the north and east: and by the South Sea on the west, where the Isthmus of Darien also divides it from Mexico. From east to west, it extends above 1300 miles, and is about 750 in breadth from north to south, though these dimensions are extremely unequal, on account of the curvatures of the great river Oroonoko. Sometimes the province of Guiana is included in the division of Terra Firma; however, as it is not within the jurisdiction of the same governors, or indeed under the dominion of the Spaniards, we propose treating it in a separate article. The Spaniards have made such frequent alteration not only in the names, but in the boundaries of the several provinces in South America, that it is not easy to ascertain their exact jurisdictions. Terra Firma, also called New Castile, or Castile del Oro, from the quantities of gold found in the district of Uraba, and other parts, was first discovered by the celebrated Columbus in his third voyage, as we have already related. We have seen the changes which happened in the government of this country, and the misfortunes and hardships to which the Spaniards were exposed through their own insolence to the natives, treachery to each other, and general misconduct. The climate is neither pleasant nor healthy; one part of the year the inhabitants are scorched by the most intense and burning heat, and the other, almost drowned with perpetual floods of rain, pouring from the sky with such violence, as if a general deluge was to ensue. In so large a tract of country the soil must necessarily vary; accordingly in some parts of New Castile, though the trees put forth a perfect verdure, yet they bear scarce any fruit. In others, the soil is so fertile naturally, that it scarce requires the assistance of the husbandman to produce two harvests; while, at the same time, the meadows are stocked with the most beautiful herds of cattle. The mountains abound with tigers, it is reported with lions, and great numbers of other wild beasts; the rivers, seas, and lakes teem with fish, and the bowels of the earth were once furnished with the richest treasures, now almost exhausted. The same may be said of the pearl fisheries on the coasts, which now yield nothing equal to their former profits. The natives have never been thoroughly subdued, and probably never will, as they are not only a gallant warlike people, but have almost impregnable fastnesses to retreat to, and bear an inveterate hatred to the Spaniards; yet there is little appearance that they can ever again acquire the entire dominion of their own country by the expulsion of the strangers. They are not cordially affected to any European nations, as may be perceived by the expeditions of the buccaneers, of whose assistance they made use against the Spaniards, without expressing any inclination to suffer them to settle in the country; and yet this is the only prospect they have of getting rid of that particular nation, for which they entertain the most invincible aversion.

NEW CASTILE, or Terra Firma, is divided into the following districts or governments; namely, the Isthmus of Darien, or Terra Firma Proper, Cartagena, Santa Martha, Rio de la Hacha, Venezuela, New Grenada, New Andalusia, and the province of Popayan. The most northern of these is that country lying between the Gulph of Darien and Mexico, along the coast of the North and South Seas, particularly distinguished by the name of Darien. It is that narrow neck of land which forms South and North America, by some writers called the Isthmus of Panama, extending in the form of a crescent round the bay of Panama, for about three hundred miles in length, and sixty in breadth, from the North Sea to the Pacific; which situation, together with the gold mines, gold sands, and fine pearls found here, renders the province invaluable. The land is generally rough, but beautifully variegated with mountains and valleys, woods and rivers, brooks and perennial springs, that discharge themselves in the North and South Seas; which are separated by a ridge of mountains. Great floods of rain fall in this country, which some ascribe to its situation between two seas; they begin towards the close of April, and pour down without intermission to the middle of the month of August, or of September, when they abate and yield gradually to the fair season. The principal rivers are the Darien, which, after a course of near a hundred miles, falls into the North Sea near Golden Island; the river Conception, which discharges itself in the same sea, opposite to one of the Santalloe islands; and the Chagre, the most frequented by mariners, which forms a harbour about ten leagues west of Porto Bello. Into the South Sea fall the Santa Maria, on the south-side of the bay of Panama; the Congo to the northward of Santa Maria; and the Cheapo, which empties itself seven leagues to the westward of Panama. All these rivers are navigable, but their utility for the purposes of commerce is greatly diminished by bars, which run across the mouths of each, and admit only of small vessels.

Puerto Bello.

NOMBRE DE DIOS was the first settlement made by the Spaniards in this province, which rose in a short time to a flourishing city, and would have continued so, in despite of the climate and unwholesome situation, had it not been repeatedly destroyed by the English, which obliged the inhabitants to look out for a more safe and commodious situation. This gave birth

■ birth to Porto Bello, standing in $9^{\circ} 34'. 35''$. north latitude; the harbour of which was first discovered by Christopher Columbus, and so named from its beauty. It was in 1584, that a colony was first planted here by order of Philip II. The town lies close to the sea, on the declivity of a mountain, which surrounds the whole harbour. Most of the houses are built with wood, they do not exceed a hundred and thirty in number; and are ranged into one long street, which runs the whole length of the town, and is divided by several lanes and ialets to the harbour. Besides this street are two handsome squares, chiefly of stone, in one of which the governor usually takes up his residence. All the inhabitants do not amount to three thousand, half of whom are Indians, mulattoes or negroes; the Spaniards of any substance not chusing to reside in a place so extremely unhealthy and fatal, even to the lives of the natives. Until of late years, the air of Porto Bello was supposed to be remarkably unfavourable to parturition; and it was customary with the Spanish women to remove, about the third or fourth month of pregnancy, to the opposite side of the isthmus, to be delivered at Panama. It has even been a generally received opinion, that animals brought to Porto Bello cease to procreate; but Ulloa affirms no more, than that the cattle removed hither from Panama or Carthagena, lose their flesh so fast in the best pastures, as to become scarce eatable; and he lays it down for certain, that neither horses nor asses are bred here, which serves to confirm the notion, that this climate checks the generation of animals produced in a less noxious atmosphere. The heat, indeed, is here excessive, which, joined to the moisture of the rainy season, may possibly enervate the system, and relax the solids, so as to render animals unfit for procreation; but we would not chuse to reason too much upon a fact, not yet sufficiently established. The torrents of rain are so dreadful, sudden, and impetuous, as to threaten a second deluge; and they are usually accompanied with such tempests of thunder and lightning, as must daunt even the most resolute, the noise being prolonged by repercussions from the mountains, like the explosion of cannon, the rumbling of which is heard for some time after. To this may be added, the shrieks and howlings of the multitudes of monkeys of all kinds, which inhabit the surrounding woods, and encrease the horror of the scene. Great pains have been taken to fortify the town and harbour, yet no place has been more unfortunate than Porto Bello; which, in 1595, was taken and ransomed by Sir Francis Drake; in 1601, was surpris'd by Capt. Parker; in 1669, by Capt. Morgan; in 1671, by Capt. Croxon; and, in 1739, was taken by Admiral Vernon; a petty conquest, which was extolled with as much noise as if he had reduced Peru and Mexico. Except during the fair, opened on the arrival of the galleons, the place is very inconsiderable; and indeed, at no time of importance, but for the harbour, which is extremely beautiful and commodious for every kind of shipping. The entrance is wide, but well defended by Fort St. Philip de Todo Fierro, standing upon the north point of the channel. On the south side, and opposite to the anchoring place, is a large castle, called St. Jago de la Gloria; to the east of which, at a small distance, begins the town, having before it a point of land projecting into the harbour, on which stood the castle of St. Jerome, demolished by admiral Vernon.

BEFORE the arrival of the galleons at Porto Bello, proper expresses are dispatched to Panama, requiring the king's treasure, and the merchandize from Peru and Chili, to be conveyed hither; which is either performed by land in summer, or by water in the winter. When the galleons come into port, the cargoes are landed and lodged in proper warehouses; and the price immediately paid out of the treasure lodged in Porto Bello. The whole country round is filled with mules and beasts of burthen, employed in transporting the silver from Panama, which are emptied in the open square, and yet without theft or loss, notwithstanding the seeming hurry and confusion. This exchange of plate for merchandize constitutes the business of the fair, which, by order of the king, lasts no longer than forty days; and if the merchants cannot finish their bargains within that time, those of Spain shall, in that case, have liberty to carry their goods up the country to Peru; but, otherwise, by virtue of a compact among themselves, and ratified by the king, no Spanish trader is to send his goods, on his own account, beyond Porto Bello, nor can a Peruvian ship money or send remittances in his own name to Spain.

THE next city we shall mention in this province is Panama, standing, agreeable to the observation of those excellent astronomers, Don Juan and Antonio Ulloa, latitude $8^{\circ} 57'. 48''$. $\frac{1}{2}$. north, upon that capacious and beautiful bay from which it derives its name (S). When Guzman first touched here in 1514, the place consisted intirely of fishermen's huts; Orius D'Avila settled a colony here in a few years after, and, in 1521, it was constituted a city by the emperor Charles V. with the proper privileges. In 1670, it was sacked and burnt by John

(S) It must be observed that the civil and military tribunal residing at Panama is honoured with the appellation of an audience; though we are unacquainted with the reasons, unless it be what Ulloa alledges, that it is the capital of the three provinces.

Morgan,

Morgan, an English adventurer, who had the preceding year taken Porto Bello. This misfortune occasioned the inhabitants to remove the city to its present situation, distant about a league from where it stood before; and, for the greater security, the new city was inclosed by a free-stone wall, and the houses were built of stone and brick. Since that time several bastions have been added, and now there is always a complete garrison maintained, and the walls mounted with large cannon. But all these precautions could not save the city from another misfortune, being intirely consumed by fire, in the year 1737. After this accident it was again rebuilt in the manner in which it now stands; with neat elegant houses, but not magnificent. The inhabitants are rather independent in their fortunes than rich, there are few of them opulent, and scarce any in a state of poverty. As to the harbour it is convenient, and well secured against storms by a number of surrounding islands. Here the royal audience is seated, at which the governor of Panama resides; for which reason this city is commonly deemed the capital of the province (T).

Carthagena.

THE next contiguous province is Carthagena, which is one of the most considerable governments in New Castile, on account of the great trade carried on by the capital; for otherwise the country is neither rich, fertile, nor populous. It indeed produces some valuable balms, gums, and drugs, together with a few emeralds; but there are neither mines of gold nor silver, nor extraordinary crops of corn, or herds of cattle. The principal river is Magdalena, that falls into the sea about seventy-two miles north-east of the city Carthagena, which is not only a fine opulent town, but a strong fortress. Its advantageous situation, the extent and security of its bay, and the great share it obtained in the commerce of South America, occasioned its being erected into an episcopal see, and contributed to its preservation and increase, as the most esteemed settlement and emporium of the Spaniards in that country. Its wealth drew upon it the hostilities of foreigners, who, thirsting after the riches it contained, have attacked, taken, and plundered it, without ever attempting to maintain it as a settlement. The first invasion was made in 1544, soon after its establishment, by certain French adventurers, conducted by a Corfican pilot. In 1485, it was pillaged and almost destroyed by Sir Francis Drake, that celebrated scourge of the New Spanish settlements. M. de Pointis came before it in 1597, with a squadron of privateers, protected by the French king; and, after obliging the fort of Boca Chica to surrender, whereby he gained the entrance of the bay, a descent was made, fort Lazare besieged and forced to capitulate, which agreement could not however preserve the place from the rage of avarice. The French soldiers were no sooner in possession, than they entered the town, and pillaged it, without regard to the articles of capitulation, or the laws of nations. It was supposed that the governor had betrayed his trust, and this suspicion was corroborated by his embarking on board the French squadron, with all his treasures and effects, none of which had shared in the general calamity. As to the attempts made on this city by the English, they were unfortunate and disgraceful; the expedition of admiral Vernon is too fresh in the memory of every Briton, to need a recital in this place. The city of Carthagena is situated on a sandy island, called a peninsula by most writers, which, forming a narrow passage on the south-west, opens a communication with that port called Tierra Bomba, as far as Boca Chica. The little island, which now joins them, was formerly the entrance of the bay, but it having been filled up by orders of the court, Boca Chica became the only entrance, but this also has been filled up, since the attempt of Vernon and Wentworth. The danger to which the town was exposed on that occasion by the loss of the forts which defended the entrance to the harbour, gave birth to a fresh order for

(T) We cannot avoid taking notice, that near the north-west point of the gulph of Darien stood the fortress of New Edinburgh, built by a Scotch colony, who attempted to establish a settlement, in the year 1699, and denominated the surrounding country New Caledonia. In 1695, the Scotch parliament passed an act for erecting a company to trade to Africa, and the East and West Indies, under his majesty's letters patent, which the company obtained. The design was so plausible, that it induced several English and Hamburgh merchants to engage deeply in the adventure, in consequence of which divers ships were equipped, and a body of forces raised to plant a colony on or near the isthmus of Darien. The territory of which the adventurers took possession was governed by eight Indian princes, then at war with the Spaniards, for which reason they joyfully received the Scotch, in hope of being able to expel the Spaniards by their assistance. For some time the new colony flourished extremely, but their good fortune soon met with a check from the jealousy of the English East India company and the complaints of the court of Madrid. The former complained of an infringement of their charter, and the latter of a violation of the treaties subsisting between Spain and Great Britain. Accordingly the English parliament interposed, and addressed king William to vacate the charter granted to the Scotch company. The Scotch defended their rights with all the arguments of reason and justice; but the influence of their adversaries was too powerful, and all measures were taken to ruin the infant settlement. The Hamburghers were prevailed on to withdraw their subscriptions; the merchants of London were threatened with the ministerial displeasure, and orders were sent to the English plantations to deny the colonists all provision and assistance. In a word, such was the power of faction and private interest, that the nation was robbed of the benefit of one of the most useful establishments ever projected, the advantages of which must have appeared in the most sensible manner, whenever a rupture happened between England and Spain; for while the isthmus remained in possession of the colony, the Spanish treasures must be detained in America.

- a opening the old passage, by which all ships, at this time, enter the bay. On the north side the land is so narrow, that, before the wall was begun, the distance from sea to sea was only thirty-five toises, but afterwards enlarging, forms another island on this side; so that, excepting these two places, the whole city is intirely furrounded by the salt water. To the eastward, it has a communication, by means of a wooden bridge, with a large suburb called Xexemani, built on another island, which is also joined to the continent by a bridge of the same materials. The fortifications both of the city and suburb are constructed in the modern fashion, and lined with free-stone; and, in time of peace, the garrison consists of ten companies of seventy-seven men each, besides militia. The city and suburbs are well laid out, the streets strait, broad, uniform, and well paved. All the houses are built of stone or brick, only one story high, well contrived, neat, and furnished with balconies and lattices of wood, which is more durable in that climate than iron, the latter being soon corroded with the acrimonious quality of the nitrous atmosphere. The city is populous, though most of the inhabitants are the descendants of the Indian tribes; but it is by no means opulent, the country producing no mines, and even the money for paying the salaries of the governor, and inferior officers coming from Santa Fè and Quito. Yet there are many persons, who have acquired large fortunes by commerce, whose houses are splendid, and who live in every respect with great magnificence. As it would greatly exceed our bounds to enter upon a minute description of this city, its inhabitants, climate, and other particulars, we must refer the reader to the voyages of that excellent writer, don Antonio de Ulloa, which work is well translated into the English language. We cannot, however, quit this subject without touching upon some very remarkable circumstances, that distinguish this from every other climate. To this singularity, we may probably ascribe some extraordinary distempers, which make horrible ravages among the human race, and especially the Europeans who visit Carthagena. This disease is called Chapatonada, alluding to the name given here to Europeans, and is a species of the vomito prieto, or black vomit, that being a constant, leading, and fatal symptom. The other symptoms, except a fever and delirium, are not to be found similar in any two patients, or distinguishable from those of a slight indisposition. Multitudes of people are yearly swept off by this distemper on the arrival of the galleons; it seldom continues above three or four days, in which time the patient is either dead, or out of danger, and, what is remarkable, never again subjected to the same disorder; which has foiled all the art of the Spanish physicians.

ANOTHER dreadful endemial disease is the leprosy, which gains ground every day, and is now so frequent, that an hospital is erected for patients labouring under this loathsome distemper. It is observable here, that the leprosy greatly encreases the desire of coition, in consequence of which the patients in the hospital are allowed to intermarry; a strange policy! that only tends to propagate a disease so extremely contagious, and baffle all endeavours to extirpate it. At Carthagena likewise that painful tumour in the muscles of the legs and thighs, occasioned by entrance of the Dracuncula, or Guinea worm, so common on the coast of Africa, and some of the West-India islands, is extremely troublesome, especially to the natives. Another disorder, nearly similar, is occasioned by a little insect called Nigua, peculiar to this country and to Peru, where it is called Pigue, so extremely minute, as scarce to be visible to the naked eye. This insect breeds in the dust, insinuates itself into the soles of the feet, the toes, and the legs, piercing the skin with such subtilty, that there is no being aware of it before it has made its way to the flesh. If it be perceived in the beginning, it is extracted with little pain; but having once lodged its head, and pierced the skin, the patient must undergo the pain of incision, without which a nodus would be formed, and a multitude of insects engendered, who would soon overspread the foot and leg. They cause an extreme pain, especially when they have penetrated deep, as they sometimes do, quite to the bone; and then the incision is not only attended with exquisite torture, but much trouble, and sometimes with real danger. One species of the Nigua is venomous, and when it enters the toe an inflammatory swelling is soon perceived in the groin, greatly resembling a venereal bubo, which phenomenon is not easily explained, as all the intermediate parts are untouched, and devoid of pain, or uncommon external appearance.

As the galleons first touch at Carthagena, on their arrival in America, the inhabitants enjoy the first fruits of that trade, and, for this purpose make public sales, which are very considerable, though not accompanied with the formalities usually observed at Porto Bello. The merchants of Santa Fè, Popayan, and Quito, not only dispose of all their stock, but also lay out all the money entrusted by commission for those goods most wanted in their respective countries. They bring gold and silver in specie, ingots, and dust; and also emeralds, the demand for which being now decreased, they are less sought after than formerly. This traffic was prohibited for some years at the instance of the merchants of Lima, who complained of the great damage they sustained by the transportation of European commodities from Quito to Peru; but it being afterwards considered that this prohibition was no less injurious to the traders of Quito and other places, it was ordered in regard to both parties that, on notice being given in those provinces of the arrival of the galleons, all commerce in European commodities should cease between Quito and Lima, and that the limits of the two audiences should be those of their commerce; an equitable regulation, that was first enforced in the year 1730. During the tiempo muerto, or dead interval between the departure and the arrival of the galleons, all the trade of Carthagena is confined to the towns and villages within its jurisdiction, from whence the inhabitants are supplied in all the necessities of life in exchange for European commodities. To this we may add, the illicit trade carried on with the English of Jamaica, and the Dutch of Curacao, in despite of all the vigilance of the guarda costas.

Santa Martha.

PROCEEDING towards the south, the next country we meet with is Santa Martha, a province bounded on one side by the Rio Grande de Santa Magdalena, and, on the other, by the Rio de la Hacha, extending near a hundred and forty miles in length from east to west, and above two hundred in breadth. The country is extremely mountainous, and some of these mountains, especially that called Santa Martha, higher than the Pike of Teneriffe, if we may credit Dampier and other travellers, who speak rather from appearances, than actual mensuration, from the surface of the ocean. From hence result considerable advantages to the inhabitants, the air being cooler and whollomer, than in other parts of America near the Equator, and the valleys especially being exceeding fruitful. The gold mines too are rich, and in the mountains are found emeralds, sapphires, jasper, and marble, of an exquisite vein and polish. It is reported, that notwithstanding the air is sultry hot by the coast-side, yet the mountains in the interior country are covered with snow, and the cold so severe, that while the people in one place are scorched with the sun-beams, others, at the distance of sixty miles, are shivering with the rigor of the season. The capital city is excellently situated on a branch of the Rio Grande, near the mountains of Santa Martha. It gives name to the province, has a direct communication with the North Sea, and lies, according to the latest observations, in eleven degrees thirty-four minutes of north latitude. Formerly the city was flourishing and populous, when the Spanish fleets used to touch at the mouth of this river; but now the inhabitants are reduced to three thousand souls, including all degrees. Still, however, it is honoured with the residence of the governor of the province; and is the see of a bishop, suffragan to the metropolitan of New Granada. The frequent shocks it hath sustained from hostile fleets has likewise greatly contributed to its fall. In 1525, it was intirely ruined by Sir Francis Drake; the year following, it was plundered by Sir Antony Shirley. In 1630, it fell into the hands of the Dutch, who by no means encreased its wealth, and was frequently afterwards pillaged by the buccaneers.

ON the east side of the Rio Grande, is seated about twenty miles from the capital, the town of Baranca del Malambo, a place of more consideration, by reason of the brisk trade carried on by the inhabitants. The merchandize of New Granada is brought down hither by boats, and conveyed to the bay about forty miles below the town, or else directly to Santa Martha, by a branch of the great river. But the chief article of commerce is salt from the mines, of which in the neighbourhood of the town, the inhabitants draw very large profits.

ON the southern frontier of Santa Martha is situated the little province of Rio de la Hacha, in the form of a peninsula, between the gulph of Venezuela on the east, and a bay of the North Sea to the westward. The country is pleasant, tolerably healthy, and exceeding fruitful. The rains are not so violent as in Santa Martha, though there are frequent tornadoes and thunder showers. In the middle of the province are some mines of jasper and chalcidone, and, on the coast, a very rich pearl fishery, in which the Indians are chiefly employed; so that, in despite of the utmost vigilance of the Spaniards, they reap the chief profits. The inhabitants of the open country retain their freedom, where they form a numerous, stubborn, and obstinate people; yet they admit some Spanish missionaries, who have opened a trade, and rendered them more sociable and tractable than formerly. Rio de la Hacha, the capital, which gives name to the province, and takes its own from the river, at the mouth of which it is situated, was formerly called Nuestra Senora de los Remedios. It stands in eleven degrees six minutes of north latitude, about a hundred and twenty miles from the city Santa Martha, and contains about a hundred houses. Formerly the town was rich and strong, but it was so often attacked and taken by the buccaneers, that in 1682, the Spaniards abandoned it, but were afterwards induced to return, and fortify it in such a manner as not to be any longer apprehensive about the visits of those pillagers.

a NEXT on the north lies the province of Venezuela, within the limits of which we include the district of Caraccas, though, from the confusion of names and geographical descriptions, we cannot pretend to ascertain the exact boundaries. Some writers affirm that it extends four hundred miles along the coast of the North Sea, and near three hundred into the interior country, while others greatly retrench these limits; but it is on all hands allowed that the province is large, the climate moderately temperate, and the soil so rich and fertile as to produce two harvests, and feed great flocks of sheep and black cattle. In some books we find this country called Corana, from the city Cora, which stands upon the lake; but the bulk of the Spanish writers, and indeed the most accurate travellers, stile it Venezuela. The inhabitants are said to exceed an hundred thousand, exclusive of Spaniards, mulattoes, and negroes; the country produces fine plantations of cocoa, sugar, and tobacco, from which, and its fertility in grain and fruits, we may judge of its value. The famous lake of Maracaibo, eighty leagues in compass, adds equally to the beauty and convenience of the province. In one particular, however, the natives labour under an insurmountable difficulty; namely, the want of fresh water, for, though the waters of the lake, and the rivulets flowing from it, be potable, they are nevertheless brackish and unwholesome. This inconvenience the Spaniards have laboured in vain to remove. The capital of the province called Venezuela, or Cora, is situated on the North Sea, on the north east part of the peninsula, and lies in ten degrees and about forty minutes of north latitude. It is the residence of the governor, the seat of the courts of judicature, and the see of a bishop; but remarkable neither for its commerce, opulence, or buildings; the situation alone, in the middle of the waters, engages attention, and from hence it hath been called Venezuela, or little Venice. The town of Maracaibo, though inferior in dignity, is more wealthy, elegant, and pleasant. It fronts the lake of the same name, and has a great number of splendid buildings, adorned with balconies, that command the prospect of the lake at a great distance. The inhabitants are reckoned to exceed four thousand, out of which more than eight hundred men are fit to bear arms. Small vessels are continually trading to this place, with the merchandize and manufactures from all the towns contiguous to the great lake; particularly cacao, indigo, sugar, tobacco, and green hides. Maracaibo is not only a celebrated port for ship-building, but the staple for the commodities of Merida, and the other towns situated on the frontiers of New Grenada.

Venezuela.

b WITH respect to the country of the Caraccas, it extends as far as Cape Blanco. The coast is rocky and mountainous, interspersed with small fertile valleys, subjected at certain seasons of the year to dry north-west winds, but blessed in general with a clear air and wholesome climate. A prodigious extensive illicit trade is pushed with this coast by the English and Dutch, in spite of all the vigilance of the Spaniards, who have scouts perpetually employed, and breast-works raised in all the valleys. Caraccas, the chief town in the district, is situated in ten degrees and nearly ten minutes of north latitude. Dampier says it stands at a considerable distance from the sea, is large, wealthy, and populous, and extremely difficult of access, by reason of the steep and craggy hills, over which an enemy must take his route. Porto Cavallo is a sea-port town on the Caraccas coast, which was unsuccessfully attacked in the last war by admiral Knowles; though the place is so inconsiderable that neither detriment to Spain, nor advantage to Great Britain, could arise from the conquest: possibly the admiral's sole design was to adorn his unshaded temples with laurel.

c BEYOND the province of Venezuela, lies that of New Andalusia, the boundaries of which are very indefinite; the Spaniards pretending a right to countries in which they never established any settlements. Including the districts of Camana and Paria, it extends, according to the most reasonable limits, for the space of five hundred miles from north to south, and about two hundred and seventy from east to west. The interior country is woody and mountainous, variegated with fine valleys, that yield corn and pasturage. The produce of this country consists chiefly in dying drugs, gums, medicinal roots, brazil wood, sugar, tobacco, and some valuable timber. To these commodities we may add pearls, for which the Spaniards fished along this coast to Carthage. Five of these fisheries particularly belonged to this province; but as that elegant natural production is now, by the tyranny of fashion, greatly diminished in its value, a minute account of the manner of collecting them will hardly be expected in so general a history as we propose. Comana, Cumana, or, as some writers call it, New Corduba, is the capital of New Andalusia, situated in nine degrees fifty-five minutes of north-latitude, about nine miles from the North Sea. Here the Spaniards laid the foundation of a town in the year 1520, the place being strong by nature, and fortified by a castle, capable of making a vigorous defence, as appeared in the year 1670, when it was assaulted by the baccaneers, who were repulsed with great slaughter. Most writers include the town of St. Thomas within the limits of New Andalusia, though it is certainly situated in the jurisdiction of Surinam, near the mouth of the great river Oronooko; a place celebrated only for having been fatal to our illustrious countryman, Sir Walter Raleigh;

New Andalusia.

leigh, who took the town with the forces intended to plant a colony in Guiana, left his son ^a in the enterprize, and was afterwards sacrificed by the pusillanimous king James, to appease the court of Madrid, and the jealousy of a faction.

New Granada.

NEW GRANADA, an inland country, is the next which we are led to describe by its situation. It is sometimes called Santa Fè, and Castella del Oro, and is bounded by Popayan on the west, by Peru on the south, on the east by the district of Venezuela, and by Santa Martha, Rio de la Hacha, and the same province of Venezuela, on the north. Part of the eastern side is likewise skirted by Guiana, and on the south, it has part of the country of the Amazons. The whole is supposed to include a space of three hundred and thirty six miles in length, and near as much in breadth. New Granada is beautifully variegated with hills covered with verdure, and fruitful valleys. The mountains contain gold, silver, and ^b emeralds, and the valleys are enriched with all the necessaries of life, corn, cattle, roots, and fruits; producing likewise great quantities of guaiacum, balms, gums, drugs of various kinds, with other rich articles of commerce. Though placed so near the line, it lying between the first and ninth degrees of north-latitude, the climate is temperate; inasmuch, that many writers affirm, there is an equality of day and night, undisturbed by any variety of seasons; which, however, upon a rigid examination appears not to be strictly fact, there being in reality two summers and two winters, without any intermission of spring and autumn. The capital of the kingdom, as it is called, and indeed of all Terra Firma, is the city of Santa Fè de Bogata, situated on the banks of the lake Gatavita, the residence of the royal audience, and of an archbishopric, having for suffragans the dioceses of Carthage ^c gena, Santa Martha, and Popayan; the city is large, populous, opulent, well-built, and adorned with fine houses, and magnificent palaces: but we can meet with no particular description drawn for a century past, during which time it is probably much changed. There are, besides the capital, Tunia, Trinidad, Truxillo, Merida, and a variety of other populous towns, the names of which we shall omit, because strangers have no intercourse with the inhabitants.

Popayan.

THE last province in this audience is called Popayan, a district of very large extent. It is bounded on the south by Peru; by Carthage ^d gena on the north; by the kingdom of New Granada on the east; and on the west by the South Sea and part of Terra Firma. In Popayan the Spaniards possess a number of large, well-built, and strongly fortified towns; but the open country is greatly exposed to the ravages of the Indians, who affect independency, and bear an implacable hatred to their invaders. For this reason the Spaniards dare scarce venture beyond their walls, except in parties, without running the hazard of being massacred; yet they find mind means to draw to themselves all the wealth of the province, which consists in gold mines, precious stones, gums, balsam, rosins, and cotton. Some of the Indians are converted to christianity; and, by their means, the Spaniards carry on a traffic with the natives, exchanging wine, cinnamon of los Quixos, iron, copper, silks, woollen stuffs, and gold and silver lace, for the productions of the country. Popayan is the capital of the province, and stands within two degree of the line, on the north side, at the foot of the mountains, and on the banks of a river, that falls into the Magdalena. ^e It is the see of a bishop, and the residence of the governor, a large populous city; but chiefly inhabited by creoles, mulattoes, Indians, and negroes.

Quito.

WE come now to the first division of the great empire of Peru; namely, the audience of Quito, reckoned by most writers within the limits of the empire, and certainly under the dominion of the incas at the time of the Spanish invasion. It was included within the jurisdiction of the viceroys of Peru, until the year 1718, when the court of Madrid thought proper to dismember it from the ancient limits, and annex it to the kingdom of New Granada. The audience was, at this time, suppressed with a view of encreasing the revenues for the support of the new-erected viceroyalty of Santa Fè, by annexing to it the salaries of all the great officers of the audience; but many inconveniences resulting from ^f this regulation, things were placed again on their ancient footing in 1722. The motives, however, for erecting a viceroyalty at Santa Fè, being confessedly of the greatest importance, its restitution was again schemed by the Spanish ministry, but in such a manner as should prove no detriment either to the publick, or the audiences of Quito or Panama; and this difficulty being surmounted, the dignity of viceroy was again erected in the year 1739. Don Ebastian de Esteva, lieutenant-general, was appointed to that high office; all Terra Firma and the province of Quito, being included in his jurisdiction. We are now therefore to consider Quito as unconnected with the viceroyalty of Peru, though all the modern writers, and especially the English, place it within that division, appearing to be entirely ignorant of the late regulations we have mentioned upon the authority of Antonio de ^g Ulloa, one of the most sensible and intelligent writers that Spain ever produced.

a THE province of Quito is bounded on the north by the last province described, and limited on the south by Peru and Chuchupayas; eastward it extends to the river of Amazons and the meridian of demarkation, which divides the Spanish from the Portuguese dominions. To the westward it is hemmed in by the sea, from the gulph of Puera to the bay of Gorgona, which will exactly shew its dimensions with the least attention to an accurate map. Ulloa reckons it six hundred leagues in length from east to west, and two hundred in breadth; but this is considerably more than is allowed by the best geographers. Indeed all that is possessed of this vast country by the Spaniards is very inconsiderable, in proportion to the whole. According to most writers, the climate here is immoderately hot; an error founded upon speculation, that has since been corrected by experience. In so extensive a country, b lying in the very center of the torrid zone, it is impossible to suppose but the sun has great power; yet Ulloa affirms, that not only the heat is very tolerable, but that in some parts the cold is painful; while other places in this province enjoy all the advantage of perpetual spring, the fields being constantly covered with verdure, and enamelled with flowers of the most lively colours. Nature has here, especially round the capital, been so profuse of her blessings, that Quito, lying almost under the vertical sun, surpasses the countries in the temperate zones, where the vicissitudes of winter and summer, and the transition from heat to cold, occasions both to be more sensibly felt. Provident nature hath assembled a variety of circumstances to moderate the effects of the sun's beams, and give Quito all the advantages, without the inconveniences, of that glorious luminary. The country stands c extremely high, by which elevation the winds are more subtile, the atmosphere more rare, congelation more natural, and the heat less vehement. The mornings are cool, the middle of the day hot, the nights of an agreeable temperature, and the seasons so equal, that through the whole course of the year, the difference is scarce perceptible. Yet we find all the gradations of temperature in this province, according to the disposition of the country. In one part the mountains are covered with snow and ice, while the valleys are parched up with the sun's intense rays, clouded over with thick suffocating fogs, or deluged with rain. What reason authors could have for calling this province sandy, barren, and unhealthy, we cannot conceive; as some of the best writers celebrate it as the garden and Montpelier of America in fertility, beauty, and salutary air. Ulloa applauds in particular the country round the capital, and says, that the curious European observes with pleasure a perpetual spring and verdure, some flowers continually blowing, to supply the place of those which were faded, and fill up all the chasms in the beautifully enamelled prospect. The same incessant fertility is conspicuous in the corn, both reaping and sowing going on together; that corn which has been recently sown springing up, that which has been longer sown in blade, and some mellowed with ripeness, and ready to receive the sickle; so that the declivities of the hills, exhibit at one view all the beauties of the four seasons. Thus an article so essential to life is in such abundance, that the poorest persons are never in want of bread, and horned cattle too are in so great plenty, that beef is sold in the markets of the capital, at sixteen ryals the hundred weight. Fruits, herbage, and vegetables of every kind are in the utmost perfection; the sea-coast is well provided with fish; but the extraordinary plenty and the beautiful scenes described are chiefly confined to the neighbourhood of the capital, many other parts of Quito being desert, unwholesome, and scarce habitable.

QUITO is divided into five governments and nine jurisdictions, which it would be unnecessary to specify, as we do not propose a minute description. The capital, also called Quito, is a noble, large, and populous city, situated almost under the equinoctial, in thirty minutes thirty-three seconds of north-latitude, according to the most accurate observations; its distance from the coast of the South Sea being about thirty-five leagues west. It stands on the declivity of the high mountain Pichinca, among other eminences of a moderate height, and a number of branches or clefts, which occasion great part of the city to be founded upon arches, and the streets to be extremely uneven and irregular. With regard to magnitude, Quito may be compared to a city of the second order in Europe; but its unequal situation is a great disadvantage to its appearance. It may seem extraordinary that so inconvenient a spot should be chosen, when there are two of the most beautiful plains in the world immediately contiguous; but the first founders would seem to pay more regard to preserving the memory of their conquest, by building on the situation of the ancient capital of the Indians, than either to beauty or convenience. Formerly it was in much greater repute than at present; the inhabitants now decrease daily, and whole streets of Indian huts are entirely forsaken and in ruins. The principal square is spacious, well built, and furnished with some very magnificent public buildings, especially the great cathedral, episcopal palace, and a beautiful fountain in the middle. The palace of the audience indeed rather disfigures than adorns the square, because, instead of being kept in repair, according to the dignity of the government, all, except a few offices, is suffered to fall into ruins.

ruins. The inequality of the streets prevents the use of coaches, so that persons of the first rank are attended only by a servant carrying an umbrella, and the ladies are conveyed in sedans. Besides the great square, there are two others very spacious, and a great variety of smaller squares, in which many opulent citizens take up their residence. In these the greatest part of the convents are situated, and make a handsome appearance, the fronts and portals being adorned with all the embellishments of architecture, particularly the convent of the Franciscans, which is an exquisite building entirely of fine free-stone, equally elegant in the contrivance and execution. In general the materials used in building are adobes, or unburned bricks or clay, cemented together by a certain substance called Jangua, a species of mortar of uncommon hardness used by the ancient Indians.

AMONG the courts held at Quito, the principal is the royal audience, first established there in the year 1563, and composed of a president, who is also civil governor of the province, four auditors, who are likewise civil and criminal judges, and a royal fiscal, who, besides the causes brought before the audience, takes cognizance also of every thing relative to the revenue. There is another fiscal besides, called Protector de los Indios, who solicits for the Indians, and, when injured, pleads in their defence. The jurisdiction of this court extends to the utmost limits of the province, with no other appeal than to the council of the Indies, and this only in case of a rejection of petition, or flagrant injustice. This at least is the allegation of Ulloa, although we have reason to believe there is an appeal to the viceroy and his council. Here likewise is an exchequer or chamber of finances, the chief officers of which are an accomptant, a treasurer, and a royal fiscal. The revenues paid into the receipt of this court are the tributes of the Indians, the taxes, and the customs; which sums are annually distributed for paying the salaries of the officers of this province, and also of Carthagena and Santa Martha. There is likewise a treasurer to receive the effects of persons deceased, whose heirs were in Spain; an institution of antient establishment all over the Indies, at first excellent and beneficial, but now productive only of misconduct, villainy, and oppression.

THE cathedral church consists of the bishop, dean, archdeacon, chanter, treasurer, a doctoral, a penitentiary, a magistral, three canons by presentation, four prebends, and two demi-prebends, with the following stipends, which sufficiently shew the wealth of the clergy. The bishop has 24,000 dollars per annum, and the dean, canons, and prebends in the same proportion; besides the sums levied on the ignorance and credulity of the people. The procession of the host is made with infinite pomp and magnificence at Quito. Every house of the streets through which it passes is adorned with rich hangings, and superb triumphal arches are erected with altars, at stated distances, higher than the houses, in which, as on the arches, may be seen with admiration immense quantities of the richest wrought plate and jewels, disposed in such an elegant manner as to exhibit the grandest prospect of opulence. This splendour, together with the magnificent dresses of the persons who assist at the procession, render the whole extremely solemn, and the pomp and decorum are both continued to the end of the ceremony.

It is customary at Quito, that the priest, a month before the celebration of the feast, selects a number of Indians, who are to be the dancers; and the persons appointed immediately begin those dances which were used before their conversion to Christianity, to the music of a pipe and tabor. This dancing consists entirely in a kind of awkward capering and ridiculous distortion, very little to the taste of an European. A few days before the solemnity they dress themselves in a doublet, a shirt, and a woman's petticoat, adorned in the handsomest manner; and over their stockings they wear a kind of pinked buskins, to which are fastened a number of bells that keep ringing at every motion. Their heads and faces they keep covered with masks formed of ribbands of various colours, in which fantastical garb they proudly call themselves angels, unite in companies of eight or ten, and spend the whole day in roving about the streets, highly delighted with the gingling of the bells, and frequently stopping to entertain strangers with a dance, and gain the applause of the spectators. This they perform without any pay or view to interest, regarding it as a religious duty, continuing it a fortnight before and a month after the grand festival, without minding either their labour or families, without fatigue or disgust, though the number of their admirers daily decreases, and the applause is turned into ridicule. Notwithstanding the astonishment which the Spanish writers express at the absurdity of this religious institution, from which they draw reflections to the disadvantage of the natural understanding of the people, we cannot upon the whole think it more ridiculous than the popish solemnity above described, and many other ceremonies of the church of Rome, which cannot very well be reconciled to sound sense and clear reason. It is therefore unfair to estimate the natural understanding of any nation from a few religious ceremonies, which have seldom failed to run into extravagance in every country.

a We may judge of the extent and populousness of Quito from the computation given by Ulloa of the number of inhabitants, which, including all degrees, he reckons to amount to sixty thousand, nine tenths of whom are Indians, mulattoes, and their descendants. They are divided into four classes, the principal of which are the Spaniards in dignity, but by no means in wealth, as they refuse to apply themselves to any mechanic business, considering it as a disgrace to that quality on which they so highly value themselves, and resting perfectly satisfied with being more proud and more wretched than the Mestizos, whose pride is regulated by prudence. They readily apply themselves to the arts, and arrive at great perfection in the more polite; such as sculpture and painting. A Mestizo, called Miguel de Santiago, acquired so much reputation, that his paintings were applauded and bought at a great price b in Rome, the scene of the fine arts; and what renders many of the admirable pieces of painting and sculpture executed in Quito still more exquisite, is, that the artists are destitute of many of the tools and instruments requisite to bring their works to the highest perfection. Young persons of family are instructed in philosophy and divinity; some proceed to the study of the civil law, but follow that profession with reluctance. The belles lettres is entirely neglected and unknown; poetical and historical knowledge is in no repute; but from the vivacity and subtilty displayed in the old scholastic metaphysical jargon, we may venture to pronounce, that the Mestizos would become proficient in more useful and rational science if it were once introduced, and the prejudice against innovation overcome.

c THE sumptuous manner of performing the last offices of the dead demonstrates how far the power of habit may prevail over reason and the most feeling experience. The ostentation of the inhabitants of Quito is so extraordinary in this particular, that many families of credit are moved by a preposterous emulation of excelling others in funeral pomp. The inhabitants may therefore be said, as Ulloa observes, to toil, scheme, and endure the greatest labour and fatigue, merely to enable their successors to lavish honours upon a carcase insensible to all pageantry.

WITHOUT entering upon a description of the several governments contained in this audience, the principal of which are Quito Proper, Los Quixos, and Los Pacamores, we shall give a short account of the principal towns, especially those lying on the sea-coast. The principal of these is Guiaquil, the second city of Spanish origin in this province, or indeed in all Peru. d The first situation was in the Bay of Charapoto, from whence it was removed to the present spot, on the west bank of the river Guiaquil, in two degrees, eleven minutes, twenty-one seconds, of south-latitude. It is of considerable extent, occupying the bank of the river from the lower part of the old town to the upper part of the new, the space of half a league; but the breadth is not proportionable, all flocking to the river side for the pleasure of the prospect, the diversion of fishing, or the refreshing coolness of those breezes which blow from the water. All the houses are built with wood, many are covered with tiles, tho' the greatest part are thatched; but, in order to prevent fires, by which the city hath been frequently damaged, builders are ordered to tile all their new houses. Most of these are large, convenient, and beautiful, adorned with handsome porticos, which in the rainy season, are the only places for walking, the streets being utterly impassable. Guiaquil is defended by three e forts, two on the river near the city, and one behind it, all fortified in the modern manner, and built of a variety of pieces of hard wood, forming a kind of strong palisadoes. In proportion to its dimensions, Guiaquil contains as many inhabitants as any city in all America; the great resort of strangers contributing to encrease the number; generally computed at twenty thousand. The most eminent personages are Europeans, who have married and settled in the country; but there are likewise many opulent Creolians. The citizens capable of bearing arms are divided into companies of militia, according to their rank and cast; so that they can be ready on occasion to defend their country and property. One of these, composed entirely of Europeans, is the most esteemed, splendid, and numerous. The corregidor f commands in chief, having under him a colonel, major, and subalterns; for disciplining the other companies.

g THE commerce of this city consists either of the product and manufactures of this country, or in goods imported from Peru, Terra Firma, and Guatemala; cacao, timber, salt, horned cattle, mules, hides, tobacco, wax, Guinea pepper, drugs, and Loua de Cieba, being the product of a high tasted tree of that name, are very considerable articles of trade. The filaments are infinitely more soft and delicate to the touch than those of cotton, and so extremely fine, that no method of spinning it hath hitherto been invented, the only use to which it is applied being to fill bolsters and matresses. The goods imported are oil, wine, brandy, dried fruits, quays, tucayas, flour, bacon, hams, cheese, iron, and cordage. The navigation of the river is chiefly carried on by small vessels, canoes, and balzas, or rafts, which the Indians steer and manage with surprising dexterity, venturing even upon voyages at sea as far as Paite. The mouth of the river Guiaquil is about two miles over, and navigable gable more than four leagues above the city, whence it is greatly exposed to the depredations of a naval enemy. In 1687 it was forced and plundered by the French, who took the governor and 700 men prisoners, ransoming them afterwards at the price of 400,000 pieces of eight. In 1709 it was taken by captain Rogers, and ransomed for 30,000 pieces of eight.

PAITA is a small sea-port, situated in four degrees five minutes south latitude, consisting only of one street, and about 200 houses, built of cane, and covered with leaves. In the center of the town is a square, on one side of which is a fort mounted with eight pieces of cannon; whence we may judge how easy a prey it fell to commodore, late lord Anson, in 1741, who, with the loss of one man only, obtained a booty which the Spaniards estimated at a million and a half of dollars. The soil round Paita is sandy and barren; for, besides the total want of rain, it has not a single rivulet; so that the inhabitants are supplied with great fatigue with that necessary fluid from Colan, a town on the same bay, at the distance of four leagues, from whence likewise Paita is supplied with the greatest part of the provisions. To conclude, the province of Quito is of the greatest consequence to the Spaniards, not only as a barrier to Peru, but as it contains several mines of gold and silver, and furnishes many of the most valuable articles of commerce.

THE next division, and what we may now reckon the first audience of Peru, is that of Lima, or Los Reyes, bounded on the north by Quito, on the east by the Cordillera incun-tains, on the south by the audience of Los Charcas, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean, being about 770 miles in length from south to north, but of unequal breadth. Nothing more various or uncertain can be imagined than the climate and soil of this country, which in some places is exceeding hot, in others insupportably cold, and at Lima always equal and temperate, because it never rains in this city. The seasons vary within the compass of a few miles, and in certain parts of the audience, all the vicissitudes of weather are experienced in twenty-four hours. However, what is most singular, is, that no rains fall, or rivers flow on the sea-coast, though they are supplied by thick fogs, and dark clouds, that never however condense into showers. This phenomenon hath exercised the wits of many naturalists; some ascribe it to the constancy of the south winds, which propel the vapours exhaled from the sea insensibly to the same point. Others, unsatisfied with this explication, attribute it to the coldness of the south wind; but this is more liable to exception than the former, even admitting that it was established upon fact; the contrary of which is true. The most rational account of the phenomenon is, that in summer, when the atmosphere is most rarefied, the influence of the sun's rays proportionally elevates the vapours, and gives them a greater degree of rarefaction. The vapours then touching the lower part of the atmosphere, when the winds blow with the greatest force, are carried away before they can rise to the height required for melting into drops, and consequently no rain can be formed. All vapours issuing from the earth, are washed along the lower region of the atmosphere, without any impediment; and the winds blowing always from the south, and the vapours being rarefied in proportion to the heat of the sun, its great activity hinders them from combining. Hence, during the whole summer, the air is clear, and quite free of all exhalations. With respect to the winter, if it may be so called, the rays of the sun being less perpendicular to the surface of the earth, the atmosphere becomes considerably more condensed; but the south winds still more so, as being loaded with the cold particles from the frozen zone, which particles it communicates to the vapours as they issue from the earth, and consequently renders them more condensed than in the summer; hence they are hindered from rising with the same celerity as before. Yet this mist or fog is incapable of being converted into rain, hail, or snow, because all the adventitious particles are congealed, and thus cannot unite with the effluvia from the earth, so as to overcome the resistance of the air that supports them; for the quantity of those which have ascended to a sufficient height for combining, is too inconsiderable to withstand the continual dissipation occasioned by the sun's rays. This is the hypothesis of the ingenious Antonio de Ulloa, which we have given for the satisfaction of the curious reader, though we think it liable to objection, and by no means adequate to the difficulty.

THUNDER and lighting are as much unknown at Lima, as rain, hail, or snow; but it is very remarkable, that these explosions should be so common at the distance of thirty leagues from the capital. Earthquakes, however, are so frequent and dreadful, that the inhabitants live in continual apprehension. Several deplorable instances of this kind have happened in this unfortunate city; and, not many years since, proved the total destruction of all its buildings. The first concussion, since the establishment of the Spaniards, happened in 1582; but the damage was much less considerable than in some of the succeeding. Six years afterwards, the city of Lima was again visited by another earthquake, so dreadful that to this time it is solemnly commemorated every year. In 1609, another violent

- a shock happened which overturned many houses. On the twenty-seventh of November 1630, such prodigious damage was done in the city by an earthquake, that, in acknowledgement of its not having been intirely demolished, a festival is annually celebrated on that day. Twenty-four years afterwards, a shock happened on the third of November, which destroyed the most stately edifices in the city, and great numbers of houses; but few of the inhabitants perished, as they took refuge on the mountains, and remained there for several days, during the continuance of the concussion, or danger of its return. On the seventh of June, 1678, another earthquake happened, by which several houses were laid in ruins, and the churches greatly damaged. But one of the most terrible, of which we have any account, was that of the twentieth of October, 1687. It began at four in the morning with the destruction of many of the finest publick buildings and houses, in which great numbers of the inhabitants perished; but this was little more than a presage of what followed, and a warning to the people to remove from the impending danger. The shock returned two hours after with such impetuous concussions, that all was laid in ruins, and the inhabitants thought themselves happy in being only spectators of the general devastation, and the loss of all their property. During this second shock, the sea retired considerably from its bounds, and returned with such violence in mountainous waves, as totally overwhelmed Callao, and the adjacent country, together with the miserable inhabitants. To omit those earthquakes which happened in 1697, 1699, 1716, 1725, 1732, and 1734, we shall close this account of the misfortunes of Lima, with an account of that dreadful shock, which, on the twenty-eighth of October, 1746, destroyed all the buildings great and small in the space of three minutes, burying in the ruins those inhabitants, who, endeavouring to save their most precious moveables, had not made sufficient haste into the streets and squares. At the very same hour, the fort of Callao sunk into ruins; but what it suffered by the earthquake in its buildings was inconsiderable, when compared to the terrible catastrophe which followed. The sea, receding to a considerable distance, returned with such violence, that Callao and all the neighbouring country was laid under water; men, women, houses, and cattle, being swept away with the torrent. Nineteen vessels out of twenty-three were sunk; and the frigate called St. Fermin was carried by the force of the waves to a great distance up the country. For the space of four months the concussions continued with short intervals, and many of them were as violent as the first; so that before the twenty-fourth of the following year, no less than four hundred and fifty shocks had been felt; many of them as dreadful as if all nature had been convulsed. What horrible devastation must that have been, where above 12000 lives perished in the ruins of their own effects and property. Whether the city has hitherto recovered its former splendor, we cannot determine; but as it still remains the emporium of this part of America, and the capital of all Peru, being honoured with the residence of the viceroy, we shall give the reader a short account of its former magnificence and opulence, before it suffered from this fatal accident, the recollection of which cannot fail to excite sentiments of humanity and sorrow for the sufferings of our fellow-creatures.
- e THE city of Rimac, by corruption stiled Lima, and frequently called Ciudad los Reyes, Lima, or The City of Kings, stands in the latitude of twelve degrees, two minutes, thirty-one seconds of south latitude. Its situation is pleasant and beautiful, lying in the center of the great valley of Lima, an intire view of which it commands. A river of the same name washes the walls of Lima, and, when not encreased by the torrents from the mountains is easily fordable; however, as it sometimes happens, that it is equally rapid and deep, an elegant and spacious stone bridge is thrown over, the architecture of which hath been much admired. A gate, beautifully constructed, stands at one end, forms the entrance to the city, and leads to the grand square; in the middle of which a fountain plays, remarkable for its capaciousness and magnificence. The water is ejected through the trumpet of the statue, and the mouths of eight lions, which surround it, and greatly add to the grandeur, if not to the propriety, of the workmanship. The cathedral and episcopal palace, which occupy the east side of the square, are fine buildings. On the north side is the viceroy's palace, a building once of great magnificence, which never recovered the damage it sustained by the earthquake in the year 1687.
- f THE form of Lima is triangular, its base or longest side extending along the bank of the river, its length being precisely two miles. A brick wall, which answers the original intention, but is devoid of all beauty or regularity, surrounds the whole. It is flanked with thirty-four bastions; but without platforms or embrasures, the intention of it being merely to defend the city against any sudden attack of the Indians. The suburb called St. Lazaro, on the opposite side of the river, has greatly encreased of late, and now forms a noble city, the streets being wide, parallel, or at right angles, forming squares of houses, each a hundred and fifty yards in front. The houses of Lima, though low, are extremely commodious. They are slight with all the appearance of solidity; and that they may the better support themselves under the shocks of earthquakes, of which the city has had such frequent fatal experience, the principal parts are composed of wood, joined to the rafters of the roof, and those which serve for walls are lined both within and without, with wild canes and osiers plaited over with clay, and white-washed, all the fronts being in imitation of free-stone. Cornices and porticos are added, which are also painted of a stone colour; thus the whole front imposes on the sight, and strangers suppose them composed of materials which they only imitate.
- g them-

TOWARDS the east and west parts of the city, within the walls, are many fruit and kitchen gardens; and most of the people of fashion have gardens to their houses, continually refreshed with water by means of canals. In the suburbs especially the gardens are so spacious, that the jurisdiction of St. Lazaro alone extends for the space of fifteen leagues, being full of large plantations, cut out in walks shaded with groves of odoriferous plants and fruit trees. The convents in Lima are numerous, some of them are stately; and the Jesuits have six colleges within the precincts of the city. Three charitable foundations do honour to the piety and humanity of the inhabitants. They are intended for the relief of those who are sick or indigent through infirmity; and one in particular is appropriated to sick and infirm Indians, all being under the direction, of the clergy, but subjected to the visitation of the civil magistrates. Besides these three great public institutions, this opulent city hath also nine hospitals, supported by the contributions of the people, each of them appropriated to some peculiar charitable purpose. All the churches, both conventual and parochial are large, constructed partly of stone, and adorned with fine paintings, and other decorations of great value. The cathedral churches of the different orders are so splendid as to exceed all imagination, and surpass the powers of description. The altars, from the very basis to the borders of the paintings, are covered with massive silver, wrought into various kinds of ornaments. All the walls are hung with velvet, or tapestry of equal value, fringed with gold and silver, all which bear an incredible price in this country, into which they are imported from Old Spain. On these hangings are suspended rich pieces of plate, in various figures, and if the eye be directed from the pillars, walls, and ceiling, to the lower part of the church, it is equally dazzled with glittering objects presenting themselves on every side to view; particularly the candlesticks of pure silver, seven feet in height, placed in two rows along the nave of the church, embossed tables of the same metal, supporting candlesticks of a lesser size; and, in the intervals, silver pedestals supporting angels of the same metal. In a word, every part of the churches is covered with plate, or some ornaments of equal value; so that on public occasions divine service is performed with inconceivable magnificence; and the ornaments, even upon common occasions, exceed those which most cities in Europe put forth upon the most solemn and pompous festivals. Yet all this forms but a small portion of the wealth of these houses of religious worship; the sacred vessels, the chalices, the ostensoriums, and other implements, are of unspeakable value, the gold and silver being covered over with diamonds and rubies, so as to dazzle the eye of the spectator.

IN the city of Lima, the viceroy takes up his usual residence. His government is triennial, though, at the expiration of that term, the sovereign may renew his commission. He enjoys all the pomp and prerogatives of royalty. Absolute in all affairs, whether military, civil, criminal, or relating to the revenue; he has under him officers and tribunals for executing the several departments of government. All officers are appointed and places filled up by him; so that the grandeur of this employment actually exceeds the dignity of the title. For the security of his person, he has two corps of guards; one of horse, consisting of a hundred and sixty soldiers, under the command of a captain and lieutenant, the uniform being blue, richly laced with silver. A body of fifty halbardiers do duty in rooms, leading to the royal audience chamber, whose uniform is composed of crimson velvet waistcoats, deeply laced with gold; and, besides these there is another guard within the palace, of a hundred men; being a detachment from the garrison at Callao. All are occasionally employed in executing the orders of the viceroy, and enforcing the decrees of the tribunals, after they have received the royal assent; for such the concurrence of the viceroy is esteemed. Besides assisting at the courts of justice, and the councils relating to the finances and war, the viceroy gives daily audience to all degrees of persons; for which purpose, the palace is furnished with three very grand and spacious rooms, in the first of which, adorned with the portraits of all the preceding viceroys, he receives deputations from the Indians, and other casts. In the second he gives audience to the Spaniards; and, in the third, in which are placed the pictures, of the reigning king and queen, he receives all those ladies, who desire a private audience.

NOTHING can be more regular than the forms of government, which are kept up with the strictest appearance of business, and the most scrupulous justice; although, in fact, every thing flows from the pleasure of the court, and the viceroy. All affairs immediately relative

- a relative to the cabinet are dispatched by a secretary of state, with an assistant properly qualified for so important a charge. From this office orders are issued for passports, which must be obtained from every corregidor within his jurisdiction. The secretary has the power of filling all juridical employments for the term of two years; but he must have the viceroy's approbation, and, in fact, does nothing but by his authority. Causes relating to equity are tried in the court called Audiencia, from the decrees of which there is no appeal to the council of the Indies; unless in cases of the most notorious injustice, and a second trial. This tribunal, the supreme court at Lima, is composed of eight auditors and a fiscal for civil affairs; and is held in the viceroy's palace in three different saloons, appropriated to those sittings, the deliberations being held in one, and the causes tried, either publickly or
- b privately, in the other two.

NEXT comes the chamber of accounts, consisting of a commissioner, five chief accountants, and two directors, with inferior officers belonging to each class. Here corregidores, intrusted with the publick revenue, pass their accounts, and here also the distributions and management of the royal revenue are regulated. Lastly, within the palace is the royal treasury, under the direction of a treasurer, accountant, and agent, who superintend his majesty's revenue, from whatever it may arise, within the jurisdiction of the audience of Lima.

- WITH respect to the corporation of Lima, it differs little from other royal charters to the same purpose. The magistrates consist of Regidores, or aldermen; Alfarcz real, or sheriffs; two Alcades, or royal judges; all being noblemen of the first distinction in the city. These have the direction of the police, and the ordinary administration of justice. The alcades preside alternately every month; for, by a particular privilege of the city of Lima, the jurisdiction of the corregidor extends only to the Indians.

- ONE of the most useful institutions, if duly administered, is the court for the effects of deceased persons. This takes charge of all the goods of persons dying intestate, and without lawful heirs; and likewise inspects the conduct of those intrusted with the effects of other persons. It consists of a judge, who is one of the auditors; a counsellor, and an accountant; and at present serves no other purpose, than to prevent private rapine by a kind of legal oppression, there being scarce any possibility of ever profiting by estates once
- d thrown into the charge of this tribunal.

THE next tribunal is the consulado, or board of trade and commerce, composed of a president and two consuls, who preside over every thing relative to traffic, decide all commercial disputes and processes, and are governed by the same rules as the consulados at Cadiz and Bilboa. The tribunal of inquisition is composed of two inquisitors and a fiscal, who, like the subordinate officers, are nominated by the inquisitor-general; and, in case of a vacancy, filled by the supreme council of the inquisition. Every one, acquainted with the severity of these tribunals in Spain and Portugal, may judge of the effects it produces at Lima, which is that of inspiring horror, and gaining universal detestation.

- IN Lima, there is an university, where the genius of the natives is cultivated in that species
- e of divine and human knowledge in repute in Old Spain. The Aristotelian and old school philosophy still maintain their ground; so that the inhabitants of Lima are much more indebted to the kind gifts of nature for any extraordinary exertions of genius, than to culture and education. Their little progress in useful learning appears to be owing rather to the want of proper instruction, than of talents; for, by their ready comprehension of whatever is taught them, we may judge of their abilities for real improvements. The university of St. Mark has chairs for each of the sciences, filled by suffrage, a method extremely favourable to merit; and, indeed, some of the professors of this seminary have approved themselves worthy of their promotion, by publishing works which have gained the applause of the literati of Europe; but such productions are rare, and to be classed among
- f the wonders of the new world. Besides this university, are the subordinate colleges of St. Teribio, St. Martin, and St. Philip; each of them endowed with particular privileges, and professors, who teach the different languages and sciences. Upon the whole, there are only wanting a few new regulations and reformatations to render this seminary equally useful and respectable; an observation no less applicable to the most ancient and celebrated seats of learning in Europe, and especially in Great Britain, where science and the arts have notwithstanding flourished with more vigour, than in any other country recorded in ancient or modern story.

- THE inhabitants of this opulent and populous city are composed of Spaniards, Mestizos, Indians, and Negroes, together with other casts, the descendants of a common mixture.
- g The Spanish families are very numerous; there being no fewer, at a moderate computation, than eighteen thousand whites in this capital, among whom are reckoned a third or fourth part of the most distinguished nobility in Peru. Many of these are honoured with the dignitary titles of ancient or modern Castilians; and there are reckoned no less than forty-five five counts and marquisses, who take up their general residence in the city. The number of knights also belonging to the several military orders, is very considerable, which adds greatly to the brilliancy of the court; besides which, there are many other ancient families living in the greatest splendor, particularly twenty-four gentlemen of large estates with ancient country-seats, but without titles. One of these traces, with undeniable certainty, his pedigree from the incas; and his family has, for this reason, been loaded with favours and distinguishing honours by the Catholic kings, as a kind of atonement for the injuries done to his predecessors. The great keep coaches, and calashes or chaises are so common, that no family of any degree or rank is without one; these carriages being extremely necessary here, because the streets are eternally crowded with droves of mules, which cover the ground with their dung, and are themselves extremely troublesome to passengers. The number of these is computed at eight thousand, if we include camels, which may take up about a third part. From this circumstance we may judge of the populousness of the city, and the opulence of the inhabitants, who are reckoned to amount to seventy thousand, including all degrees; and to expend in rich silks, laces, pearls, and jewels, to the amount of one million, two hundred thousand pounds annually. Possibly this expence may be diminished, since the French have found means to introduce European commodities into Lima at a cheaper rate than before. To this may be added, that the trade carried on at Arica, Tio, and Pisco, has diverted the people who came to Lima, and considerably lessened the wealth that was daily pouring into the capital.

THE viceroy of Peru's allowed yearly salary amounts to seven thousand one hundred and sixty-seven pounds sterling, besides lawful perquisites to three times that value. It is reputed he can raise an hundred and twenty thousand horse and foot within his jurisdiction; but it is acknowledged on all hands, that he cannot arm a fifth part of this number. The garrison of Lima is composed of militia, fourteen companies of which intirely consist of Spanish infantry, seven companies of the corporation of commerce, eight companies of Indians, and six companies of mulattoes, with ten troops of Spanish horse; all making up a corps of four thousand able-bodied, but ill-disciplined, soldiers.

It is more than probable, that, notwithstanding the devastations occasioned by frequent earthquakes, Lima would be one of the most populous cities of the new world, or perhaps any part of the universe, but for the crowds swept off by endemial distempers; such as malignant, intermittent, and catarrhus fevers, pleurifies, constipations, convulsions, and other diseases, among which we may reckon the small-pox and venereal taint. The former of these is indeed not annual; but rages with peculiar violence when it appears, and sweeps off the people like a pestilence. Convulsions, which are divided into two kinds, the common or partial, and the malignant or arched, are extremely common, and the most dreadful of all disorders. Both come on when Nature is struggling in the crisis of some acute distemper; but with this remarkable difference, that those attacked with the partial convulsions often recover, though the greater part die within the fourth day; whereas the patients seized with the arched convulsions sink under them in two or three days, it being very extraordinary even to see an instance of recovery; whence they are termed malignant. Even the first stage of the arched spasm is so violent, as to cause a contraction of the nerves of the vertebræ, from the brain downwards, which, with all the muscles, become more and more constricted all over the body, until the body is drawn backwards in the form of an arch, and all the joints dislocated. To promote a profuse diaphoresis is found by experience to be the only cure; if, indeed, there can be said to be a cure for a symptom almost always fatal.

Not to insist upon a subject so shocking to humanity, and mortifying to human pride, let us turn our eyes to one which will afford a happier prospect; namely, the commerce of Lima, which has contributed more than its being the residence of the court, to raise it to its present state of opulence and grandeur. It is the general emporium of commerce of every kind, the center of the products and manufactures of other provinces, together with those of Europe, imported by the galleons, and the staple of the whole kingdom. It supplies, as the common mother, the wants of all the other towns and cities in this vast empire. All the wealth of the southern provinces pours into this capital, and is discharged into the fleet, which sails with the galleons from Callao to Panama. At the head of this commerce is the tribunal del Consulado, already described, which appoints commissaries to reside in the other cities of its dependence, all over Peru. When commodities arrive at Lima, the merchants remit to their correspondents such goods as are commissioned, reserving the rest in warehouses to dispose of, on their own account, to traders who at this time resort to Lima. Thus the cargo of a flotilla lasts a considerable time; there not being purchasers sufficient to take the whole off immediately. The produce of the sales in the interior country is sent to Lima in bars of silver, and a kind of amalgama of mercury and dust, taken out of the mines, called Rigna, which are coined in the mint of their city.

The

a The remittances sent to Lima, during the interval between the flotillas, are expended in purchasing the manufactures of the country; great quantities of which come from the province of Quito, and the consumption is large, being worn by all the lower class of the people. Lima has also its particular trade with the kingdoms both of North and South America; from the former the most considerable commodity imported is snuff, brought from the Havannah to Mexico, and from thence transported to Lima, and diffused by the merchants of this city all over the province of Peru. Those who deal in this merchandize, never interpose in any other branch of commerce, except in the sale of perfumes, porcelain, ambergrease, and musk. From New Spain, Lima receives tar, iron, indigo, and naptha; from Terra Firma, it imports leaf tobacco, greatly used here by ladies, gentlemen, and especially by the vulgar; pearls, and a few other articles of traffic. The timber used in building houses, ships, boats, is brought from Guiaquil, together with cacao, for which there is no great demand. Wine, brandy, raisins, olives and oil, are sent from Nasca; and Pisco and Chili supplies Lima with flour, wheat, lead, leather, cordage, wines, dried fruits, and some gold. Copper and tin are brought from Coquimbo, the mountains of Caxamarca, and Chachapayas; canvasses made of cotton for sails, and other stuffs of a similar nature, come from Pita. From the southern provinces is imported Vicuna wool for making hats; and lastly from Paraguay are brought all the commodities of that country, which are not likewise the product of the jurisdiction of Lima. Thus it is the emporium to which people resort from all quarters; and trade being always in a constant circulation, the families of rank are enabled to support that splendor with which they are so much delighted. From a commerce so extensive and important, it might be imagined many prodigious fortunes are raised; but the case is otherwise: trade is so equally diffused, that no man is allowed to engross too great a share, or monopolize any valuable article; from whence follows, what is extremely desirous in every country, an equality of wealth, which prevents any one from acquiring too large a portion of the goods of fortune, while others are left destitute. Upon the whole, the inhabitants of Lima have such an aptitude for trade, that the city may be considered as an academy to which great numbers repair to perfect themselves in the various arts of commerce. They penetrate into the designs of the seller, and artfully draw the purchaser into their own views. They are blessed with a remarkable talent of persuasion, and the means of eluding all objections; however, with all their precaution and evasion, no men are more punctual in executing their contracts.

CALLAO is the port of Lima, at an inconsiderable distance, extending along the sea-coast, on a low flat point of land. The Spaniards have no harbour to compare with this in the South Sea for beauty, convenience, and security. The largest vessels may lie with perfect safety in the road of Callao, the water being extremely deep, and the port shaded from the winds by the island of St. Lawrence, which also breaks the surges rolling from the south-west. From the sea, the town makes a tolerable figure, having several publick edifices, churches, and particularly five monasteries, though the inhabitants are not reckoned to exceed four or five hundred. The government has expended large sums of money in giving this important harbour all the advantages of strength, that art could bestow; and the town is actually considered in Spain, as little less than impregnable, though, in fact, both the garrison and fortifications are very inconsiderable. The latter consisted of an inclosure flanked by ten bastions on the land-side, and several redans and plain bastions on the edge of the sea, together with four strong batteries to command the port and road; but these being demolished in the last great earthquake, have never since been thoroughly repaired, the money appropriated by the government having been expended in other purposes, more agreeable to the designs of the viceroy of Peru. Besides, it is reported, that his Catholic majesty is charged annually with large sums for the garrison, fortifications, and squadrons of men of war, which are supposed to lie in the harbour; yet such is the vigilance and integrity of the royal officers, that the soldiers at Callao are hardly sufficient to mount guard; that the walls are in many places in ruins, and that the ships could not be repaired in such a manner as to be fit for sea, in the space of several months. We may judge of the importance of this harbour, from what we have said of the commerce of Lima chiefly driven by this channel. Two flotas annually sail from hence, one for Arica, the other for Panama, the former about the close of February, which, having received the silver sent from Potosi, returns in the month of March. In the beginning of May, the flota sails from Panama with all the treasures of Potosi; the wealth of Chili, brought by the Valperdiso fleet; and the royal revenues and merchandize, brought from the most distant parts of Peru and Is Charcas. Besides these fleets, there sail annually two ships for Acapulco, freighted with gold and silver; and the commodities they bring back are lodged in the magazines here, and retailed to all the southern provinces of America.

In this province are some other sea-ports, but neither comparable to Callao in security or importance. The little harbour of Guanchaco to the northward serves for the traffic carried on by the Indians of Truxillo; but it cannot be recommended either as safe or commodious. Sangallo is another sea port, about twenty-six leagues to the southward of Lima, which carries on some trade; but the port that comes nearest to Callao in point of excellency is Arequiba, in the valley of Quilca, a hundred leagues south of Lima. The entrance of this harbour is indeed narrow, and rather shallow for ships of very great burthen; but when once they are entered, they can anchor securely in eighteen fathom water. The town is one of the most beautiful and pleasant in all Peru, delightfully situated in a fine plain, and the houses built with stone and vaulted. It was founded in 1539, by order of Don Francisco Pizarro, in a place known by the same name; but this situation being found disadvantageous, the inhabitants obtained leave to remove the town to the valley of Quilca, where it stands at present, about twenty leagues from the sea, with which it has a free communication by means of a fine river. The temperature of the air is remarkably good, and though sometimes a slight frost is perceived, the cold is never excessive, nor the heat troublesome; so that the surrounding fields are clothed with perpetual verdure. The buildings here, contrary to the usual manner in warm countries, are lofty, neatly furnished within, and finely decorated on the outside; but what chiefly gives the inhabitants an exemption from many diseases common in other parts of Peru is greatly owing to their keeping the streets clean, by means of canals, which extend to a river running near the city. However, these advantages are considerably allayed by the dreadful shocks of earthquakes, to which it is so subject, that it has been five times laid in ruins by these convulsions of Nature. Nevertheless, it is populous, and reckons among its inhabitants many of the noblest families in America; this being the place to which Spaniards, who had raised their fortunes by trade, or disengaged themselves from business, retire to enjoy the pleasure of life, and the blessings of a temperate wholesome climate. Considering its importance, this place is badly fortified; for the greatest part of the silver from Potosi and los Charcas is brought here to be sent to Callao, and from thence to Panama.

Arequiba.

Cusco.

BUT of all the cities in Peru, Cusco, or Cozco, is the most antient, being of the same date with the eastern empire of the incas, and found by Manco Capac I. as the seat and capital, and indeed the origin of his empire. From small beginnings this city enlarged to so great an extent, that the Spaniards were astonished at its grandeur and magnificence, especially of the famous temple dedicated to the sun, and of the inca's palace. Cusco stands in a very unequal situation on the sides of a mountain, on the north part of which are still to be seen the ruins of that celebrated fortress erected by the incas for their defence, the design of which was to enclose the whole mountain with a prodigious wall of such construction as to render the ascent absolutely impracticable to an enemy. This wall was entirely of free stone, remarkable for its extraordinary dimensions, and the size and magnitude of the stones, which are of different figures. At present the city is nearly equal to Lima. The north and west sides are surrounded by the mountains of the citadel; on the south it borders on a plain, on which are several very beautiful walks. The houses are entirely in the Spanish fashion, built with stone, well-contrived, and covered with tiles, whose lively red gives them an elegant appearance. All the apartments are spacious and finely decorated, the inhabitants of Cusco being celebrated for their elegant taste, their love of show, and skill in architecture. The mouldings of the doors are gilt, the ornaments and furniture correspondent, and the houses of private persons equal in splendour to palaces. The magistracy consists of a corregidor and two alcalds, chosen out of the body of the nobility, who are served by a number of inferior officers, agreeable to the policy established by the Spaniards over all America. Formerly the city was well peopled with Spaniards, and adorned with the residence of many noble families; but the capital and the court being removed to Lima, Cusco is at present much declined, and indeed but the second city in the empire. The inhabitants are not computed at more than sixteen thousand, besides the strangers who come thither to trade; for some manufactures of bays and cotton cloth have been erected here, to the prejudice of the exports from Europe. The mines of Lumpu and Cordellera de Cusco yield considerable quantities of the precious metal; but there are others beyond comparison richer towards Maxos, where even the Indians glitter in gold, chiefly because the Spaniards have not established their dominion over those fierce nations dwelling beyond the mountains.

ABOVE forty leagues north-east of Lima stands the city Guanuco, formerly one of the most considerable places in Peru, and the settlement of some of the first conquerors. At present, it is in so ruinous a condition that scarce the vestiges of its former opulence remain, notwithstanding it is mentioned by modern compilers as a populous and wealthy inland city.

GUAMANGA is a city of much greater consequence, founded by Pizarro, and usually called by the Spaniards St. Juan de la Vittoria, in memory of the precipitate retreat of the inca from the Spaniards, who offered him battle. The original design of building this city was to serve for the convenience of trade, and the medium of intercourse between Lima and Cusco. At first it stood upon a spot which rendered supplying the inhabitants with provisions extremely difficult; but at the close of the war, the city was removed to its present situation a on the declivities of some mountains, which extending southward enclose a spacious plain to the eastward of the town, watered by a small stream descending from the adjacent eminences. The inhabitants who pay tribute within the jurisdiction of this city are computed at thirty thousand; among whom are reckoned twenty noble families, who live in the centre of the town, in fine houses of considerable height, built partly of stone, and covered with tiles. All are provided with spacious handsome gardens, which are kept in order at a great expence, on account of the difficulty of procuring water; besides, the large Indians suburbs round the city greatly encrease its dimensions and add to its beauty, as the houses are built of stone, and raised entirely in the Spanish manner. The cathedral is a magnificent building, well endowed, and the see of a bishop; the churches are rich and handsome, and many of the seminaries of learning and religion such as reflect honour on the piety and munificence of the founders. Here is an university, with professors of philosophy, divinity, and law, endowed with the same privileges as the university of Lima, both being royal foundations. In a word, the climate is so fine and serene, and the soil so fertile in the surrounding country, that the inhabitants are abundantly supplied with all the necessaries of life; but the principal trade of Guamanga consists in gilt leather, a species of pavillions for beds, confectionary pastes, marmalades, jellies, preserved quinces, and other articles of luxury, which serve to evince the disposition of the people to industry and elegance of diet.

As it would oblige us to unnecessary minuteness to descend to a particular account of all the towns and cities within the jurisdiction of Lima, we shall content ourselves with describing Truxillo as the last, but one of the most important places in this audience. This city stands, according to the observation of Don Antonio de Ulloa, in eight degrees, six minutes, and three seconds, of south-latitude, which is something less than the latitude assigned by all former writers. It was founded by Pizarro in the valley of Chinca, and is now justly reputed one of the principal cities in the empire of Peru. The situation is pleasant, notwithstanding the sandy soil, which is the universal inconvenience of all the towns in the vallies. It is surrounded by a brick-wall, stands about half a league from the sea, and two leagues from Guenchaco, the channel of its maritime commerce. The tributary inhabitants within the jurisdiction of Truxillo are computed at fifty thousand, but the houses within the walls do not exceed five hundred. They make a handsome appearance, being built of brick, and decorated with stately balconies and superb porticos; but they are all low, on account of the frequent earthquakes with which all the sea-coast is visited. Among the Spaniards residing at Truxillo are many families of rank, opulence, and distinction; all are friendly, hospitable, and regular in their conduct, beyond what is observable in any other city in this quarter of the world, where the mixture of nations serves only to beget vices of a peculiar nature, arising from the depravity of the whole body. The inhabitants carry on a prodigious trade in wine, brandy, sugar, flax, and marmalade, of which they export three or four ship loads to Panama.

BEFORE we quit this audience, let us observe, that within its limits mines of every kind are to be found; and of gold there are several, with rich lavaderos. Those especially in the district of Guarrano will be for ever celebrated on account of two petitos, or lumps of fine gold, which they yielded, the largest ever found in that state; one weighing five hundred and twelve ounces, and the other about three hundred and sixty, containing gold of different degrees of fineness and purity. There are likewise silver-mines in the audience of Lima; and those in the neighbourhood of Cusco were celebrated before the discovery of the mines of Potosi, which are much richer, and wrought with far less expence. In 1713 the rich mine of St. Anthony was opened just by Cusco; but we cannot give the reader any account whether the great expectations entertained from it were in any degree answered. Near the town of Guaneo Bellia there is a mine, which, without yielding gold or silver, may be considered as of greater value than all the rest of the district. This mine is quicksilver, of which it is supposed to contain an inexhaustible resource. The town was founded entirely on account of the quicksilver, to the working of which the inhabitants owe their whole subsistence, the coldness of the air checking the growth of grain, and every other kind of vegetables. From hence all the silver mines in Peru are supplied with mercury, the use of which, for aggregating the particles of silver, began in the year 1571, under the direction of Pedro Fernandez Velasco. As the value of the gold and silver mines depend upon the right management of the quicksilver, the mines of Guaria Belica, or, as some call them, Velica, are under the immediate direction of the viceroy of Peru, and never opened nor shut but by his express command. In the reign of Philip V. a particular governor, or superintendant, thoroughly acquainted with the nature of extracting the mineral, was appointed; and by his œconomy the mines are worked at less expence to the public, and will not be so soon exhausted. Formerly the ore was dug and purified at the expence of private persons, who were obliged to bring it to the king's warehouses under pain of perpetual slavery; but even the severity of this punishment could not prevent fraud and embezzlement.

The audience
of Charcas.

THE audience of los Charcas, or la Plata, also frequently called Chuquifuya by the old writers, is equal in the extent of its jurisdiction to that of Lima; but as many parts of it are very ill inhabited, and others over-run with forests and vast deserts, it cannot be considered as of equal value with respect to its soil and fertility. It is bounded by the audience of Lima on the north, by Paraguay on the east, by Chili and Tucuman on the south, and by the Pacific Ocean on the west; extending itself in a strait line about five hundred and seventy miles from east to west at its greatest breadth. The climate is various, the coast being unsufferably hot, while the inland parts are on the contrary extreme. However the soil is in many places exceedingly fruitful, being rendered so by art in the vallies, while nature doth all that is required in the mountains. Within this division were formerly included many powerful nations and Indian provinces subjected by the incas Tupacqui and his son inca Roca. The principal commodities of the country are silver, gold, and pimento, commonly called Jamaica Pepper, which produces to the inhabitants a neat return of six hundred thousand pieces of eight annually. Throughout the whole extent of the audience there are exceeding rich mines, some near the coast, several at greater distance, some lately discovered, and others which have been wrought from the time the Spaniards first settled in the country; but before we enter upon an account of these, we shall give a short sketch of the principal cities.

La Plata.

LA PLATA, or, as the Indians call it, Chuquifuya, is considered as the capital, receiving its Spanish name from the mines in its neighbourhood, which were the first wrought by the conquerors. It stands in a small plain environed with eminences, which defend it from the winds. The temperature of the air in summer is very mild; nor is there any considerable difference throughout the whole year, except that in the winter, which begins here in September, and continues till March, tempests of lightning and thunder are frequent, and the rains of long duration. The houses are rather large and commodious, than elegant; but all are rendered extremely pleasant by beautiful gardens. The scarcity of water is, however, an insurmountable difficulty; for this element, so essential to life, the inhabitants are obliged to procure with great labour and fatigue. The city is extremely populous, the inhabitants, including Indians, exceeding fourteen thousand. Several of the public buildings are magnificent, and the architecture and decorations of the cathedral are particularly admired. There also is an university dedicated to St. Francis Xavier, the choirs of which are filled indiscriminately by the laity and clergy. Here is also a tribunal of crossade, with a commissary, subdelegate, and other officers; likewise a court of inquisition subordinate to that of Lima, an office for taking charge of the effects of persons deceased intestate, or whose heirs are at a great distance.

Mines of Po-
tosi.

THE jurisdiction of Plata is of so great extent as to include the famous mountain of Potosi, that inexhaustible source of wealth to the Spaniards, at the foot of which stands the town of the same name. Naturally the mountain is cold, dry, barren, bare, and uncouth, producing neither fruit, grass, nor plants, except some useless shrubs. It was in the year 1545, that the treasures contained in its bowels were discovered by an incident seemingly fortuitous. An Indian, called Hualpa, pursuing some wild goats up this mountain, and coming to a steep place, laid hold of a shrub to assist his ascent, which, yielding to his weight, came up by the roots, and discovered a mass of silver. At the same time, he observed large lumps of the metal in the earth, which adhered to the roots of the plant. With these first fruits of his discovery, the Indian, who lived at Porco, hastened home, washed the silver, and made use of it, repairing, when his stock was exhausted, to his perpetual treasury. In course of time, an intimate friend of his observing the extraordinary change in his circumstances, was desirous of knowing the cause; and, urging him closely upon this head, obtained an ample discovery of the whole secret. For some time, they maintained a kind of partnership; but Hualpa, refusing to disclose his method of purifying the metal, so offended his comrade, that he immediately revealed the whole to his master Villareal, a Spaniard, who lived at Porco. The Spaniard immediately went to view this fortunate breach in the mountain, and the mine was without delay worked with immense advantage. The first register of the mines of Potosi was in the month of April, 1545, and Hualpa's mine was called The Discoverer, it having marked out the channel to other sources of riches in this mountain. In a few days, another, equally rich, was found, and called The Tin Mine. Since that time, a third has been discovered, and called Rica, to distinguish its superior excellency, and this was succeeded by the discovery of the mine called Mindieta. From these four mines chiefly is extracted the immense wealth imported into Europe; but there are likewise other smaller mines, crossing the mountain in all directions, but especially north and south, which are allowed to be the richest veins. On the report of these important discoveries, people flocked from all quarters to Potosi, especially from the city of Plata, which is situated about twenty-five leagues from the mountain. At present, the town of Potosi is remarkable, not only for its riches, but the number of noble families, who reside here

- a here on account of their concern in the mines ; infomuch that the compass of the place is now extended to above two leagues. Notwithstanding the barrenness of the country, the town is well provided with every necessary, and the traffic for the supplies of life is greater here, than in any other part of Peru, Lima alone excepted. Some provinces send the best of their grain and fruit ; others their cattle ; and a few their manufactures. Those who trade in European commodities resort to Potosi, as to a market, where they are sure of procuring an exchange of silver for merchandize. Another species of commerce is likewise carried on here by a set of people called Aviadores. It consists in exchanging coin, towards paying the necessary expences of the workmen, for ingots and Pinnos. Nor is the article of trade for quicksilver of less consequence ; but this branch the crown wholly engrosses.
- b Before longer experience had instructed the Spaniards in the use of this mineral, a mark of quicksilver was consumed in extracting an equal quantity of silver ; and, at present, they are reported to be inexpert in metallurgy, notwithstanding this art is of the last consequence to the revenue.

THAT the reader may be able to form a pretty accurate judgment of the immense wealth arising from the discovery of the mines of Potosi, we shall subjoin the following accounts from two authors, who had examined the subject with the greatest accuracy. Alonso Barba, who was parish-priest in the imperial town of Potosi, affirms in his learned treatise on metals, that, from the year 1574, when mercury was first used here in extracting the silver, the royal office of Potosi consumed annually three thousand two hundred and forty-nine quintals of mercury. Gaspar de Epalona, another writer of credit and good information, alledges that the silver annually extracted amounted in his time to forty one millions two hundred and fifty-five thousand and forty-three dollars ⁿ. Most writers agree that the king's fifth greatly exceeds a million sterling (U).

WE hear very little of the gold of this country ; yet 'tis certain, it is by no means destitute of the precious metal. On the frontiers, towards Lima, there is one of the richest mines in America, which the Indians, from that circumstance, call Chuquiago, or the Golden Grange. Near la Paz, is a mountain of remarkable height, called Illimani, which beyond all doubt contains immense treasures. In the year 1680, a rock from the side of this mountain was struck down by a flash of lightning, which yielded such a quantity of gold, d in the fragments, that, for some time, this metal was sold at Paz for eight pieces of eight per ounce. At the other extremity of the audience towards Chili, the country abounds with mines of gold and silver ; and there is one gold mine particularly rich in the neighbourhood of Tarija, in the territory of Chocayas.

THE city La Paz is considerable in extent, surrounded with mountains, and commands a fine prospect of the river. When this stream is swelled by the rains, or melting of the snow on the mountains, its current forces along huge masses of earth, and fragments of rocks, in which are found grains of gold, after the flood has subsided, that sufficiently indicate the wealth contained in the bowels of the earth in this district. In the year 1730, an Indian, bathing in the river, discovered a piece of pure gold, so large, that the marquis e de Castel-Fuerto purchased it at twelve thousand pieces of eight, and sent it to Spain, as a present worthy the curiosity of the sovereign ^o. The adjacent country is beautifully watered with springs, and adorned with groves of fruit-trees, and fields of maize, which add equally to the pleasure and convenience of the inhabitants.

SCARCE any of the other towns or cities of this audience deserve notice ; but the English reader may expect we should give some account of the sea-ports, as in these he is chiefly interested. Atacoma is the first place to the northward which merits the name of a port, because it communicates with the sea, by the village of Cobija, which stands upon the coast, and has a harbour pretty much frequented by the Spanish shipping. The French too have endeavoured to profit by the vicinity of this port to the mines of Lipes, and its remoteness from the king's officers, carrying on a clandestine traffic for plate, and other commodities with the Spanish merchants. As to the town Atacoma, it is of little consideration, f being neither large, populous, nor commercial.

^o ULLOA, L. I. c. 14.

(U) We shall beg leave to subjoin a few particulars, merely to gratify the more inquisitive and curious reader. The mine, called Rica, was opened on a small eminence, resembling the comb of a cock, about three hundred feet in length, and thirteen in thickness ; the vein of which was so extremely rich, that it yielded nearly a moiety of pure silver ; but having sunk to fifty fathom it altered for the worse. All the mines are now decreased in value, and it appears, upon undoubted authority, that the mint doth not coin a fourth of the usual sum. There were once a hundred and twenty refining mills, now it is confidently affirmed, there are not forty kept in constant employment : yet from the wealth of the galleons, and the great number of wedges, and bars of silver, on board, we may conceive that the treasures extracted are to this day very considerable, and would be infinitely more so, were the Spaniards as skilful in metallurgy, as some other nations.

ARICA is, by some writers, numbered among the sea-coast towns of this audience. It is one of the ports to Potosi, although it stands little less than three hundred miles from the mines. Formerly, it was strong and populous; and, in 1630, the buccaneers were repulsed here by the inhabitants, as we learn from Dampier, who served in the expedition. About thirty years after it was destroyed by an earthquake, and now the town consists of a hundred and fifty families, including blacks, mulattoes, natives, and Spaniards. The immense booty taken here by Sir Francis Drake chiefly contributed to the decline of the opulence and trade of Arica. At that time, most of the silver of Potosi was shipped in this port for Lima; but since, the Spaniards have chiefly sent it by land, as the safest, though most difficult, conveyance.

YLO is another small port, situated in the eighteenth degree of south latitude. This town flourished towards the close of the last century; but it was so frequently attacked and plundered by the buccaneers, that it is now almost entirely deserted by the Spaniards, though a tolerably good and convenient harbour. Here the French made a settlement, in the reign of the fourteenth Lewis, and carried on a vast illicit commerce, which they have been since forced to relinquish. From this general view it appears, that the audience of Los Charcas is valuable, chiefly on account of those mines which send such immense wealth annually to Europe.

CONTRARY to the division made by all former writers, the intelligent Ulloa places Paraguay and Buenos Ayres within the jurisdiction of this audience; in which we shall follow him, as the most recent and authentic traveller. He calls Paraguay a government of Los Charcas, and the fourth bishoprick of the audience, lying south of Santa Cruz de la Sierra, and east of Tucuman, formerly regarded as a separate kingdom; but now reckoned a province of Peru, ever since it was first conquered by Nunez de Prado (W).

Paraguay.

THE country called Paraguay, was first discovered by Sebastian Gaboto, who passed from Rio de la Plata in 1526 to the river Parana, in small barks, and thence entered the river called Paraguay. Don Pedro de Mendoza, the first governor of Buenos Ayres, had given Juan de Ayolos a commission and a body of forces to complete the reduction of this country; but, after all, the Jesuits were the first who brought it into actual obedience. Nothing can exceed this country in beauty and fertility. The climate is moderate; the soil fertile, delightfully watered with springs, rivulets, and rivers, abounding with timber and fruit-trees, and producing abundance of cotton, sugar, indigo, pimento, ipecacuanha, and a variety of other drugs of great value. The plains are covered with cows, sheep, horses, mules, and the most useful quadrupeds; the woods resound with the most melodious notes of the most beautiful of the feathered creation; while the mountains contain vast treasures of gold and silver, from which, however, the Jesuits prudently abstain, well knowing the check which such a measure would immediately give to every kind of industry.

Soon after Juan de Sobras had founded the city called Nuestra Señora de la Assumption, a few Jesuits went to Paraguay, and converted about fifty Indian families, who soon induced a great many others to follow their example, on account of the peace and tranquillity they enjoyed under the direction of the fathers. They had long disdained to submit to the arms of the Portuguese and Spaniards; but they became willing converts to the religious tenets proposed by the Jesuits, who learned their language, conformed to their manners, and underwent the greatest hardships till they had an opportunity of cultivating the minds of their savage flock, improving them in the knowledge of social virtues, gaining an intire ascendant over their affections, and establishing the most solid and real authority; a dominion over the mind. Nothing could equal the address of the fathers upon this occasion, or exceed their perseverance. They began with assembling those untutored barbarians in towns, and forming

(W) Although the Spaniards possess only a few cities in the extensive province of Tucuman, they nevertheless claim the dominion of the whole. Ulloa expressly calls it a government within the jurisdiction of Los Charcas; but neither he, nor any other writer, ascertain its exact limits, or describe the country, with any degree of accuracy. It stands to the westward of Paraguay, and south of the river of Plata; but where it begins, we cannot precisely determine. According to the most recent geographers, it does not extend beyond the thirty-seventh degree of south latitude. Ulloa says, that it reaches from north to south above a hundred leagues. The cities possessed by the Spaniards are St. Jago del Eslero, so called from a river, on which it is situated, whose inundations greatly contribute to fertilize the adjacent lands; St. Miguel del Tucuman; Nuestra Señora de Talavera; Cordova de la Nueva An- dalusia; Rioja; and the large village of San Salvador. The two first of these are the most considerable; but they too are small, and built without order or symmetry. In fact, the Spaniards support themselves in this country, solely from the influence gained by the Jesuits over the minds of the natives; and the chief design of the court of Madrid in maintaining settlements here, is to secure a communication between the colonies on the South and North Seas. The commodities of the country are of themselves too inconsiderable to deserve the expence of maintaining garrisons; they consist chiefly in honey, wax, sugar, cotton, woollen stuffs, manufactured by the natives; and mules much admired for their strength and agility, great droves of which are annually exported to the other provinces of South America (1).

(1) Ulloa, C. 15. L. 1.

^a them into societies, regulated by a system of civil policy, not to be paralleled in the annals of mankind, if we may credit the account of their missions lately published by the learned and ingenious Muratori. They engaged to protect them against the insolence of the Spanish soldiers, and the tyranny of the governors; and they actually kept their word with respect to the Portuguese, against whom they obtained leave from the court of Spain to arm the natives. They set about disciplining the Paraguans, taught them the use of fire arms; and soon rendered them able to cope with the enemy, and to drive them out of the country. The mildness of the christian yoke, the exemption from taxes and all marks of servitude, rendered them extremely attached to their fathers, and made numerous converts. At present above 340,000 families are subject to the fathers, living in an obedience and awe bordering upon ^b adoration, yet procured without any violence or restraint. There are about threescore parishes on the banks of the rivers Paraguay and Panama, not exceeding the distance of thirty miles from each other. In each of these there is a jesuit, supreme in all causes, civil, military, and ecclesiastic; who may be regarded as a petty prince, and governs not only with the sway of a sovereign, but with the influence and reputation of an oracle. He nominates the chiefs in all the different departments. The cazique holds of him; the general receives his commission and instructions from this dictatorial jesuit; and all his decisions are without appeal. The regulations established are indeed admirable; industry is universal, but riches nowhere to be found in this country. Every family hath its proportion of land and labour, of plenty and of rest. The general produce arising from agriculture and manufactures is ^c carried to the magazines of the society, from whence it is distributed to individuals as occasion requires, the surplus, amounting as is thought to four millions of pieces of eight annually, being exported to Buenos Ayres, and exchanged for merchandize which the country does not produce, or converted into money, and remitted to Europe; the chief design of which institution is, that the Indians may have no occasion to leave their country to be furnished with necessaries, which are now supplied by the order. By this means they are kept from the contagion of those vices, which they would naturally contract by an intercourse with strangers less pure in their manners, and perhaps be taught to fall off in their adoration of the jesuits; a point of the utmost consequence to these politic ecclesiastics.

If the civil government of Paraguay be admirably calculated to produce happiness, the ^d ecclesiastical is still more wisely contrived to promote the same design. Every town and village hath its particular priest, assisted by two of the same order, and six boys, who chant in the churches, and form a kind of collegiate, where the hours are regulated in the same manner, and the exercises precede each other with the same formalities, as in the great colleges of cities. This priest, who, we have already observed, presides also over the civil œconomy, visits personally the Indian plantations, in which he is remarkably sedulous in order to prevent the indulgence of that slothful disposition natural to the natives. He likewise attends at the slaughter-houses, where cattle are daily killed, large herds of which are kept for the publick use, and their flesh distributed by the fathers in lots, proportioned to the number of persons in each family. This reverend director also visits the sick, to see that they are duly ^e attended; and provided with every thing necessary to their recovery. He catechizes the Indians in his district, or rather deals them out portions of the scripture, which he explains, obliging them punctually to frequent divine service on Sunday. The children, says Muratori, repair every morning by break of day to the churches, where they take their places on opposite sides, according to their sex. There they recite alternately the morning prayer, and christian doctrine until sun-rise; then mass is celebrated, at which all the inhabitants are obliged to attend, unless a sufficient reason can be given for their absence. After mass all go to work; and, in the evening, the children assemble to be catechized, and the adults to pray, by the toll of bell. Business multiplies on the Sunday, when the espousals and marriages are celebrated for the greater solemnity; high mass is sung, and an exhortation to ^f the married pairs is pronounced from the pulpit; after which a list is called over to see who is absent, and penances are imposed on all trespasses committed within the parish, or Reduction, since the preceding Sunday. The effect which this regularity produces on the minds and morals of the Indians, is astonishing. They are punctual in their religious duties, faithful in their dealings, charitable to the distressed, humble, obedient, and industrious, beyond what could reasonably be expected from a people naturally so indolent and slothful. The excess to which they carry their contrition and delicacy of conscience, appears especially at the tribunal of penance, where they shed a torrent of tears, accusing themselves of such trivial defects, that it is sometimes a question with the fathers, whether there be sufficient matter for absolution. The church resounds with sobbings and wailings; and the proselytes, full of ^g detestation of themselves, endeavour to expiate their failings (for crimes are scarce ever heard of) with austerities and macerations, which their zeal and superstition would carry to a pitch of extravagance, if they were not restrained. These are strong instances, says the ingenious Italian, of the piety, devotion, and docility of the natives; we regard them, likewise, as irrefragable proofs of the policy and address of the reverend fathers.

IMAGINATION cannot paint any thing in the Indies more regular, neat, and decent, than the parochial churches in Paraguay. They are capacious, rich, elegant, and splendidly furnished for that country; gilding and painting attract the eye, and strike the imagination on every side. All the sacred utensils are of gold and silver, many of them studded with precious stones, and curiously embossed. Magnificent galleries are erected for the civil magistrates on one side the altar, while the military officers occupy the opposite; and all the vulgar are seated with the greatest order and decorum on seats, placed round the area. The palace of the spiritual prince, who may be considered as a kind of pontiff within his jurisdiction, is grand, spacious and constructed in the manner of a church, in order to strike his simple subjects with religious awe and reverence. It consists of different apartments, suited to the various functions of the father, as a civil and ecclesiastical magistrate. Every morning after prayers is devoted to hearing the complaints, and redressing the grievances of such as demand audience. At noon, he hears confessions, and grants absolutions, in which he is extremely rigid and exact, that being the basis of his power, and the main pillar of his authority. In the afternoon, he walks abroad, inspects the publick and private affairs of the Reduccion, and superintends the labour of his parishioners; while the evening is devoted to catechizing, discoursing on moral and religious subjects, and instructing by conversation all around him. Such at least is the idea conveyed of the behaviour of those fathers, by their own writings, and the celebrated Muratori, on which we must implicitly rely, for want of better documents. Fame, indeed, has treated their characters with more severity, and they may not unjustly be accused of ambition; but surely this passion was never directed to more noble and useful purposes, than in taming the savage, instructing the ignorant, enlightening the Pagan, promoting industry, and inspiring a love of order, society, temperance, frugality and every other virtue, which can humanize the mind, and conduce to temporal and eternal happiness. We cannot be surprized that such an excessive reverence as is here shewn for the fathers, should excite certain sparks of pride and haughtiness, so natural to an elevated station; yet policy even dictates that they should maintain a certain loftiness and distance of carriage; yet their manner of living simple, their diet coarse, their sleep moderate, and their vigilance indefatigable, almost without relaxation, continually instructing either by precept or example. It is affirmed, however, that they carry their authority to an excess, causing even the magistrates to be corrected before them with stripes, and suffering persons of the highest distinction, within their jurisdictions, to kiss the hems of their garments, as the greatest honour to which they can possibly arrive. To this might be added the utter abolition of all ideas of property, which, indeed, is rendered useless by the general magazines and store-houses; yet it reflects on the character of the fraternity, that they possess large property themselves, and claim the absolute disposal of the meanest effects in Paraguay. All manufactures are theirs; every natural commodity is brought to them; and the treasures, remitted yearly to the superior of the order, sufficiently evince that zeal for religion is not the only motive of those persevering missions, so highly extolled, and deservedly, if we refer to the effect rather than the design.

BUT, besides those provincial governments, there is a kind of supreme council, composed of an annual meeting of all the fathers, who adjust the methods necessary to be executed for promoting the common concerns of the mission; framing new laws, correcting or abolishing old ones, and adapting every thing else to circumstances. Over this council, it is reported, that neither the Catholic king, nor the pope himself, exert any controul or authority; and indeed, since the erection of Paraguay into a spiritual monarchy, there is great probability that the jesuits claim independency; but we can advance nothing positively upon this head, as we are destitute of authentic documents, all the stories related of king Nicholas being founded merely on conjecture, or formed by the malice of the enemies of the fraternity. From the armaments fitted out a few years since by Spain and Portugal, we may reasonably conjecture that those courts dreaded the growing power of the jesuits, who were suspected of designs against Buenos Ayres and Brazil; and it is confidently affirmed that one maxim is strongly inculcated by the fathers, namely the danger it is to the salvation of an Indian to maintain any intercourse with a subject of Spain or Portugal. The natives are restrained from learning the Spanish tongue, or applying themselves to any studies but such as are immediately subservient to the good of the society; and it is one of the great objects of the annual councils, to take such measures as shall effectually deprive strangers of all intelligence concerning the state of the mission^p (X). Accordingly the Indians are confined to just a just as much knowledge as answers the purposes of the jesuits, and chiefly restrained to mechanical arts, architecture, painting, and musick ; for which they seem to have a natural genius.

(X) The vigilance and jealousy which the fathers unfavourable reports. If a stranger, in despite of all express in this particular, hath given birth to many their precaution, should find his way into the country, he

ANOTHER precaution taken by the fathers for their security is the establishment of a very considerable military power. They have trained up the natives to the exercise of arms ; so that the militia of Paraguay is at this day such a formidable body, as may probably foil all the attempts of the Portuguese and Spaniards, to reduce them to obedience. Every parish or reduction hath its corps of horse and foot, who are duly exercised every Sunday, in the manual exercise and evolutions, in the same manner as the Swiss militia. This force is divided into regiments, each of which is composed of six companies, with fifty men to b a company. The officers hold their commissions of the fathers, and are selected out of the body of the people for their activity, valour, and obedience. The cavalry is much on the same footing as the infantry, only the regiments are said to be less numerous. It is affirmed the Jesuits can raise a body of seventy or eighty thousand well disciplined troops, amazingly expert in the use of firelocks and bayonets ; and also in slings, with which they throw stones of four or five pounds weight, with astonishing force and wonderful dexterity. It is affirmed, they will hit the smallest mark at any proposed distance within the compass of their strength, and discharge their slings with such expedition, as terrifies the Portuguese more than the musquetry. Sorry we are that we cannot enlarge upon this subject ; but the authentic accounts are so general, and the particular ones so suspicious, that c we cannot possibly admit them into a history which we would endeavour to render valuable, at least, for its veracity ; and the judicious reader will, we doubt not, prefer a superficial, but true, relation to a more minute detail, that tends only to amuse and mislead. To conclude this sketch of a country, for a more accurate knowledge of which the curious have sought in vain ; we must observe that the city of Assumption, the capital, situated in twenty-five degrees, eleven minutes, according to the latest observations, at the conflux of the rivers Parana and Paraguay, is large, well-built, and populous.

BUENOS AIRES is also included within the jurisdiction of Los Charcas by Ulloa, and called the fifth bishoprick of that audience. This name, given from the pleasantness of the climate, is extended to all that country from the eastern and southern coast of that part of America, quite to Tucuman on the east, on the north to Paraguay, and on the south d to the Terra Magellanica, or the vertex of that triangular point of land, which composes South America. The country is watered by the great river La Plata, first discovered, in 1515, by Juan Diaz de Solis ; who, with his two attendants, was massacred by the natives ; and partly subdued by Sebastian Gaboto, who gave the great river the appellation of La Plata, from the abundance of the precious metals he procured from the adjacent inhabitants, imagining it was the produce of the country ; though, in fact, they brought it from Peru. The capital of the government, called Nuestra Señora de Buenos Ayres, was founded in the year 1535, under the direction of don Pedro de Mendoza, at that time governor. It stands on a point, called cape Blanco, on the south side of the Plata, fronting a small river, e in thirty-four degrees thirty-four minutes thirty-eight seconds of south-latitude, according to the observation of father Feville, a writer of extensive knowledge, and great integrity. The situation is in a fine plain, rising by a gentle ascent from the river, and truly paradisaical, whether we regard the temperature of the climate, the fertility of the soil, or that beautiful verdure which overspreads the whole face of the country, of which the inhabitants of the city have an uninterrupted prospect as far as the eye can reach. The city of Buenos Ayres is very considerable in extent, containing no less than three thousand houses, inhabited by Spaniards, and different casts of the natives. The streets are straight, broad, and pretty equal in the height and dimensions of the buildings ; one very handsome square f adorns it, the front, corresponding to this residence of the principal citizens, being a castle, in which the governor holds his court, and presides over a garrison of three thousand able-bodied soldiers. Most of the buildings are of chalk or brick, except the cathedral, a magnificent structure, chiefly composed of stone.

No country in the world abounds more in horned cattle and horses, than Buenos Ayres, where the greatest expence of a horse or cow is in the catching it, and frequently at the small price of two, three, or four ryals. In such abundance are those useful animals, that the

he is immediately secured by the superior of the parish, a house assigned and every satisfaction allowed him, except his liberty. If the father should permit him to see the town, it is always in his own company, and after notice has been given to the inhabitants to keep close in their houses, where they barricade themselves, as if they dreaded the assault of a powerful enemy. As soon as the opportunity offers for his embarking at Buenos Ayres, where the Jesuits keep their spies, the stranger is sent thither under a guard of Indians, who are entire strangers to every European language ; whence it is absolutely impossible for them to communicate any thing with respect to the state of the country. Besides, they have inculcated it as a point of religion, that the Indians answer no interrogatories either by signs or token, under pain of eternal punishments, which those ignorant barbarians are fully persuaded the Jesuits have the power to inflict.

hide alone is deemed of any value, as this constitutes a main article in the trade of the country. All rove wild in the fields, and, at present, they are more difficult of access, the terrible havock made among them obliging the cautious brutes to keep at a greater distance, and avoid their cruellest enemy. All kinds of fish are in the same abundance, and the fish called Rexereys is very remarkable, some exceeding half a yard in length. The fruits of every quarter of the globe grow up in the utmost perfection; and for the enjoyments of life, and the salubrity of the air, a finer country cannot be imagined.

WITHIN the government of Buenos Ayres, are three other cities, called Monte Video, Corrientes, and Santa Fè. The last stands about ninety leagues to the westward of Buenos Ayres, between the Plata and the Salado, which, after a long course through the province of Tucuman, joins the former. The city is small and meanly built; the neighbouring Indians, who have not yet received the doctrines of christianity, or submitted to the Spanish yoke, taking every opportunity of plundering the houses, and massacring the inhabitants. La Corrientes, situated on the eastern banks of the river Plata, is inferior, both in size and distinction, to Santa Fè; and, indeed, bears no other tokens of a city, beside the name and privileges granted to the inhabitants. The same may be alledged of Monte Video; yet all these cities have their corregidores, inferior magistrates, and a regular militia, who assemble on the first appearance of danger, and have frequently displayed great resolution and courage in repelling the attacks of the savage Indians.

Kingdom of Chili.

THE last audience of the Spanish dominions in South America, is that of Chili; the conquest of which powerful and rich kingdom by Valdivia, we have already related, if the establishment of Spanish colonies, and defeat of the unsubdued warlike inhabitants, may be called a conquest. The limits of Chili are not exactly ascertained; some confine it within the Spanish jurisdiction, others extend it from the twenty-sixth to the forty-seventh degree of south-latitude, and a few include within its limits the Terra del Fuego and the very extremity of cape Horn^a. We shall, however, upon the best authority, confine the name of Chili to that tract of land contained within the twenty-sixth and forty fifth degrees of south-latitude, and forty-seventh and fifty-fourth degrees of west longitude. Agreeable to these limits, it is skirted by Peru on the north; by the South Sea on the west; by Patagonia and the Terra Magellanica on the south; and by the province of La Plata on the east: containing a space of between twelve and thirteen hundred miles in length, and about half as much in breadth, if we include the vast plains of Chicuito, which lie on the opposite side of the lofty ridge of the Andes. The country, indeed, properly called Chili, lies between this chain of mountains and the sea, including only a space of about ninety miles in breadth. The length of this ridge of mountains is very extraordinary, it beginning at the Terra Magellanica, traversing the kingdom of Chili, the province of Buenos Ayres, the empire of Peru, the audience of Quito, the vast district of Terra Firma; and then contracting itself, as if it were for a passage through the isthmus of Darien, it widens again, and passes through the provinces and kingdoms of Nicaragua, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Mexico, and others more to the northward. In Chili, the mountains are so high, that we are told by a variety of writers, the Alps are no more than hillocks to them; and that, in passing over them, the air is so extremely light and rarefied as to occasion the utmost difficulty in respiration, and sometimes an hæmorrhage of the pulmonary-vessels^r.

CHILI lying south of the equator, the seasons here are almost opposite to those in the northern hemisphere; but the face of the country is beautiful, and the climate wholesome, notwithstanding the extremity of heat and cold in the different seasons. On the east, the country is screened by the Andes, while from the west, the air is cooled by the most refreshing sea-breezes. In some parts, indeed, the piercing winds, which blow in the winter from the mountains are intolerably sharp; but, in general, we may deem this one of the most comfortable climates in South America, being the medium between the intense heat of the torrid zone, and freezing colds of those countries removed at a greater distance from the equator, and more towards the vertex of that triangle, which composes this part of the American continent. In the winter, a light coat of snow falls upon the vallies; but the mountains are covered with such quantities, as, in the summer, supply the country with innumerable rivulets, which produce the most extraordinary fertility, observable in any part of the world. Here Indian and European corn, wine, fruits, and all the necessities of life grow in the utmost abundance and perfection; and we learn, from the latest travellers, that in the gardens of the cities, near the sea-coast, orange trees are kept in bloom and fruit all the year. With pleasure could we dwell on the description of Chili, were we allowed to indulge our vein as naturalists; but as brevity is essentially necessary to a work of so universal extent as our undertaking, we must confine ourselves to a few of the most essential particulars.

a THE productions of this country, most valuable in the opinion of the Europeans, are those contained in the bowels of the earth. These constitute it, beyond comparison, the richest territory on the face of the globe in gold, silver, mercury, lead, sulphur, and saltpetre, if we may credit the relation of Spaniards; who, at the same time, confess their little acquaintance with the interior and wealthiest part of the country, which is still in the hands of the natives. Extraordinary specimens of the richness of these ores have indeed been sent into Europe; but with respect to the number of the mines, and the continuance of the metallic vein, all must be conjectural, as the Chilefians express the utmost jealousy, lest the Spaniards should make discoveries, that might one day subject the inhabitants to the most cruel servitude. It is reported to be an invariable maxim with the Indians of b Chili, to punish with immediate death the discoverer of any treasure; and their power is so great, and disposition so warlike, that it would be impossible for the Spaniards to protect the criminal, who had thus roused the indignation of his countrymen. As matters now stand, the governor and colonists reap almost all the advantages of the Spanish settlements. All the precious metals procured by fraud or force from the Chilefians, become the perquisite of the governor, who makes no scruple of cheating the king, notwithstanding the vast charges of the government in salaries, and the maintenance of troops to support the Spanish interest against the attempts of the natives.

The number of inhabitants in this vast country are by no means proportioned to its extent. All the Spaniards in Chili are not computed at more than twenty thousand, and these dispersed in such a manner as gave the free Indians the greatest advantages in all their wars with the strangers. This was the greatest oversight in the conduct of Valdivia, the first invader of Chili, who, upon discovering gold, attempted to make so many establishments as furnished the Indians, whom he had treated so harshly, with an opportunity of recovering their liberty, and expelling the Spaniards out of the mountains. The free Indians are much more numerous, and all the inhabitants of Chili, including Europeans, Mestizos, Mulattoes, and Negros, are reputed at a hundred and fifty thousand only. Even the free Indians are said to acknowledge the dominion of the king of Spain, and to pay tribute to his governors; but the subject Indians belong entirely to the Spaniards, live among them, and serve them in the same manner as the natives of Peru and Mexico. For the better establishing of good order, and a regular police, they are divided, according to their habitations, into little lordships of a certain number of families, stiled Commanderies, the disposal of which is in the king, to any of the servants of the crown, whom he thinks proper to gratify. The greater part of Chili is possessed by the free Indians, who, in their last treaty, acknowledged the king for their lawful sovereign; upon condition they were suffered to continue under the protection of their own laws and government; an engagement, which it will be hazardous for the Spaniards to break, however; it may restrict their great design of gaining entire possession of the countries, and thereby repairing the constant decline of wealth and decay of the precious metals in their other settlements. In fact, the free Chilefians are rather the allies than the subjects of Spain. They are governed by d their own chiefs, who claim no authority besides that of administering justice, and leading the armies; having neither courts, regal pomp, guards, or any other of the badges of sovereign authority. They preside, indeed, at all national meetings, and here only, and in the field, their power or distinction is known; but the question is determined by a plurality of voices. He can also sound the alarm, and oblige the people to arm on sound of trumpet, to repair to a place appointed, and to form themselves under the national banners.

e THE Chilefians are tall, robust, active, and courageous. No other Indian people have cost the Spaniards so much trouble. They are dexterous in the use of pikes, bows, arrows, and swords. Their discipline is more regular and rational than that of the other Indians.

f The Chilefians fight in squadrons, retire when broke, and rally, fortify themselves with great address, and choose their ground either to engage, attack, or defend themselves with admirable judgment; of which the reader hath already seen abundance of instances in our relation of the long war which they supported against the Spaniards. At present they admit Spanish missionaries among them, and shew an inclination to embrace the gospel doctrine, to which their greatest objection is, lest it should bring them to slavery. They enter easily into the Spanish manners, which gives great pleasure to the colonists, in hopes it may be possible thereby to effect by example, what has foiled their arms; though, in our opinion, the conjecture is but ill founded. The Chilefians, by gaining the knowledge of fire arms, and European discipline, may one day be enabled intirely to expel the Spaniards; and this even

g is rendered the more probable by past experience. During the long wars between the allied powers and France, for the succession to the crown of Spain, great inconveniencies arose in this quarter of the world, because the Spanish ministry was too much employed at home to bestow any attention on the conduct of governors in America; who, by dint of cruelty and and oppression, drove the Chilefians of the plain into open rebellion, which might have proved fatal to all the Spanifh colonies, had the free Indians joined in the infurrection.

St. Jago city.

St. JAGO is the capital of all Chili, and stands in thirty-three degrees forty minutes fouth latitude. It was founded by Valdivia, in the valley of Mapocho, in the year 1541; and ftill remains on the identical fpot on which it was firft erected. The fituation is commodious and delightful, the furrrounding plain extending for the fpace of twenty-four leagues, watered by the meandering fream of the river Mapocho, from which the city is fupplied with water by conduits. St. Jago is reckoned a thoufand toifes in length, by fix hundred in breadth; befides the large fuburb called Chimba, on the oppofite fide of the river. In the center of the city ftands the grand piazza, which, like that of Lima, is fquare, with a very beautiful fountain in the middle. Here are the apartments of the prefidents, the palace of the royal audience, the town-houfe, the publick prifon, the cathedral, and a variety of other handfome publick and private buildings. The other parts of the city are divided into infulated fquares, regular, well-built, and commodious. Every houfe is provided with a court before, and a garden behind, which are abundantly fupplied with water, leading by conduits and canals from the river. By this means, the ftreets may be overflowed and cleaned at pleafure, with very little trouble, which keeps the place fweet and healthy. The Spaniards in St. Jago are reckoned to amount to eight thoufand, and the other inhabitants to about thirty thoufand, which fufficiently indicates the grandeur of this capital, that wants nothing befides ftone buildings to render it among the fineft cities in the Spanifh American dominions. The citizens are rich, fond of pleafure, and good humoured. Thofe who have acquired fortunes at Baldivia, Valparaiso, and Conception, repair hither to fpend the remainder of their days in eafe and enjoyment. Many have amaffed fortunes by their concerns in the gold mines of Tilti, and the Lavaderos, in the neighbourhood of the city, in which pieces of gold an ounce weight are fometimes found. A few have found the fecret of trading clandestinely with the Indians for gold, and they foon acquire immense wealth; but this traffic is laid under fuch reftriptions by the jealous Chilefians, that it requires a very intimate acquaintance with the country, and confiderable addrefs to carry it on with any degree of fafety or advantage. The royal audience refiding in St. Jago, fince its removal from Conception, is compofed of a prefident, four auditors, and a fical; together with an officer who bears the title of protector of the Indians. Though fubordinate, in fome refpects, to the viceroy of Peru, the determinations of this court are without appeal, except to the council of the Indies. The prefident is alfo governor and captain-general of the whole kingdom of Chili, in which quality he refides half the year in the capital, and the other half at Conception. The corregidor fupplies his abfence, represents his perfon, and governs not only the city but the whole audience of St. Jago.

Conception.

CONCEPTION, fituated in thirty-fix degrees, forty-three minutes, and fifteen feconds, is the oldeft European eftablifhment in Chili; and the fecond city in point of dignity. On their firft fettling in the country, the Spaniards had been repeatedly driven hence by the Indians, which obliged them to take up their refidence at St. Jago; and fince the city of Conception hath been destroyed by earthquakes. In the year 1730, both this city and St. Jago were laid in ruins by a dreadful fhock, the firft concuffions of which were accompanied with an unfual fwellings of the fea, that overturned the few houfes which had efaped the ravages of the earthquake. The harbour of this city is good, and pretty much frequented; for which reafon the Spaniards regard it as a place of confequence, as appears by the king's allowing three hundred and fifty thoufand pieces of eight per annum, for the fupport of a garrifon of three thoufand five hundred men; a corps that is feldom complete. None of the fortifications are confiderable; but thofe towards the land are wretched, the Spaniards now living in tolerable fecurity with refpect to the natives, and not conceiving the city can well be attacked on the land-fide by a foreign enemy. Indeed, if we may credit the moft pofitive affeverations of travellers, all the Spanifh fettlements, both here and in Peru, would fall an eafy conqueft, the fortifications being in ruins, and the garrifons, fcarce half the number required by the king: owing to the avarice, negligence, and fupine fecurity of the governors, who ftudy nothing more than to enrich themfelves. The city is the fee of a bifhop, which was transferred hither at the time the city Imperial was destroyed by the Indians, and here likewise refided the royal chancery, until fear of the Indians occafioned its being removed to St. Jago. The inhabitants are numerous, the fertility of the foil, and the excellency of the climate, having induced a great number of Spaniards and Mestizos to settle here, notwithstanding the danger to which they are expofed from the Indians. The peafants in the neighbourhood of Conception are remarkable for their addrefs in the ufe of the noofe and lance, which indeed are their principal arms. The ftories related by Ulloa of their dexterity are really aftonifhing. With thefe weapons, they will not only combat the fierceft bull, but render it impoffible for the moft cautious and active man to efcape their noofe, which they throw fo artfully as to lay certain hold of fome part of the body. In private quarrels, they fight a fight with the noose and lance, all attacks from which they are taught to parry with such dexterity, that after a combat of an hour, it is no uncommon case to see the parties separated, notwithstanding both have exerted the greatest alertness. When a bull is haltered, they draw the knot, at the same time they give spurs to their horses, and hamstringing him with their lances; so that the animal is taken and disabled in the same instant: This dexterity in throwing the noose, and hamstringing the animal in an instant; while they ride full speed, cannot fail of surprising the Europeans, and conveying a formidable idea of those alert natives, had they once acquired a juster notion of the art of war.

HAVING now compared the two principal cities of Peru, we shall proceed with the rest, in the order in which they are situated. The first port on this coast is Copiapo, standing in the twenty-seventh degree of south latitude. The harbour, indeed, is properly called Caldera, but commonly known by the former name on account of its contiguity. This may justly be reckoned the richest town in the world, in point of natural situation, if we consider that its foundation is laid on a gold mine; which, however, is not wrought by the inhabitants, because a still richer mine has been discovered at the distance of six miles. We may judge of the produce of these mines from the following account, extracted from a Flemish writer of good intelligence and credit. The inhabitants of the town are about seven hundred; the labourers in the mine amount to a thousand. There are twelve mills constantly employed, which extract at the rate of an hundred and fifty ounces one day with another. Besides the precious metal, another valuable article of commerce is in greater abundance here than in any quarter of the world. Saltpetre lies upon the ground two feet deep in many places; and under any other government than the Spanish, would attract a very considerable trade. To the southward of the town are the rich lead mines of Copiapo, which lie neglected; yet it is the opinion of divers intelligent writers, they might be turned to more advantage than the gold, on account of the great quantities of lapis lazuli found on the surface.

NEXT comes the town of Coquimbo, properly stiled la Serena, standing in twenty-nine degrees, and fifty-three minutes, of south latitude, in one of the most beautiful situations in the universe. The town is neat and elegant, well watered, and rendered a perfect paradise by the enchanting groves and gardens filled with the most refreshing and delightful fruits; the perpetual verdure, which covers the face of the country, and that blessed serenity of climate, and happy temperature of the air, which dispenses good health, the most valuable gift of Providence. The surrounding valleys are filled with cattle, and the fleecy kind; and so numerous is the breed of horses, that one, which would cost thirty or forty pounds in the cheapest country in Europe, may be here purchased for a twentieth part of the sum. Yet, after all, the place is wretchedly poor, merely for want of that circulation of commodities, which supplies the deficiencies of one country with the superfluities of another. The whole trade of Coquimbo consists in sending three or four vessels annually to Lima, laden with flour, wine, and provisions; in exchange for which they receive all kinds of European commodities, transported from hence to all the other towns in Chili.

VALPARAISO, situated in thirty-two degrees, fifteen minutes, south latitude, is the next port of any consequence. It is, indeed, the most considerable haven in these seas, being constantly filled with ships from Callao and Panama; unfortunately the mouth of the harbour is greatly exposed in the winter to the north winds, which then blow with great violence. Considerable sums have been expended in attempts to render this a place of strength, and the Castello Blanco makes a formidable appearance; but the orders of the government are so much neglected, that the ramparts are scarce ever mounted with half a dozen pieces of artillery fit for service; and as to the port of Quintero, about five leagues to the northward, though much frequented, it is left entirely without defence: at least, such was the state of these sea ports, during the last war with Spain, although only one feeble attempt was made to annoy the enemy in that quarter.

THE celebrated port of Baldivia comes next in order. It is situated at the bottom of a fine bay, in thirty-nine degrees, thirty-six minutes of south-latitude, and takes its name from the first conqueror of this country. We may judge of the value, which the Spaniards put on this port, by the sum of money granted annually by the king for maintaining a garrison, and keeping the fortifications in repair, which is no less than three hundred thousand pieces of eight. It is defended by four strong castles, mounting about a hundred pieces of fine brass cannon; for which, however, there never is a sufficient number of gunners, and carriages, nor store of ammunition. Besides, what dependance can be placed on a garrison composed of transported criminals, who are sent hither, instead of being lashed to the oar on board the galleys. The governor, indeed, is always a person of quality; but, as he is promoted merely to repair his fortune, it is always expected that he should profit by the opportunity. The attack made on this place by the Dutch, in 1643, evinces the facility with which it might be seized by a maritime power; especially as the very same negligence still prevails with respect to the garrison and fortifications. They soon ^a became masters of the town, and would probably have maintained their conquest against all the viceroy's power, if they had not been forced to relinquish it by sickness and famine. The inhabitants of Baldivia amount to about two thousand; the trade is less considerable than formerly, because the gold mines in the neighbourhood are shut up, yet ten large ships are employed in the trade between this port and Lima, which chiefly consists in gold, corn, hides, and salt-provision, exchanged for slaves, sugar, chocolate, and European commodities and manufactures. This is the last settlement of any consideration, which the Spaniards have in Chili, unless we except Aranca, where they maintain a garrison of five or six hundred men, and the beautiful little island of Cbiloa, at the most southern extremity of the province. ^b

UPON the whole, it appears, that the possessions of the crown of Spain on the continent of America are sufficient to raise that monarchy to the highest pitch of grandeur, were the true interest both of the mother-country and colonies rightly understood. The wealth yearly brought into Spain is immense; but that treasure is soon dissipated among the other more industrious and ingenious nations of Europe, in exchange for those manufactures and necessaries of life, which the Spaniards have either too much pride or too little policy to work up at home, in quantities sufficient for their colonies. Thus they may properly be called the miners and labourers of the other states, whose ingenuity is more than a compensation for the want of those stores of the precious metals, reserved for the Spaniards in the bowels of the earth. By supplying her colonies with those articles now purchased from ^c other countries with the gold and silver of Peru and Mexico, Spain would not only have acquired great internal strength, but have become the most formidable maritime power in the universe, by so active a commerce. Instead of these infallible maxims, so obvious to common sense, happily for her neighbours, this monarchy has had recourse to a more refined policy, which consisted in fixing her commerce by constraint, and establishing her power by the sword. Grasping at universal monarchy, and monopolizing the wealth of the Indies, were causes alone sufficient to have brought the Spaniards to their present languishing condition. For a series of years, a war was maintained in Germany, the Netherlands, and Italy, almost against the combined powers of Europe, by mere dint of the American treasures, which were soon exhausted without any care taken to establish a commerce of a more durable nature with the colonies. This infatuation in the Spanish councils produced the natural effects; the rest of Europe was enriched, and enabled to push a trade both to the East and West Indies, while Spain was impoverished. Had not Philip oppressed the Hollanders, and disturbed the English, both might have still remained inconsiderable by sea. To this, the former owe their liberty, and the latter their plantations, with the vast consequent extension of their manufactures. Hence it is, that, under the appearance of the wealthiest people in Europe, the Spaniards are nothing more than factors; the common people want bread, the rich are tantalized with just the sight of money, the publick is distressed, and equally destitute of cash and credit. On the accession of his present Catholic majesty, the court of Madrid seemed to be roused from that lethargy, in which it had been lulled for ^d the space of two centuries, and awakened into a sense of the benefits deducible from an active commerce; but this was no more than a dream, which vanished before the enchanting arts of the court of Versailles. Several excellent commercial regulations were instituted; but before the effects became visible, the Spaniards are again plunged in a war with Great-Britain, the issue of which does not promise them any great advantage; since, however fortunate, it cannot possibly compensate the suspension of those salutary measures projected at the accession of the present king (Y). ^e

(Y) There is one remark of a more abstract nature, which, nevertheless, irrefragably demonstrates that the comparative wealth of Spain, while she relies on the riches of America, must daily diminish. The specie of Europe was more than doubled by the conquest of Mexico and Peru, as appears by the doubled price of commodities. Thus the Spaniards, who purchased the merchandize of other nations, became nothing the richer for America; and, admitting they have every year the same quantity of silver imported, it becomes proportionably of lesser value; by which progression, their power will, in time, be annihilated. The value of specie is now thirty-two to one of what it was at the discovery of America: so that the decline of Spain in wealth must be nearly in the same proportion.

S E C T. XV.

Containing a description of the Terra Magellanica, Brasil, the country of the Amazons, and the European settlements in Guiana, which is all that remains undescribed of the southern coast of the peninsula.

^a TO complete the history of South America, we shall annex a short account of Patagonia, ^{Patagonia.} or the Terra Magellanica; Brasil; the country of the Amazons, and Guiana; which is all that remains to be described of the vast peninsula contained between Cape Horn, the extremity and the isthmus of Darien, either towards the northern or southern coast. So little, indeed, is known of that vast tract contained between Chili and Cape Horn, that we shall be able to relate all that is authentic in a very short compass. All the country extending from Chili and Paraguay to the utmost extremity of South America, is either denominated the Land of Magellan, or Patagonia; that is from the thirty-fifth almost to the fifty-fourth degree of south latitude, it being surrounded by the countries just mentioned, the South and North Seas, and the Straits of Magellan, that separate it from the island called

^b Terra del Fuego, which forms the very point of the peninsula. It was discovered in the year 1519, by Ferdinand Magellan, a resolute experienced Portuguese officer in the service of the catholic king; who is reported to have sailed through those straits, which bear his name, from the North Sea to the Pacific Ocean. For a series of years, the passage from south to north was deemed impracticable, on account of a strong current to the southward; but the experience of divers buccaneers, and especially of a French mariner, who returned to Europe through the straits of la Maire, as late as the year 1747, has removed this error. The observations made by Magellan and future adventurers, with respect to this country and its inhabitants, are extremely imperfect and defective. The people are reported to be of a gigantic stature, and, notwithstanding the inclemency of the climate, to go naked.

^c That they are barbarous is evinced by their treatment of the few unfortunate Europeans who fell into their hands. They differ indeed in manners, as they are divided into a great variety of nations; towards the straits they are said to be perfectly savage; on the frontiers of the Spanish and Portuguese settlements, they greatly resemble the Chileans.

SEPARATED in the middle by the vast mountains of the Andes, the country differs as widely as the inhabitants. The whole country to the northward of La Plata is covered with wood, and stored with an inexhaustible fund of large timber; whereas to the southward of that river, the eye cannot discover a single tree or shrub fit for any mechanical purpose.

Yet even this seemingly barren country produces good pasture; and numerous droves of wild horned cattle and horses, may be seen in every district. They were first brought hither

^d by the Spaniards, and the incredible numbers which now cover the face of the country demonstrates how congenial the soil and climate are to their nature. Perhaps the scarcity of fresh water may be an insupportable obstruction to the planting colonies in Patagonia, should that measure ever be thought adviseable; yet, admitting the truth of the assertion, we cannot see how the present inhabitants, and the prodigious flocks of cattle described, could exist under this inconvenience, and destitute of an element so essential to the being of most land animals. Nothing is related concerning the productions of the earth, and the reader who has consulted all that has been written by voyagers will find little to gratify his curiosity or instruct his understanding. Nor is there any thing more satisfactory written concerning the large island, called Terra del Fuego or Fago, separated from the continent by the straits.

^e We are even not certainly informed whether it be inhabited, though some writers assert that it is, and probability favours the allegation. The appellation of Fuego or Fogo it acquired from the first discoverers on account of some volcanos, which disgorged great quantities of fire and smok, at the time it was first beheld by those adventurers. The country extends from fifty-two degrees and an half to fifty-six degrees, lengthways from east to west, and is near half as much in breadth from north to south. The land is rough and mountainous; but frequently divided into beautiful fertile valleys, and pastures watered with a variety of fine springs, which come tumbling down the mountains. It is reported, that the inhabitants are naturally as fair as the Europeans, but that they go naked, and paint their bodies with the most gorgeous colours. Those on the south side are said to be uncivilized, treacherous, and barbarous; while those on the opposite side are simple, affable, and perfectly

^f harmless. The skins of wild animals are sometimes used to cover their bodies, upon occasions of extraordinary pomp; and their tents are made of poles disposed in a conical form, covered with skins, or the bark or leaves of trees. Round the point of the peninsula, and in the Straits of Magellan and le Maire, are a great variety of islands, of which scarce any thing more is known than the names imposed by the early navigators and first discoverers.

Brasil.

We now quit the Spanish dominions, to give some account of the settlements of the other European powers in South America; and first of the Portuguese colonies in Brasil, one of the most extensive and opulent countries in the universe, upon which depends the very existence of the Portuguese monarchy. This subject is the more interesting to an English reader, on account of the large sums of American gold drawn into this kingdom by means of the valuable commerce carried on with our near allies the Portuguese; who are no less sensible of the benefits they derive from the countenance and assistance of Great Britain, as appears by their late spirited conduct at the instance of the British ministry. All that tract of country stretching along the sea-coast from the mouth of the river La Plata, in the thirty-fifth degree of south latitude, to the great river of Amazon under the Equator, is denominated Brasil, and subject to the crown of Portugal. It is reported to extend in breadth from east to west about nine hundred miles, though the Portuguese have not established settlements in the interior country. Pedro Alvarez Capralis, a Portuguese admiral bound for the East-Indies, was the accidental discoverer, in the year 1501, though the Spaniards dispute this claim, as hath already been mentioned. In the year 1549, the Portuguese built the city of St. Salvador, which was the first settlement made in Brasil. The French, Spaniards, and Dutch have successively endeavoured to render themselves masters of a country, the source of inexhaustible wealth to the crown of Portugal; but without success. The latter, indeed, stood fair for the entire reduction of Brasil, when the good fortune of the Portuguese at length prevailed, and left them in the unmolested possession of their valuable colonies. This subject the reader hath already seen explicitly handled in our History of the United Provinces.

THE first aspect of the country from the sea is rather unfavourable, as it appears high, rough, and unequal; but on a more narrow inspection, nothing can be more delightful, the eminencies being covered with woods, and the valleys and savannahs with the most refreshing verdure. Within land, indeed, the Brasils are separated from the Spanish province of La Plata, which we have called Buenos Ayres, by lofty mountains (Z). In so vast a tract of land, it will not be imagined that the climate is equal, or the seasons uniform; they must necessarily differ under the Equator, and above thirty degrees beyond the Line. Thus the northern provinces are subject to heavy rains and variable winds, like other countries under the same parallels. Tornadoes, storms, and the utmost fury of the elements, wreak their vengeance here; while the southerly regions are blessed with all the comforts which a fine fertile soil and temperate climate can afford. In some of the provinces, the heat of the climate is thought to prove favourable to the generation of a great variety of noxious poisonous insects and reptiles: certain it is, that no country produces a greater variety of snakes of immense size; some of which, as the Liboya or Roebuck snake, extend to the incredible length of thirty feet, measuring two or three yards in circumference. The rattle-snake, and other reptiles of the same species, grow likewise to an enormous size; and the serpent called Ibibaboka is affirmed to be seven yards long, and half a yard in circumference, possessed too of a poison instantaneously fatal to the human kind. These are inconveniences with which Providence hath thought fit to alloy the manifold advantages of this invaluable country, in order to dispense her blessings more equally among the inhabitants of the earth in general. Here are scorpions, ant-bears, tygers, or madilloes, porcupines, janonveras, and an animal called Tapirasson, which is the production of a bull and ass, having a great resemblance to both.

No country on earth affords a greater number of beautiful birds, nor variety of the most exquisite fruits; but the chief commodities are Brasil wood, ebony, dying woods, ambergrease, rosin, balsams, indigo, sweetmeats, sugar, tobacco, gold, diamonds, beautiful pebbles, chrysal, emeralds, jasper, and other precious stones; in all which the Portuguese carry on such an amazing trade, as may justly be reputed the support, and indeed the vital fountain of the mother-country (A.) The mines of gold and diamonds are but

(Z) In calling La Plata by the appellation of Buenos Ayres, we have dissented from most writers: but as the Spanish settlements are confined to the country strictly called by the latter appellation, we chose to avoid minute divisions, which serve no other purpose than burthening the memory. It is, in fact, a lesser contained in a greater district.

(A) The court of Portugal hath found it necessary to restrain the importation of diamonds, to prevent a diminution of their value; but with respect to every other article of commerce, it is improved with the utmost industry. The crown-revenue arising from this colony amounts to two millions sterling in gold, if we may credit some late writers, besides the duties and customs on merchandize imported from that quarter. This, indeed, is more than a fifth of the precious metal produced by the mines; but every other consequent advantage considered, it probably does not much exceed the truth. The excessive confluence of people to the Brasil colonies, as well from other countries as from Portugal, not only enlarges the imports of gold, but what is of infinitely more importance to Europe in general, the exportation of the manufactures of this hemisphere, of which the principal are the following. Great Britain sends woollen manufactures; such as fine broad Medley cloths, fine Spanish cloths, scarlet and black cloths; serges, duroys, druggets, sagathies, shalloons, camblets, and Norwich stuffs; black Colchester bays; seys and perpetuanas, called long ells; hats, stockings, and gloves. Holland, Germany, and France, chiefly export fine hollands, bone lace, and fine thread; silk manufactures, pepper, lead, block tin

- a a recent discovery ; they were first opened in the year 1681, and have since yielded above five millions sterling annually, of which sum a fifth belongs to the crown. The diamond mines are farmed at about thirty thousand pounds yearly, which is thought to be scarce a fifth of what they actually produce ; from which and the other articles imported we may justly infer, that the annual Brasil fleet is certainly the richest which comes into Europe and West-Indies. Such, indeed, is the growth of industry and trade in Brasil, that it is confidently reported they send above forty thousand negroes annually to that country, from their extensive settlements on the coast of Africa ; a source for slaves which, in time, must be exhausted by the continual drain made by all the maritime powers, and that renders it
- b expedient to suggest some scheme of population in the colonies, whereby commerce may be carried on without this inhuman resource. Indeed we may safely affirm, by the policy of the Portuguese court in winking at the exportation of Brasil gold, notwithstanding the general prohibition, that kingdom deduces greater advantage from this single colony, than Spain does from all her vast possessions in South America.

To give the reader a more distinct idea of the state of the country, it will be necessary to enter upon the particular divisions of Brasil, by which the strength, wealth, policy, and utility of the colony will appear more obviously. For the better regulation of government, the Portuguese have parcelled out the Brasils into fifteen smaller provinces, which they call capitanias, or captainries ; the whole being a principality, which gives title to the presumptive heir to the crown of Portugal. Of these eight only are annexed to the crown, the rest being fiefs made over to some of the nobility, in reward of their extraordinary services, who do little more than acknowledge the sovereignty of the king of Portugal, and his representative the viceroy of Peru. This minister, who acts both in a civil and military capacity, maintains the state and court of a sovereign prince, in the city of St. Salvador in the captainry of Bahia de Todos los Santos. To proceed regularly with these captainries, we shall begin with Paria, the most northerly, and describe them southerly, according to their situation and contiguity. This province derives its name from the river Para, which runs through it from south to north, and discharges itself into the mouth of the river of Amazons, which bounds the province towards the north. The capital is Belem, frequently called Para, situated about the first degree of south latitude, in the mouth of the river of Amazons, not far from the confluence of the two rivers. The place is tolerably well built, and fortified. It contains about three hundred white families, besides a multitude of slaves, whose principal occupation is the planting and preparing sugar and tobacco. In this captainship are other settlements of some consideration ; but we must confine ourselves to a general view of the country.

THE next division is the captainry of Maragnano, so called from an island of that name contiguous to Paria. This, like all the other provinces, is watered by fine rivers, and a variety of purling rivulets, which serve to beautify and fertilize the country. The island Maragnano lies at the mouths of the three great rivers Maraca, Mony, and Topocora, is near one hundred and thirty-five miles in circuit, fertile, rich, and populous ; which induced the French to attack it, in the year 1612, to render themselves masters of it, and to endeavour establishing themselves in their conquest by erecting the city and fortification of St. Lewis de Maragnan ; of which, however, they were soon deprived by the Portuguese, who have ever since remained in the undisturbed possession. This town is small but strong, being defended not only by walls and bastions, but by a castle situated upon a rock almost inaccessible ; and so highly is it prized by the Portuguese, that a constant large garrison is maintained here, and the fortifications kept in the best repair ; yet certain it is, there would be no great difficulty in the reduction, as the works are badly constructed, after the method of fortifying which prevailed before the celebrated Vauban and Coehorn had led the way to tin, and other articles are also sent from different countries. Besides the particulars specified, England likewise trades with Portugal for the use of the Brasils in copper and brass, wrought and unwrought pewter, and all kinds of hardware ; all which articles have so enlarged the Portuguese trade, that instead of twelve ships, usually employed in the Brasil commerce, there are now never fewer than a hundred sail of large vessels constantly going and returning to those colonies. To all this may be added, the vast slave-trade carried on with the coast of Africa for the use of the Brasil colonies, which we may believe employs a great number of shipping, from the multitude of slaves, which are annually transported. Indeed, the commerce of Brasil alone is sufficient to raise Portugal to a considerable height of naval power, as it maintains a constant nurfery of seamen ; yet a certain infatuation in the policy of the country has prevented that effect, even amidst all these extraordinary advantages. All the ships employed in this trade being under the direction of the government, have their appointed seasons of going and returning, under convoy of a certain number of men of war ; nor can a single ship clear out or go, except with the fleet, but by a special licence from the king, which is seldom granted ; though it is easily determined, that such restrictions can prove no way beneficial to the general commerce, though possibly the crown revenue may be better guarded thereby. The fleets sail in the following order, and at the following stated periods : That to Rio de Janeiro sets sail in January ; the fleet to Bahia, or the Bay of All Saints, in February ; and the third fleet to Fernambuco, in the month of March. (1.)

improvements in that art. The town of Cuma, situated on the continent opposite to Alaragano, carries on a very considerable trade, and is considered as of great importance.

Siara. ADVANCING farther southward, we meet with the captainry of Siara, taking its name from a river which has its source far in the interior country. Here the Portuguese are limited to a very small territory, the bulk of the province being in the hands of the natives. The town of Siara and fort of St. Luke are the principal European settlements; the former of which stands at the mouth of the river, in two degrees thirty-five minutes of south-latitude. This place is populous, but of less consideration than the capital of the preceding province.

Rio Grande. THE fourth division as we proceed to the southward is Rio Grande, situated indeed directly to the east of Siara, but winding itself along the sea-coast to the south, where it is skirted by Paraiba. The Great River, whence the captainship takes its name, discharges itself in five degrees and a half of south-latitude; but notwithstanding its pompous appellation, is only navigable by large vessels at the entrance. This district is poorly inhabited, and thought of so little consideration by the Portuguese, that they have only the settlement of Figueres, some few plantations, and two forts for the protection of their possessions.

Paraiba. VERY different is the province of Paraiba, divided into two equal parts by a river of the same appellation, which falls into the ocean in six degrees twenty-four minutes south-latitude. Here the Portuguese possess numerous settlements, and a fine capital of the name of the captainry, well-built, populous, surrounded with ramparts, defended by several strong forts, and provided with so excellent a port, that large vessels can ascend the river quite to the fortifications. Besides, the port of Lucena, which is deemed an excellent harbour, is distant only about two leagues. We may justly reckon this among the most valuable provinces in Brasil, as it produces all the precious articles of commerce, and abounds in the conveniencies of life, cotton, corn, and the most exquisite fruits.

Tamarica. NEXT follows the captainry of Tamarica, taking its name from a fine island on the coast, situated in the mouth of the river Tamaric, which is likewise extremely valuable to the Portuguese, though less populous and cultivated than the former. The capital is called Tamora, or Tamarica, by the natives, but generally distinguished by the Spaniards by the name of Neustra Senora da Canccizao. It is situated at the entrance of the river, and is defended by a small castle, with a redoubt to command the avenues. Sugar is the principal commodity in Tamarica; and this valuable article is so happily cultivated, that the Portuguese have not less than thirty mills continually employed in this single province.

Fernambuco. ONE of the most considerable captainries in Brasil is the province of Pernambuco, Fernambuco, or Fernambucca, which is divided into eleven smaller districts, each of which takes its name from the capital town. This province abounds with variety of fruits, pastures, and cattle, and produces a prodigious quantity of sugar, an astonishing multitude of slaves being employed in that service. The capital of the whole province is Olinda, situated near the harbour of Arrarife, in eight degrees ten minutes of south-latitude. Hither the greatest part of the produce of North Brasil used formerly to be conveyed, in order to be transported to Portugal; but its unfortunate situation among hills, which so intirely surround the city as to render it incapable of defence, occasioned it to be neglected. It became an easy prey to the Dutch, who ruined the fortification; since which time it has never recovered its former splendor, notwithstanding it continues to be inhabited by persons of the best fashion, and is still regarded as the first city, in point of dignity, in the province. All the commercial advantages are, however, transferred to Fernambuco; which likewise enjoys the privileges of a city, and is, in fact, the capital both in wealth and the number of inhabitants. It was built originally by the Dutch in the island of St. Antonio de Vaz, and then bore the name of Maurice, in compliment to that celebrated captain of the United Provinces, who had so near established the dominion of the states-general in Brasil. Fernambuco is likewise called Rerief, or Arrarife, from a neighbouring harbour of that name, composed of a peninsula and several small islands at the entrance, which render the port secure, but somewhat difficult of access. The Dutch had this point strongly fortified, and joined to the town by a bridge. It is now the strongest harbour in all Brasil, a variety of forts being erected around, and the situation itself being extremely formidable, on account of the concealed rocks at the entrance; to avoid which requires a skilful pilot. For this reason it is frequently called Inferno-Boco, or, The mouth of hell.

Seregippe. THE next most contiguous province derives its name from the river Seregippe, which separates it almost in the middle, and disembogues itself in the ocean. The Portuguese plantations of sugar and tobacco are numerous. The captainry is laid out in a variety of smaller districts; but the capital of the whole is Del Rey, or Villa de bon Sucesso, also called St. Christophers by some English writers. As this city is now on the decline, it will be sufficient to mention, that it is situated on the north-side of the river Pazabaris, in eleven degrees fifteen minutes of south-latitude.

NEXT

a NEXT in order comes Bahia de Todos los Santos, the richest and most important province Bahia. in Brasil; the capital of which is the residence of the viceroy, and the see of an archbishop. Unhappily, the air and climate do not correspond with the other natural advantages; yet so fertile is the province in sugar and other commercial articles, that all the Portuguese flock hither, as the seat not only of pleasure and grandeur, but the scene for acquiring affluence. St. Salvador, called Ciudad de Bahia, the capital, is populous, magnificent, and beyond comparison the most gay and opulent city in all Brasil. It stands on a bay in twelve degrees eleven minutes of south latitude, is strong by nature, well fortified, and always defended by a numerous garrison. The trade carried on here is prodigious, and the manners of the gentry polished; but the vulgar who have acquired wealth are, as in all other countries, intolerably insolent and brutal. In Bahia are no less than twelve or fourteen thousand Portuguese, with three times that number of negroes, besides nations who chuse to reside in the city: from this circumstance we may judge of the wealth and populousness of the province, which abounds with opulent cities, and noble plantations of sugar, tobacco, and indico.

PORTO SEGURO is the province immediately nearest to the southward. It has a capital of the same name, and the remains of two cities, Santa Cruz and St. Amaro, which were formerly very considerable. The capital stands on a high rock, at the entrance of a small river, contains above six hundred families, and is deemed rather a place of strength than of consequence.

c KEEPING on our course, we arrive at the captainship of Espirito Santo, the capital of which bears the same name; and is situated on a bay, three leagues from the sea, in twenty degrees and a half of south latitude. The town, though the only one in the province, is not considerable; and yet this district is reported to be fertile in the necessaries of life, and abundant in a variety of commercial articles.

RIO DE JANEIRO, the next captainship, takes its name from a river of that appellation. The capital city bears the same name, but is sometimes called St. Sebastian, and is deemed rich and populous. It stands in the bay of St. Salvador, two leagues from the sea, and has an admirable port, which receives an annual fleet from Europe. In this province are the diamond mines, together with such rich plantations of indico, sugar-canes, tobacco, and other valuable articles of trade, that it vies with Bahia in opulence and importance.

VERY different from the preceding is the captainship of Angra de los Reyes, the next province on the south, which, except the capital St. Salvador, is almost wholly inhabited by Indians, who indeed live in great subjection to the Portuguese, but neither cultivate the country, nor exert so commercial a spirit as the Europeans.

ONE of the most extensive provinces in the whole territory of Brasil, is that of St. Vincent. cent; but its value is not proportionable. The capital bears the same name, and is a pretty town, situated in a fine bay of the Atlantic, at the confluence of three fine rivers. The gold mines, discovered in the mountains near this capital, are alone sufficient to render it of the last importance to the Portuguese; but with respect to beauty, merchandize, and the conveniencies of life, the province is no way comparable to many of the former.

THE last province of Brasil is that called Del Rey, or the royal captainship, extending from the river St. Francisco, northward, quite to the La Plata, southward. This captainry merits its title of eminence, from the great abundance which it yields of the precious metal. It has been laid down by a variety of geographers, as a province of Paraguay; but nothing can be more certain than that the Portuguese number it among their Brasilian settlements, and possess a great variety of strong forts along the Rio de la Plata for the security of a colony so important to the mother-country, and inviting to the enemies of Portugal.—Besides their settlements in the above-mentioned provinces of the continent, the Portuguese have established a regular colony on the island of St. Catharine, which now flourishes extremely; although it was originally peopled by the convicts and outlaws transported from Brasil and Portugal. The island is above twenty miles in length, six in breadth, stands in twenty-seven degrees thirty-five minutes south latitude, and is, in fact, one of the most beautiful, temperate, and fertile spots in the universe. Upon the whole, we may judge, from this short survey, of the importance of the Brasilian colonies, which would inevitably raise the mother-country to a great height of affluence and commercial power, were a few political errors remedied.

BEFORE we quit the subject, it will be necessary to touch upon a few peculiarities in the inhabitants, by which they are distinguished from the other Americans. On the first arrival of the Portuguese in the country, the natives were divided into contending states and factions, which enabled the invaders to render the whole an easy prey by balancing cautiously between the different interests. To justify these conquests, the Brasilians have been represented as a savage people, devoid of all principles of religion, cruel in war, and cannibals, or devourers of human flesh; yet the buccaneers, who penetrated into different parts of the country, Peculiar customs and opinions of the Brasilians.

country, deny this last circumstance, and affirm, that no such practice prevailed even among the Caribbees, the most barbarous of all the American nations. Knivet indeed alledges, that being left sick on shore by captain Cavendish in 1592, and, with twelve Portuguese, taken prisoners by the Indians, they broiled and eat the flesh of his companions, but saved his life, because they took him to be a Frenchman. In Purchas we meet with a minute relation of the ceremony previous to the bloody festival; but as it savours strongly of fiction, we shall think it sufficient to refer the curious reader to the passage^a. What credit can be given to a writer who affirms, that the inhabitants of Tucuman are pigmies; and that at the Straits of Magellan, he met with another nation of dwarfs, whose stature did not exceed five spans, whose mouths reached from ear to ear, and who had other marks of deformity scarce to be met with in individuals of the human species, much less characteristical of whole nations. b

THE same Knivet, whose monstrous falsities have been so carefully recorded by Purchas, acquaints us, that he knew divers Brazilians possessed by devils, and some who were killed by evil spirits. He once heard an Indian expostulating with the devil, and threatening to turn Christian if the spirit did not cease to torment him. But the Portuguese will not allow that those Indians are at all tinctured with the notion of any religion, and yet they confess they have priests, and admit of a state of reward and punishments, as the deserts of cowardice or valour. The prevailing notion among them, that after death they shall visit their ancestors dwelling beyond the Andes, evidently proves, that they entertain sentiments of religion, however gross and absurd they may appear to us who are blessed with the light of the Gospel; and whatever the Portuguese may think, that without images there can be no religion, we must confess ourselves fully of opinion the Brazilians believed in certain invisible beings, the disposers of good and evil, the rewarders or punishers of vice and virtue, in which consists religious belief. As to their having no temples, it may arise from their profound reverence for the Deity; who is not to be circumscribed by time or place, or worshipped in the mean trifling houses erected by human labour, but under that glorious canopy of the heavens spread out by his own hands. c

NOR is the other notion propagated by travellers, that the Brazilians live without any regard to government, more consonant to truth. Even those writers who deny they have any policy, speak of their kings, generals, and caziques; and they even admit that there is a scale of subordination among them, from the meanest slave to the greatest monarch; which can be nothing else than a social institution, though perhaps less refined than in European countries, where all proceeds according to explicit written laws. If one man injures another in Brazil, he is obliged to make him satisfaction in kind, the lex talionis being the fundamental principle of justice among the Indians. There are persons whose special business it is to administer justice to the people, in the name of the king or chief; and commonly the prince sits in person at the board of equity. No people on earth display more hospitality and civility to strangers, than the Brazilians; and this is acknowledged by the Portuguese writers themselves, while they are endeavouring to stigmatize those generous savages with the odious appellation of cannibals. The rites observed at funerals, is a farther proof of their belief of a future state. The friends and relations of the deceased set up a lamentable howl, and praise alternately the beauty, strength, talents, and virtues of the departed relation, crying out, in the most melancholy voice, they shall never see him more until they dance with him beyond the mountains. When these wailings have lasted for the space of six hours, preparation is made for burying the corpse in a sitting posture, with a dome erected over by way of vault, in which is deposited all manner of provisions, to support the departed spirit on his tedious journey. As to the master of the family, he is usually honoured with a tomb in the middle of his own house, that he may be the better attended; and his monument is generally adorned with the most beautiful feathers and other ornaments. d

WITH respect to the knowledge of the Brazilians in the art of war, it consisted only in the use of bows, arrows, wooden clubs or swords, and shields. Singly, they fought with great address and agility; but when they attacked in a body, all was confusion and tumult. The Brazilians had no idea of separating great bodies of men into smaller corps, or of charging or sustaining an assault in lines and ranks; they rushed on precipitately, and overthrew themselves with their eagerness. Their marches and retreats were rapid beyond measure, as they never encumbered themselves with baggage; and their principal security consisted in the exceeding velocity of their movements, which could not fail to disconcert a regular enemy. They would march day and night without halting, make their attack upon a quarter where they were least expected, disappear again in an instant, and by this means elude the vengeance which they could not withstand. They had no fortifications or walls to their towns, which exposed them extremely to the ravages and sudden incursions of a hostile neighbour; but as the advantage was mutual, until the arrival of the Europeans, the inconvenience arising from their open situation was not perceived.—Such were the an- e a cient Brasilians, according to the most authentic relations ; with respect to the modern race, they are nearly the same in the interior countries, where the manners of the Portuguese and multitudes of imported negroes have not yet mixed themselves with the original customs.

Republic of St. Paul.

NORTH of the province of St Vincent, and at the distance of thirty miles from the interior frontier, is the little republic of St Paul, surrounded by inaccessible mountains and almost impervious forests. This state was composed of outlaws from all the colonies; Spaniards, Portuguese, Creoles, Mestizoes, Mulattoes, Negroes, who took refuge on this spot, and lived at first without order, society, faith, honour, or religion ; preying upon each other, and subsisting by mutual rapine and the plunder of their neighbours. The inconveniences of this kind of life, and the necessity of amity among themselves, in order to resist or attack with more vigour, soon drove them into confederacies, which gradually subsided in a regular democratical society, in which they preside alternately over public affairs. Were they more numerous, they would be formidable to the Portuguese colonies : but as they are not reputed above four thousand in number ; as they are deprived of fire-arms, and are now less troublesome than formerly, they give no apprehension, and consequently no attempts are made to reduce the Paulists to the dominion of the crown of Portugal. At present, the little community claims intire independence, though they pay an annual sum to the king out of their gold mines, rather to preserve certain commercial benefits, than to acknowledge his sovereignty. The capital town is called St. Paul ; it is reported to be neat, well built, and opulent, the mines of the republic being exceedingly rich : however, as the people express great jealousy of strangers, nothing certain hath transpired, all the accounts we have being taken from the relation of negro-slaves who found means to desert the service.

THE interior country towards the west is almost utterly unknown to the Europeans, except just along the banks of the river of Amazons and the western frontiers of the Portuguese colonies in Brasil. This vast tract of country, separated by the Equator from Terra firma on the north, skirted by Brasil and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, and hemmed in by the river La Plata towards the south, derives its name from a supposed nation of female warriors, reported by the first European adventurers to inhabit both banks of the river called Amazon. Voyages were made by divers Spaniards down this great river, which has its source in the province of Quito, and traverses in a winding course the whole continent of South America. The celebrated M. Condamine not many years since made a voyage down the river of Amazons, and has published a very judicious and entertaining journal of that adventure, to which we must refer the reader, as it would greatly exceed our limits to epitomize it in such a manner as to render the abstract useful or entertaining. In general it is agreed among travellers, that the temperature of the air is more moderate in this country, than could well be expected from its near situation to the Equator. This is ascribed to the heavy rains, which almost deluge the lands at certain seasons, and occasion the rivers to overflow their banks, cool the air, and fertilize the soil ; and the brisk easterly gales which blow from the Atlantic across the country so strong, that vessels are enabled to perform the voyage up the stream, as readily as down the river of Amazons. The face of the country is beautifully covered with herbage and fruit-trees, which display the bloom of spring and the ripeness of autumn at the same time. The commodities of the country are iron wood, so called from its weight and density, logwood, canela, or spurious cinnamon, and several drugs and dying woods. It also produces maize and cassavi root in great abundance, of which the natives make bread ; tobacco, cotton, sugar, and all the articles of commerce specified in our description of Brasil. The natives are, like almost all the Americans, of good stature, have handsome features, long black hair, and copper complexion, differing wholly from the natives of Africa in the very same latitude, on the opposite side of the Atlantic. They are reported to have a taste for the imitative arts, especially sculpture and painting, and frequently excel in mechanical professions, considering the scanty opportunity they have for improvement. As to the Amazonian race, if ever such a people existed, except in the fruitful imagination of the relators, it is wholly extinct ; and probably the notion arose from the activity and courage which the females of this country exerted, in the defence of their privileges, against the encroachments of foreigners. Both sides the river are inhabited by distinct nations, governed by their chiefs or caziques ; for it is observable, that a monarchical state of government prevails universally among barbarians, as requiring a less refined policy than a republican system. As the Jesuits are reported to have found their way into this country, we may soon expect to hear of extraordinary alterations, and possibly of a similar policy with that established in Paraguay, to compensate the late decline of their power since the defeat of their army by the united forces of Spain and Portugal ; an event of which no authentic account hath yet transpired.

Country of the Amazons.

THE last country which we have to describe in our course along the coast of this vast peninsula, is the province of Guiana, or Caribiana, properly a part of Terra firma, bounded by the river Oronoko and the Northern or Atlantic Ocean on the north and east, by the country of the Amazons on the south, and the provinces of Grenada and New Andalusia on the west.

Guiana.

The extent of the province is above twelve hundred miles from east to west ; that is, from the mouth of the river Orocoko under the Equator, to the mouth of the river of Amazons ; and six hundred miles from north to south, from the frontiers of New Grenada and Andalusia to the Atlantic Ocean. Most geographers divide this country into two parts, which have different names, although the same appellation has been given in a general view to the whole country. The coast along the Atlantic is distinguished by the name of Caribean Proper, and the interior country called Guiana Proper, or El Dorado, by the Spaniards, on account of the immense quantity of gold supposed to be lodged in the bowels of the earth within this district. The Portuguese, French, and Dutch, have all settlements along the coast ; and that part of the country south of Cape North, has of late years been wholly ceded to the Portuguese, and it is included among the Brasil colonies ; but the natives are possessed of the whole interior country. They are numerous, divided into a variety of different nations, and reported to be governed by a regular system of polity, with the same manners, customs, and religion established in Peru, and to possess a number of handsome, populous, and flourishing cities. Yet this is directly contradicted by some writers, who affirm, that nothing is to be met with in the interior parts besides a few straggling villages, composed of wretched huts, which the inhabitants frequently desert, leading a vagrant unsettled life, in the manner of the wild Arabs and Tartars. Their furniture consists of little more than the hammocks they sleep in, sometimes fastened to the ridge poles of their huts, and frequently to trees, under no other cover than the heavens ; and a few earthen pots, gourds, and calabashes. To reconcile relations so exceedingly different, is more than we can presume ; we cannot, however, avoid remarking, that it is very extraordinary there should be such imperfect accounts of a country so long frequented by the Europeans.

ALONG the coast the land is low, marshy, and subject to inundations from a multitude of rivers, which run precipitately in the rainy season from the inland mountains. Hence it is that the atmosphere is suffocating, hot, moist, and unhealthful ; especially where the woods have not been cleared away. Indeed the Europeans are forced, on account of their commerce, to live in the most disagreeable situations, and fix their colonies at the mouths of rivers, amidst stinking marshes, and the putrid ooze of salt-morasses, for the conveniency of exportation and importation. In their persons, the natives resemble the inhabitants of the more southern parts of Terra firma. Their stature is nearly the same ; but their complexions of a darker copper colour, arising probably from their dwelling under a vertical sun. There is nothing either gigantic or diminutive to be met with, as was affirmed by the first discoverers ; but every thing analogous to the rest of the creation. The Indians in the neighbourhood of the Europeans have imitated some of their customs, and now cover their bodies with a kind of clothing, for the sake of decency, of which formerly they had no idea. In ornaments they differ but little from all the other Americans, who delight in strings of beads and shells suspended round their necks, plates of gold or silver in their noses, and large ear-rings of the same metal.

FROM the river of Amazons to Cape d'Orange is wholly possessed by the Indians ; containing two hundred and forty miles of a coast extremely dangerous, on account of the high tide and vast surges which lash the shore. This likewise is one of the most unwholesome parts of the country, as is experienced by the European shipping, whenever their affairs oblige them to touch upon the coast ; even the natives are subject to endemial distempers, arising partly from the foulness of the atmosphere, constantly loaded with putrid exhalations, and also from the nature of the soil, which is so marshy as scarce to afford a dry spot for building their mean huts and wretched villages. Hence it is, that they frequently build in the trees, more in the manner of the feathered kind than of human beings. The chief trade carried on here is for seals and other sea-animals, found in great abundance between Cape d'Orange and the river of Amazons. Some writers distinguish this tract of maritime country by the appellation of Indian Guiana, a name more properly given to the country behind the European settlements.

Cayenne.

THE next district is called French Guiana, or Old Cayenne, which some choose to distinguish by the name of Equinoctial France, because it extends so near the equator from the eastern banks of the river Marani in six degrees twenty-five minutes of south, to four degrees ten minutes of north latitude ; the whole containing a space of above two hundred miles stretching along the coast. The chief settlement of the French nation is on the island of Cayenne, situated at the entrance of a river of the same name, about an hundred miles north-west of Cape d'Orange. The island of Cayenne is not reckoned above sixteen or eighteen leagues in circumference : the greater part of the coast being washed by the sea, and the rest surrounded by the waters of two branches of the river. It is well wooded and watered, admirably cultivated, and extremely fertile in sugar, tobacco, maize, herbage, and the necessaries of life ; but the French fort, at the bottom of the harbour, is wholly supplied with fresh water by rain, which is preserved in large cisterns. Close by the walls of the fort is secure anchorage for a great number of shipping in all seasons of the year, whence

- whence this place is of the greatest importance to that nation. Near fort St. Lewis is a very considerable town, containing above two hundred houses, occupied by mechanics and tradesmen. The garrison is strong, and the fort well defended with cannon, and provided against any sudden attack. In the year 1635, the French first established themselves on this island, and on the opposite continent, under the conduct of M. Bretigny, who lost his life by the hands of the natives, which his accident reduced the colony to the utmost distress; but they bravely defended themselves against numerous armies of Indians, until the arrival of a reinforcement. They afterwards abandoned it, and the English took possession of the island only to make way for the French, who were expelled by the Dutch in 1646, under the command of admiral Einks. The Dutch held their conquest but a short time; they were driven out by the count d'Estrees, the French admiral, the same year, since which time it has been held by France; though the Hollanders have made repeated attempts to recover their loss.

In Cayenne there are several populous villages, some of which are chiefly inhabited by Jews, who carry on a great trade, and add considerably to the wealth of the island, for which reason chiefly they are tolerated. As the colonists were desirous of extending their influence on the continent, they have built a redoubt on the side of the river to defend its entrance, and have taken other precautions to secure their establishment against the attacks and insults of the maritime powers. Within land they have the fort of Sinararay, which answers the purpose of an advanced post; there a hundred men are kept constantly in garrison under the command of two or three officers.

- c THE last division is Dutch Guiana, which extends along the coast from the entrance of the river Marani, in six degrees twenty minutes north-latitude, to the ninth degree, on the mouth of the river Oronooko. The chief settlement is at Surinam, a town built within the river of the same name, in six degrees sixteen minutes of north-latitude; and this name now extends to the adjacent country for above an hundred miles round. Of this district, the Hollanders regard themselves the sovereigns, and behave with the haughtiness peculiar to that nation wherever they have gained a superiority; a conduct by no means agreeable to the natural phlegm of the people, or the wisdom of the constitution, since by gaining the detestation of the natives, they furnish the easy means to any enterprising European power to supplant them here, as they have been in Brasil by the Portuguese, d and New York by the English. The climate is rendered much more wholesome by the industry of the Dutch, who have cut avenues through the woods, and made passages for currents of air, that carry off all the unwholesome exhalation which proved fatal to the first colonists. The planters and traders of this place take the name of the Society of Surinam, because the settlement is the joint property of the Dutch West India company, the city of Amsterdam and the proprietary of Samelsdyck; but in what manner their different rights arose, or how they are formed, we cannot inform the reader. The colony is now in the most flourishing situation, and a prodigious trade is carried on not only with Europe, but the West India islands; especially the British. The river of Surinam facilitates commerce, being navigable for thirty leagues up the country; and the Dutch have been careful to improve e the natural situation by all that art and industry could bestow. They have a fort called Zelandia, built with bricks, about two leagues from the entrance, and also a small town called Paramairambo, containing about four hundred houses, at a little distance from the fort. There are no less than seven or eight inland towns, all of which are rich, populous, and commercial; which evidently proves the flourishing state of the colony, and the assiduity with which this nation improves every advantage, which they have once obtained. The number of plantations belonging to Dutch traders are affirmed to exceed four hundred in number, and the families of this nation to amount to a thousand. The colony is governed by a board of ten directors at Amsterdam, five of whom are elected by the magistrates of the city, four by the West India company, and one by the proprietary lord of Samelsdyck; but the governor f must be approved by the states-general, and take an oath to them, as well as to the directors. The principal trade of the colony consists in sugar, tobacco, gums, dying drugs, and woods, coffee, cotton, flax, and skins, which are sent to Holland in exchange for the commodities of Europe, or carried off by the English, French, and Spanish traders of the West Indies. To promote commerce is the first care of the government; the interest of religion is but a secondary purpose. Accordingly there are but four places of worship in the whole district of Surinam, and no pains at all is taken to convert the natives; a neglect for which the Hollanders are severely treated by the more rigid and superstitious catholic writers. With respect to the government abroad, it is composed of a governor and political council, who charge themselves with all the business of the colony, and are answerable for their conduct to the board of directors, and even to the states-general. The whole district is parcelled g out into eight parts, each division being obliged to maintain a company of soldiers, besides the garrisons, all of whom are under the command of the governor; who is also head of the council as well in quality of a military officer, as of a civil magistrate.

S E C T. XVI.

Containing a history of the first establishment and progress of the British settlements in North America.

HAVING fully discussed the subject of the Spanish and Portuguese colonies on the continent of America, in the most natural historical, and geographical order; we now proceed to the British and French settlements North of the equator, which have been the source of manifold blessings and calamities to both nations; and contributed to raise the northern countries to a height of naval power, never before known in Europe, while they involved them in tedious bloody wars, attended with the consumption of immense treasures, and the loss of their bravest subjects. We begin with the British colonies, not only as they are immediately contiguous to the Spanish province of Florida, but the most important and extensive, more especially since the reduction of Canada; running in a direct line along the coast of the Atlantic Ocean, from the thirty-second almost to the fiftieth degree of North latitude. The great extent to which our labours have necessarily swelled obliges us to brevity; the reader must therefore only expect we should touch upon such particulars as are essential to our purpose of exhibiting a distinct historical, political, and geographical view of the northern continent of America (A).

First expedition of the British nation to North America.

To Sebastian Cabot, son to a Venetian pilot, but a subject and native of England, we owe the discovery of the north-east part of the American continent. In the year 1497, he was employed by the seventh Henry to discover a north-west passage to China; an enterprize in which he failed, although it was attended with happier consequences than were foreseen when the expedition was projected. Thus, if priority of discovery without continued occupancy or possession can communicate right, the English have an indisputable claim to the whole country, extending along the coast from the gulph of Florida quite to Labrador. For the space of a century after the discovery, the English neither navigated the coast nor attempted to establish colonies, which will appear the less extraordinary to the intelligent reader, who reflects on the circumstances of the reigns of the eighth Henry, the sixth Edward, and the bigotted Mary; reigns peculiarly averse to the extension of industry, trade, and navigation. It was late, even in the reign of Elizabeth, before that politic princess found leisure to cast her eyes on the colonization of North America, so deeply was she engaged in supporting the oppressed protestants of France and the Netherlands, and curbing the exorbitant pride and power of the house of Austria. The success of the Spaniards in Mexico and Peru, as well as their invasion of Florida, pointed out the way to other adventurers; yet did Elizabeth for many years confine her measures to distressing the commerce of the enemy, plundering the ships, and ravaging the colonies of Philip, without a thought of laying the basis of an empire on this continent. A singular advantage, however, arose from these enterprizes; the English seamen became acquainted with the navigation of America, and obtained several useful hints, not only relative to the Spanish colonies, but to countries hitherto unsubdued and uninvaded. Mr. Raleigh, afterwards Sir Walter Raleigh, a gentleman of good family, a liberal education, enterprising genius, and fine talents, first schemed the project for discovering lands and planting colonies in such parts of North America as were not actually possessed by other Christian powers. In the year 1584, he obtained a patent from the queen to discover, plant, enjoy, hold, and occupy, to him and his heirs for ever, such remote and heathen barbarous countries, on the continent of America, as were not possessed by any other European potentate, reserving to the crown a fifth of the gold and silver, which would be discovered. No sooner was he vested with this grant, than Mr. Raleigh formed an association of his friends, who contributed considerable sums towards the adventure, and enabled him to fit out two ships under the command of the captains Philip Amidas, and Arthur Barlow. From the tenor of this patent, it is perceivable that the main object of the adventurers was the discovery of gold and silver mines, their views not reaching so far as other commercial advantages, more precious than the richest mines (B).

Mr. Raleigh projects a colony.

A. D. 1584.

(A) By the late peace, the province of Florida is ceded to the crown of Great Britain.

(B) In Purchas's collection, we meet with an account of voyages made in the reign of Henry VIII. by Mess. Thorn and Elliot to Norembegua, the antient name of all the coast, afterwards called Virginia, northward of forty degrees north latitude. They only went merely to trade with the natives; but it is asserted, that one Mr. Horn attempted a settlement, which proved extremely unfortunate, most of the adventurers having been massacred by the natives (1).

a ALL things being in readiness for the voyage, the two captains set sail from Plymouth in the month of April, the same year: arrived at the Canaries on the tenth of the month following; and steered directly for the Caribbee islands, which at that time was the usual tedious rout to the continent of America, from a mistaken notion, that the current set so powerfully to the northward on the coasts of Florida and Norumbegua, as to require this circuit or above a thousand leagues. Some writers speak as if Mr. Raleigh went in person on this expedition; but the most authentic and explicit documents only alledge that the captains Amidas and Barlow arrived at the island of Roanoke, near the mouth of the river Albermarle in North Carolina, of which they took formal possession in the queen's name; carried on an intercourse with the natives of the island and neighbouring continent; b exchanged trinkets for furs, pearls, and coral; met with great civilities from the inhabitants; and then returned to England, with two of the natives, without having attempted to settle a colony. The cargo imported consisted chiefly of the articles just mentioned, of saffrass, cedar, and a little tobacco; and sold to so much advantage, that the society were encouraged to make fresh efforts. Accordingly, a fleet of seven vessels under the conduct of Sir Richard Grenville was equipped the following year by Mr. Raleigh, and his associates, who had now tasted the first fruits of their public spirit.

On the ninth day of April, Grenville sailed from Plymouth, and arrived at the island of Wokokon, where the admiral's ship was lost in attempting to enter the harbour. Hence he went, attended by a number of his officers, to the continent, and came to the town of Scroton, where he was hospitably received by the inhabitants; but some of them having pilfered a silver cup from the English, of which no restitution was made, the admiral gave loose to an imprudent revenge, plundered one of the Indian towns, and destroyed their corn fields, and was forced to avoid the rage of the natives by immediate embarkation. He steered for Cape Hatteras, was visited by the chief of the country, entered into a friendly intercourse with the natives, and then passed to the island of Roanoke, where he remained for the space of six weeks; during which time, he took a survey of the adjacent continent, and made several experiments on the quality of the soil, by sowing different kinds of grain. Every thing corresponded so exactly to his wishes, that he left a colony upon the island of one hundred and eight men, under the command of captain Lane, and then d returned to England. The captain, charged with the care of the colony, proved equally diligent and enterprising. Immediately on the departure of the admiral, he made preparation for discovering the continent; and, with this view, proceeded in his boats along the coast to Cape Henry, at the entrance of the bay of Chesapeake, without the least obstruction or molestation from the natives. His success encouraged him to make the same discoveries to the westward; but in this design he met with opposition. The inhabitants, seized with jealousy, lest the intention of the strangers was to render themselves masters of the country, set fire to their corn fields and habitations, and retired with their families from the banks of the river Morotock. It was now apparent, that the design of the English to establish a footing in the country was suspected by the Indians; yet Lane was not discouraged. e He relied on the advice and assistance of Wingina, a petty sovereign, who had professed the greatest friendship for him, in order to betray the colonists into such measures as he hoped would prove fatal to their projects. This artful barbarian persuaded the captain, that near the source of the river Morotock, he would meet with great quantities of gold, not above forty days journey to the westward; and find a passage, a short distance from the head of that river, to a great ocean, on the coast of which were astonishing quantities of pearls of immense value. Flattered with this fallacious hope, Lane pursued his course in boats up the Morotock, and imagining he should be supplied with provision by the natives on each bank, neglected taking any, in consequence of which he was reduced to extreme f difficulties. After rowing four days against a strong current, he found the country wholly deserted and laid waste by the inhabitants; but, in hopes of better fortune, he pursued his course under the auspices of the guides furnished by the treacherous prince, until at length his crew had nothing to subsist on but the flesh of two large dogs; which wearied out his perseverance, and obliged him to return much chagrined to the island. The insidious Wingina pretended great sorrow for the captain's disappointment, and counterfeited so well, that Lane again received him into his friendship, and thereby furnished him with the opportunity of setting on foot fresh machinations. The Indian entered into private confederacies with the other Indian nations, and clandestinely prohibited his own subjects from supplying the English with provision, which, he knew would oblige them to divide into small parties in search of subsistence, when they might be attacked with safety. Happily the conspiracy was discovered, and the prince taken prisoner; but the issue must nevertheless have proved fatal to the colonists, as they were now involved in open war with the natives, had not Sir Francis Drake seasonably arrived on the coast with a fleet of ships under his command. He had had be endirected to afford the new colony all manner of assistance; which their situation might require, and to leave a ship and a sufficient number of seamen, to enable the adventurers to make fresh discoveries on the continent; but, finding them quite dispirited with losses, disappointments, and hardships, and to a man desirous of returning to their native country, he took the whole colony on board, and abandoned this settlement, which at first bore the most prosperous aspect.

Corporation town of Raleigh.

SIR Francis Drake had quitted the island of Roanoke but a few days, when a vessel loaded with arms, ammunition, provision, and every other necessary arrived there for the use of the colonists; but, not finding the least vestige of an European, it was concluded that all the adventurers had been massacred by the natives. Some days after this last ship had quitted the island, Sir Richard Grenville arrived there in person with three ships, and notwithstanding he could form no conjecture what became of the former colony, he ventured to leave fifteen men to plant a new settlement on the island, and supplied them with provision, and every necessary to support them comfortably for two years. Early in the year 1587, Raleigh equipped three more ships, on board which he put an hundred and fifty adventurers, besides mariners; incorporating them by the name of the borough of Raleigh, in Virginia. Captain White was made governor of the colony, and was assisted by twelve persons, who formed a council, in which was vested the legislative power, and whole direction of the settlement and proposed conquests and acquisitions. This little squadron, after escaping a variety of dangers and subduing considerable difficulties, arrived safe at the island of Roanoke, and governor White immediately debarked his people, in hopes of meeting with the small colony lately planted by Grenville; but not the least vestige remained, except the bones of one man, who, it was supposed, had been murdered, and perhaps devoured by the savage inhabitants. A house built by the first planters was found in tolerable order, which proved some inducement to winter on the island, contrary to Raleigh's instructions, which required them to advance northward to the bay of Cheeseapeak, and there fix the colony. They had been but a few days on the island, when Mr. Howe, a gentleman of the court of assistants, was attacked and barbarously murdered by the natives, as he happened to stroll about at a little distance from the fort which the new planters had erected.

A few days after, a party was sent under the command of captain Stafford to Croaton, accompanied with one of the Indians brought over to England in the first expedition. At first, the natives seemed determined to oppose the captain's debarkation; but the persuasions of their countryman, who had conceived the strongest friendship for the English, made them alter their resolution, lay down their arms, and enter into an alliance against the Indians of Scroton on the continent. Upon this occasion it was they were informed of the fate of the little colony left by Grenville. Seven were killed by the Indians of Scroton, who fell upon them by surprise, and set fire to their houses in the night; while the remaining eight escaped to the water-side, went over to a little island near cape Hatteras, and were never since heard of. In consequence of this intelligence, it was resolved to fall upon the Scrotons; upon which expedition the governor set out in person, attended by twenty-eight select soldiers, well armed. Being informed of the situation of the principal town, he attacked it in the night, broke in with the greatest impetuosity, and was astonished to find that he had killed and wounded several of his allies, the Croatons, who had taken possession of the place, when it was evacuated by the enemy, upon suspicion of an attack from the English settlement to revenge the death of Mr. Howe, and the ruin of Grenville's little colony.

It was now found expedient to detach Mr. White, the governor, to solicit supplies from England, the extension of the colony's connections rendering a greater force necessary; accordingly, he quitted Roanoke, but met with the utmost difficulty in executing his commission. Sir Walter Raleigh was either too much engaged in other projects to attend to the views of his infant colony, or his interest with the court and influence upon his friends was on the decline. Two years elapsed before a step was taken for the relief of the new corporation, by which the adventurers were reduced to the necessity of evacuating the island; burying their effects, and removing, for their greater security and convenience, to the island of Croaton. At length, a slender reinforcement was procured, with which governor White set sail for Roanoke; but, meeting with a storm, the fleet put back to England, and left the colonists to shift for themselves. The result was, that this promising settlement was entirely ruined; all the adventurers having perished either by famine, or the sword of the Indians: not an individual ever returning to England.

tion.

A. D. 1602.

FROM this time to the year 1602, all expeditions to America were neglected, and schemes on which the most sanguine expectations were founded, seemed to be wholly abandoned. The first revival of the enterprize was under the captains Gilbert and Gesnold, who set sail from Plymouth, in the month of March, with thirty-two mariners and other adventurers; arrived a arrived at that part of Virginia, now called New-England, in the forty-second degree of north latitude; sailed thence to the promontory, since distinguished by the name of Gilbert Point; and built a fort on a little uninhabited island, which they called Elizabeth, about four miles from the continent, in forty one degrees, north latitude. For some time, they corresponded in the most friendly manner with the inhabitants of the opposite coast, who came over to them in boats and canoes; but some little differences arising which threatened a war, the adventurers were discouraged from carrying their plan into execution, and returned to England with a cargo of sassafras, cedar, deer and beaver skins, with some other commodities of the country, which indemnified the charges of the expedition.

b THE year following, a scheme was set on foot by the reverend Mr. Hacluit, prebendary of the cathedral of Bristol, for sending a small fleet on the same voyage; but, lest the project might interfere with the patent granted to Raleigh, application was made to that gentleman for leave to trade and plant a colony within his jurisdiction, which was readily obtained. Mr. Hacluit offered to embark in person on the enterprize, and, by his credit, formed a little association to trade to Virginia, and plant a colony, if circumstances favoured the design; however, it was thought adviseable not to hazard a large capital at first, and only two small vessels were sent out under the command of captain Pringe, who made a successful voyage, but returned to England, without attempting to establish a settlement.

c Two years after a ship was equipped by two enterprising public-spirited noblemen, the lords Southampton and Arundel, to prosecute discoveries, the conduct of which was entrusted to captain Weymouth. This adventurer set sail in the month of March, and arrived the following Whitsunday at the mouth of Hudson's river, on the continent of North-America, to which, for this reason, he gave the name of Pentecost harbour. At first his voyage was successful, he traded with the natives for furs, and obtained a considerable cargo; but his men kidnapping some of the Indians, he was forced to quit the coast abruptly, to avoid the effects of their resentment, and take his departure for England.

Weymouth's expedition.

d NOTHING hitherto had been successfully attempted towards planting colonies on the continent of North America; yet, the voyages, made with so much profit to that coast, evinced all the mercantile part of the nation of the public utility of the measure. For a long time gold and silver were the only objects deemed of importance; but now it was perceived, that other commodities imported from America were equal in value to the precious metals; and, when manufactured at home, would not fail of causing a perpetual efflux of riches from the treasures of Peru and Mexico, as well as from every kingdom of Europe. A sense of this induced a body of gentlemen and merchants to solicit his majesty to grant them a patent for raising a joint stock, in order to plant colonies in Virginia, the grant made to Sir Walter Raleigh being void by his attainder. Accordingly a patent was issued on the tenth day of April, empowering Sir Thomas Yates, Sir George Summers, the above-mentioned reverend gentleman, and divers others, specified in the patent, to divide themselves into two companies, consisting of the adventurers of the city of London, who were desirous of settling between the thirty-fourth and forty-fourth degrees of north latitude; and the adventurers of Bristol, Plymouth, and Exeter, who solicited to settle on the Virginia coast, between the thirty-eighth and forty-fifth degrees of the same latitude. They were further enabled to establish settlements within any part of the above limits, but in such a manner, that the colonies of each company should be distant a hundred miles from those of the other; to enjoy all lands, ports, rivers, fishing, and other property and privilege, in the same manner granted to Raleigh's colony; to establish a council, composed of thirteen persons, in whom the government should reside, but limited by certain articles under the privy-seal; to dig mines within and beyond their respective limits to the westward, paying the crown a fifth of the gold, and a fifteenth of the copper ore, they should discover and work; to coin money, raise troops for their defence; and lastly, to seize upon all ships, vessels, and traders, who should encroach on the terms of their patent (C). In consequence, three vessels were immediately equipped, and put under the command of captain Newport. An hundred and ten adventurers, besides the seamen, embarked, and all manner of implements for building, agriculture, and defence, were shipped; but the orders for the government of the colony, and the names of the gentlemen, who were to compose the council, were sealed up, with directions not to be opened, until the whole were safely landed. On the twenty-ninth day of the month of April, the little squadron had the good fortune, after a very tedious voyage, to make the bay of Cheeseapeak, into which they were driven by a storm; the troops landed on cape Henry, in thirty-seven degrees, and soon came to action with the Indians, who lay for them in ambush; but dispersed themselves on the built.

THE first business of the new colony was to break open the seal of their instructions, upon which it appeared that the following gentlemen were appointed of the council; namely, Bartholomew Gesnold, Edward Wingfield, Christopher Newport, John Smith, John Ratcliff, John Martin, and George Kendall. Wingfield was elected president, and Mr. Smith intirely left out of the council by his colleagues, who appear to have been jealous of his superior talents, and the confidence reposed in his discretion and abilities by the managers in England; at least, this is the reason insinuated by Purchas, and it is rendered probable by the circumstance of his having been detained a prisoner, since the departure of the squadron b from the Downs, and afterwards vested with the chief administration, when the affairs of the colony fell into disorder. One of the council was immediately appointed to treat with the chiefs of different Indian tribes, with whom he entered into alliance, having obtained leave to plant a colony on a convenient spot, fifty miles from the entrance of the river Pow- hatan, by the English called James river. Here a slight fort, barricadoed with trunks of trees, and a number of little huts, were erected, to which they gave the name of James town. The situation was on the point of a peninsula, secured on each side by navigable rivers, and, in the rainy season, formed into a perfect island, which was deemed a sufficient defence against the natives; yet it soon appeared that stronger fortifications were required, as all the friendly professions of the Indians were designed only to cover their trea- c chery. In the night, their canoes surrounded the peninsula, but, finding the English on their guard, they retreated without making any attempt; and, by this shew of hostility, put the colonists on their guard. Accordingly the plan of the fort was amended and enlarged, and, by the fifteenth of June, it was finished of a triangular form, with three bastions, each mounted with five pieces of artillery. After sowing corn, and providing the colony with every necessary, captain Newport returned with the fleet to England, leaving an hundred and four effective men in James-Town, who soon felt all the inconveniencies of wanting vessels, and were reduced to live chiefly upon the fruits and roots of the country. Disease was the consequence; all were seized with fluxes and fevers, and many perished; among whom d was Gesnold, one of the council, and several other gentlemen of consideration. More were cut off by the natives, as they wandered about in the woods in search of subsistence, and the poor remains of the colony were closely besieged in the fort. This wretched situation forced them to have recourse to captain Smith, whose abilities only promised any prospect of deliverance from their present misery. He took upon him the administration, was unfortunately taken prisoner by the Indians in the first skirmish, and doomed as a sacrifice to their vengeance, when his life was providentially saved by the interposition of a lady, daughter to one of the Indian chiefs. Soon after she obtained his liberty by the strongest intercession to her father, and continued to give the captain minute information of all the machinations and stratagems of her countrymen against the English; by which means he e was enabled to defeat their designs, and gain many signal advantages, insomuch that he sustained the colony from sinking, until the arrival of captain Newport with supplies from England. Now again the colony rose to a flourishing pitch, but was scarce arrived at the summit of prosperity, when misconduct and discord again plunged them in the deepest adversity. A war broke out with the Indians, which reduced the adventurers to such difficulties, that they were frequently on the point of abandoning the settlement. Many were the vicissitudes of fortune in the course of a few years; James-town was destroyed by fire, and again rebuilt by captain Smith; the Indians had been repeatedly defeated by this gentleman, but they were not subdued; and supplies were frequently sent from England, but they were embezzled by the villany of the agents, or destroyed by the machinations of the Indians; who, upon this occasion, seemed to have a great advantage over the Euro- f peans in subtilty, address, and unanimity. Some blamed the company at home, others the managers abroad, for the miscarriage of the undertaking; at last, the company obtained a new patent, empowering them to appoint a governor with more ample authority than was allowed by the former grant, and prevailed on the lord Delaware to accept of the government of the new colony, who appointed Sir Thomas Yates, Sir George Summers, and captain Newport his deputies, to take into their hands the administration until his arrival. With these forces, the three deputy-governors set sail for James-Town, in the year 1609, and were unfortunately shipwrecked on the islands of Bermudas, from which accident they have since been called the Summer Islands. The whole fleet consisted of nine ships, eight of which got safe to Virginia, with a reinforcement of near five hundred men; a force g that might have retrieved the affairs of the colony, had not discord blighted the most promising hopes. Faction became so violent, that every measure of defence and safety was forgot;

a forgot; sickness and famine prevailed, which, together with the sword, reduced the whole number to about fourscore men able to carry arms.

In this wretched situation was the colony on the arrival of the deputy-governors, who had been cast away on the Bermudas, where they made shift to build two vessels out of the wreck and timber found on the islands. The state of anarchy and confusion, in which they found the plantation, left them little hopes of establishing order and restoring discipline; they therefore resolved to embark for England, and were actually sailing out of the bay, when they were met by the lord Delaware, their governor, who obliged them all to return to James-Town, severely reprimanding them for their idleness, dissoluteness, discord, and want of resolution and public spirit. He recommended a change of manners, and alteration of behaviour, to prevent the necessity of exerting the power with which he was vested, and drawing the sword of justice to correct and punish the vices of those, whom he had much rather protect with the last drop of his blood. To encourage them, he said he had brought such abundance of provision, as could not but be sufficient for their ample maintenance, if they were not wanting to themselves in cultivating the earth, and providing for their future subsistence. Then he proceeded to appoint a council, composed of Sir Thomas Yates, his lieutenant-general; Sir George Summers, his admiral; the hon. George Percy, one of his captains; Sir Ferdinando Weinman, his master of the ordnance; and Christopher Newport, his vice-admiral: to all of whom he administered oaths of obedience and allegiance to the government. Such was the vigour and activity of his lordship's administration, that he soon restored the affairs of the colony; and, by a few well-timed acts of resolution, made himself feared by the neighbouring Indians, and respected by his own people. He dispatched his lieutenant, Sir Thomas Yates, to England, to lay before the company an account of the state of the colony, and returned part of the fleet freighted with cedar, plank walnut, and iron ore; commodities which were not thought equal to the expences of the undertaking. However, they were kept in good humour by Sir Thomas's report, that if persons skilful in extracting pitch and tar, and cultivating hemp, flax, and silk, were sent over, they might easily supply Great Britain with abundance of the most valuable articles of commerce. He affirmed the soil was exceeding fruitful, and produced the greatest plenty of grass, corn, fruits, and roots; that European cattle multiplied exceedingly, and that the abundance of fish, poultry and venison, with which the inland and coasts abounded, must always preserve the colony in the utmost plenty, as soon as they were properly supplied with the materials of hunting, fishing, and husbandry. Instead of being a charge to the company, he asserted the plantation would soon yield returns, far beyond their most sanguine expectations. Flattered with this prospect, they resolved to proceed with alacrity in improving the Virginian settlement, and they were confirmed, in these sentiments by lord Delaware, who returned this year to England for the recovery of his health, which had sustained a violent shock from the change of climate, and the diligence and activity which he exerted in promoting the interest of his constituents. His lordship acquainted the company that he had no intention to desert their service, but to recover his health, in order to promote their affairs with redoubled diligence. In his absence he appointed the honourable captain Percy his deputy, a person in whose abilities and integrity they might place the utmost confidence. Three additional forts were erected for the further security of the colony; several fields were cultivated, and afforded a prospect of a plentiful harvest; most of the Indian tribes respected the English, and captain Argol established an advantageous traffic with several of the principal and leading personages in the country.

A. D. 1610.

So favourable a report, founded upon undoubted authority, inspired the new company with high expectations; they resolved now not to suffer an ill-timed penury to obstruct the execution of so plausible a project, and accordingly dispatched captain Dale with three ships, and supplies of provisions, live cattle, arms, ammunition, and all the requisite implements of industry. In the month of August, Sir Thomas Yates arrived with six ships in Virginia, taking upon him the administration of affairs, in quality of deputy to lord Delaware. Immediately he entered upon the vigorous execution of his duty; planted and fortified Henrico county to the westward of the settlement; drew lines and secured them with palisadoes to prevent the irruptions of the Indians, who seized every opportunity of carrying off the English cattle. What contributed greatly to forward the affairs of the colony was the marriage of captain Relf with the princess Pacabunca, daughter to the great chief Powhatoc, who could never before this event be brought into a cordial amity with the English; but softened by the kind treatment which his daughter met with at James-Town, he, at last, entered into a sincere alliance with the colony. The influence of this prince extended beyond his own dominions; other nations were induced to follow his example, and, for some time, a very profitable trade was driven with the Indians, and discoveries were made far beyond the limits of the charter. The tobacco plant was now cultivated with success, and the profits, arising from this commodity, soon afforded the happiest presages of the flourishing state of the settlement. In the year 1618, his lordship embarked a second time to resume the government, carrying with him a reinforcement of two hundred men, and supplies for the colony; but he unfortunately breathed his last in the passage, together with forty of his attendants. At this time, the administration was in the hands of Mr. Argol, who was indefatigable in making discoveries on the coast of New England, Nova Scotia, and Acadia; from whence he had driven some parties of French who had attempted to make settlements; claiming all this coast, as the right of the crown of England, and part of the country called by the general name of Virginia. It being represented that Mr. Argol bent his whole application to the discovery of new countries, without making the proper advantage of those already in possession, he was recalled, leaving the government in the hands of Mr. Powel, until the arrival of Sir George Yardly, lately knighted by king James, and appointed his successor in the government by the company. To this gentleman was owing the cultivation of tobacco, and the new modelling of the government, which he was desirous should resemble the British constitution composed of two houses of parliament, and a sovereign. The number of the council was increased, intending this body should represent the house of lords; while the house of commons was composed of burgesses, assembled from every plantation and settlement in the country. The first session of this assembly was in 1620, at James-Town; both sate in the same house, but they soon after separated, and composed two different departments with distinct privileges.

THIS was the origin of our first settlement on the continent of North America, from which numberless other branches shot forth along the coast; which, in a short time, raised the British colonies to a powerful empire. The success of James-Town plantation animated divers other adventurers to similar enterprizes. Some, from religious motives, desired a retreat, where they might freely exercise the dictates of conscience; others were impelled by avarice or ambition to the most daring attempts; many were driven by necessity to try their fortune; and thus, from different causes, and with different intentions, multitudes transported themselves annually to the continent of America, where they formed a balance to the Spanish power on the opposite side. We shall now enter upon the history and description of the several provinces subject to the crown of Great Britain, from the gulph of Florida, stretching along the coast quite to the fiftieth degree of north latitude; and that the account of the establishment of the plantations may agree as nearly as possible with chronological order, we shall begin with Newfoundland, the most northern colony, and proceed southward to Georgia, the latest English settlement on this coast; though contrary to the geographical disposition observed when we described the Spanish and Portuguese conquests and dominions. This, although an island, we shall venture to begin with, on account of its contiguity to the continent, and importance to the British colonies and marine, because of the cod-fishery on its coasts, and the opportunity it affords of carrying on to advantage that valuable branch of commerce.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

Account of the discovery of Newfoundland and the establishment of a colony on the island.

THIS island, discovered by Sebastian Cabot, in the year 1497, is of a triangular form, about three hundred leagues in circuit, divided by a narrow channel from Nova Scotia to the South, and Canada to the North, and situated between forty-six and fifty-one degrees of North latitude. The French pretend a prior discovery, alledging that the fishermen of Biscay frequented the banks of Newfoundland before the voyages of Columbus; but, this assertion being confirmed by no kind of authentic proof or testimony, they rest their claim to the country on a later discovery, made by Verazzan, a Florentine adventurer, in the service of Francis I. Admitting, however, the truth of this ideal adventure, it conveys no right to the French nation, as Cabot confessedly touched upon that coast several years before, and took formal possession of this island, and Norembegua, from whence he carried off three of the natives. But not to insist upon pretensions, now justly precluded by repeated subsequent treaties, we shall proceed to relate the first voyages made by the English to Newfoundland, either for the purposes of commerce, or with intention to settle a colony on the island.

In the reign of Henry VIII. Mr. Elliot and Mr. Thorn, two enterprising adventurers, traded thither with leave from the crown, and to such advantage, that Mr. Hare, a gentleman of eminence in the mercantile way, proposed the scheme of making a settlement, and persuaded several of his friends to assist him in the execution. The expedition was extremely unfortunate; the adventurers were reduced to such wretchedness, thro' famine, that they are reported to have devoured each other, and to feed upon putrid human carcases. For some years all thoughts of prosecuting the discovery were relinquished by the English, by which means, the French and Portuguese contrived to gain a footing on the island, a island, and to carry on a profitable trade in fish and furs. In 1579, Mr. Cotton, a merchant of Southampton, employed captain Whitburn, in a ship of three hundred tons to fish for cods on the great bank, but the excess of cold obliged him to put into Trinity harbour, where he employed himself so diligently, that, with fish and other commodities, he cleared the expences of the voyage. The same officer was again employed by Mr. Crook, a merchant of Southampton, to repeat the voyage; and, during his residence in Newfoundland, Sir Humphrey Gilbert arrived, with a small squadron of two ships and a pinnace, with a commission from queen Elizabeth to take possession of the island for the crown. In the year 1585, a voyage was made to Newfoundland by Sir Bernard Drake, another Devonshire knight, who seized upon several Portuguese vessels, laden with fish, oil, and furs.

b THE war with Spain now gave interruption to trade and navigation. The spirit of discovery, and an active commerce, were rising fast; but the dread of the Spanish Armada for a time checked the ardor of the British nation; and, for the space of fourteen years, we meet with no account of any other voyage to this island. Mr. Guy, a merchant of Bristol, was the first, who again revived the spirit of conquest and trade, by several sensible treatises, which he wrote upon the subject of colonization and commerce. Animated by the exhortations, and convinced by the arguments of this gentleman, Sir Laurence Tanfield, lord chief baron, Sir John Doddridge, king's sergeant, and Sir Francis Bacon, then solicitor-general, afterwards high-chancellor, and lord Verulam; with several other persons of distinction, applied to the king for a grant of all that part of the island, contained between the capes Bonavista and St. Mary's, which they readily obtained, with all the privileges required. They sent a colony thither, under the direction of Mr. Guy; who landing his men at Conception Bay, immediately raised huts, and established an intercourse with the natives, whose esteem he engaged by the most courteous and humane behaviour. After residing for two years on the island, with little advantage, he returned to England; leaving some of his people to lay the first foundation of a colony. The fishing, however, was the great object of the English. With this view, captain Whitburn and others made several voyages, that gentleman carrying with him, in 1614, a commission from the admiralty to impanel juries, and make enquiry upon oath of divers abuses and disorders committed amongst the fishermen on the coast. Hence it appears, that the trade was confined to the English, for the admiralty would hardly take upon themselves the cognizance of crimes and abuses committed by the subjects of another prince. Empowered by this commission, the captain held a court of admiralty immediately on his arrival, and received the complaints of an hundred and seventy masters of English vessels, of injuries committed in trade and navigation; from which circumstance we may sufficiently collect the flourishing state of the English cod-fishery, even at this early period.

A. D. 1616.

NEXT year, doctor Vaughan purchased a grant from the patentees of part of the country included in their patent; settled a little colony at Cambriol, in the southermost part of the island, now called Little Britain; appointed Whitburn governor; but made no great progress in extending colonies, and clearing plantations. About the same time, Sir George Vaughan, a Roman catholic, petitioned the king for a grant of that part of island lying between the bay of Bulls to the eastward, and Cape St. Mary to the southward, in order that he might enjoy that freedom of conscience in this retreat, which was denied him in his own country; a request made at the same time by the Puritans, who were removing in crowds to New England. James granted the petition; but how this was managed so as to avoid invading the property of the company, is what we cannot pretend to determine. Before his departure from England, Sir George sent captain Edward Wynne, with a small colony, to Newfoundland, to prepare every thing necessary for his reception; and, in the mean time, employed his whole fortune and interest in securing the success of his enterprize.

f Wynne bore the commission of governor, he seated himself at Ferry Land, built the largest house ever yet seen on the island, erected granaries and storehouses, and accommodated his people in the best manner possible; while he likewise endeavoured to establish an intercourse and trade with the natives. The following year he was reinforced with a number of men, and supplied with stores and implements by captain Powel; and soon after the colony was in so flourishing a condition, that he writes to his superior Sir George Calvert, in the following terms: "We have wheat, barley, oats, and beans, eared and codded; and though the late sowing of them, in May or the beginning of June, might occasion the contrary, yet they ripen so fast, that we have all the appearance of an approaching plentiful harvest." In the same strain he speaks of his garden, which flourished with all kinds of culinary vegetables. Captain Powel confirms this account by a similar letter, in which he acquaints Sir George of the excellency of the soil and pasture, the commodiousness of the governor's house, the quantity of pasture and arable ground, cleared since their arrival, and the numerous herds of cattle, which they had already reared and collected. A salt work was erected by Mr. Wynne, and brought to great perfection by Mr. Kickson, and so so delighted was the proprietor, now created lord Baltimore, with the flourishing state of the colony, that he removed thither with his family, built a fine house and strong fort at Ferryland, and resided many years on the island.

MEAN time the plantations in Newfoundland received a considerable accession from Ireland, a colony being sent from that kingdom by the lord Faulkland, at that time lord-lieutenant; but there they sustained more than an equivalent loss by the departure of lord Baltimore, who returned to England, to obtain a grant on the continent of that country, since called Maryland. Still, however, he retained the property of Avaton, and governed the little colony at Ferryland by his deputies. In the year 1654, Sir David Kirk obtained a kind of grant from the parliament of certain lands in Newfoundland, and immediately repaired thither in hopes of patching up his broken fortune. He treated with lord Baltimore for the purchase of his lands, but could never prevail on this family to dispose of their property. Whether it was before or after his arrival on the island, that he obtained lands in Canada, on the banks of the river St. Laurence, we cannot presume to ascertain; but that he did possess lands in that country is probable, as the English nation has founded its claim to the province upon the grant made to Sir David. In the space of a few years, settlements were made in fifteen different parts of the island, the chief of which were St. John's-Town, Ferryland, and Kittavitty, the whole amounting to about three hundred families, notwithstanding the molestation given by the French, who settled a colony at Placentia, and once bid extremely fair for the whole possession of the fisheries. Now the English are sole masters of the whole island, though both French and Spaniards have long claimed the privilege of fishing upon the banks; a claim, the justice of which it belongs to political writers to discuss. It is beyond dispute, that the French were once possessed of the south and south-west parts of the island; but as these possessions were conquered in open war, and confirmed to the possessors by treaty, all pretensions founded upon such a right must be absurd and ridiculous.

As to the historical events of the island, since the above colonies were planted, they are of too trivial a nature to deserve place in our general labours. From the time the French established themselves at Placentia, constant bickerings happened between them and the English; and, after the revolution, the latter made a formal attack on the principal settlement of the enemy. The English commodore with three ships of war fell upon Placentia, and was repulsed. Some years after the French retaliated; entered the Bay of Bulls, attacked and destroyed an English frigate, commanded by captain Cleasby, who made a glorious defence; and demolished all the settlements except those at St. John's, Bonavista, and Carbonier harbour. Next year, a squadron under admiral Nevil, with a body of fifteen hundred land forces, commanded by Sir John Gibson, was sent to revenge and recover the late losses; but the ignorance of the one of these officers, and the cowardice of the other, rendered the expedition fruitless. Nevil, with a superior force, declined engaging Ponti, the French admiral. He pretended to have lost time in a fog, and returned to England, without either recovering any of the settlements that were seized, or securing those which remained. At last, the peace of Ryswyck interposed for the safety of the Newfoundland colonies; nevertheless, king William judged it necessary to send a squadron thither, under the command of captain, afterwards admiral, Sir John Norris, to restore all things to order, and oblige the French to observe their stipulations, and for the better encouragement of this beneficial trade, an act passed in parliament, "That no alien, or " stranger whatsoever, not residing within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or " town of Berwick upon Tweed, use any sort of trade or fishing whatsoever in Newfoundland, " or any of the adjacent islands." This excluded the French from Cape Breton and the other smaller islands, until queen Anne was persuaded by the new ministry to surrender them at the treaty of Utrecht. We omit the siege of St. John's, and other hostile transactions previous to this treaty, because none of them proved decisive. What the fate of Newfoundland and Cape Breton, as well as of the gulph of St. Lawrence, may now be, since the late mutual conquests of France and England in that part of the world, time only can determine. Certain we are, that no terms of pacification, which will relinquish the advantages of the fisheries, or leave room for farther altercation, will be agreeable to the British nation, whatever equivalent the enemy may propose.

Description of the country.

HAVING finished this succinct historical detail, we proceed to describe the situation, climate, produce, inhabitants, and government of Newfoundland. The whole coast of this island is furnished with a variety of fine bays and harbours, of which the principal are Bonavista, Trinity, Conception, Torbay, Capelin, St. John's Harbour, the bay of Bulls, Fresh water Bay, and some others. The heads of these bays approach so near each other, that they form a very easy communication between the different parts of the country, and would prove the greatest convenience to trade, were the island capable of internal commerce. Trinity Bay, large enough to contain any number of shipping, is one of the most beautiful and a and secure harbours in North America; but we do not find that our fleets have yet thought it safe to winter there.

WITH respect to the climate of Newfoundland, it is intensely hot in summer, and insupportably cold in winter, from the very nature of the situation and a variety of natural causes. For four or five months in the winter, the ground is covered with snow frozen as hard as chrystal; and so rigorous are the seasons, that the English, upon their first visiting the country, were driven to the woods for the more convenience of firing.

NOTWITHSTANDING the flattering accounts sent over by governor Wynne and others, of the excellency of the soil and climate of this island, it is certain the inhabitants would be in the utmost distress for bread, and half the necessaries of subsistence, but for the exports b thither from England. Except fish, venison, and wild fowl, every thing else is procured from the mother-country, or the continent of America. The island is full of mountains and impenetrable forests; the meadows produce nothing besides a kind of moss instead of grass: and the soil is a barren mixture of stones, sand, and gravel. Yet M. Deboet, a writer of credit, and many of the first planters, declare Newfoundland to be a kind of paradise, with a view possibly of enhancing the value of a country sufficiently important, upon other accounts, without these advantages. Every species of timber grows here in the utmost perfection, and the firs are as fit for masts as those of Norway. Deer, hares, foxes, squirrels, bears, beavers, wolves, otters, and other quadrupeds, are found here in the greatest abundance for subsistence, pleasure, or traffic. The sea is plentifully stocked with different kinds of delicious fish, besides cod, the staple commodity of the country. Fowl for food c and game is equally abundant, and proves the greatest convenience to the planters, as well as the mariners and fishermen; but these particulars alone would scarce merit regard, or answer the purposes of adventurers, though they are subservient to their convenience. The cod is the magnet which attracts, and constitutes one of the most beneficial articles of the British commerce; yet hath it been shamefully neglected, and the fairest opportunity given the French not only of pursuing the fishery to advantage, but of establishing themselves on the island, whence they were driven not without expence, hazard, and difficulty. We need not expatiate upon this subject, so generally understood at a period when the late successes of our enemies in that quarter, have at length awaked us to a sense of the importance of d the island of Newfoundland to the trade and navigation of the mother-country, and when party-zeal too magnifies the loss, in order to promote the purposes of self-interest, prejudice, and faction (D).

WE shall close this account of the island with a short description of the natives, who have had a much more intimate intercourse with the French inhabitants of Canada than with the English; a proof of the superior policy of the former. All agree that the Indians of Newfoundland are a gentle, mild, tractable people, easily gained by civility and good usage. They paint their bodies, but are sometimes covered with skins and furs, especially round the waist, as if they entertained some notion of natural decency. Their stature is small, but muscular and robust, their chests full, and their faces broad to a degree of deformity. e No inhabitant of this island is ever found with a beard, which is generally ascribed to a prevailing custom among the natives to pluck out the roots the moment a hair begins to appear; an operation in which they are very dexterous. A custom nearly similar was observed among the natives of New England, where the meaner were distinguished from their superiors by letting a small beard grow upon the point of the chin. Pilfering, cunning, duplicity, are the characteristics of these islanders; but they are never ashamed of detection, nor provoked to resent the necessity of restitution. They are reported to be more rational in their religious opinions than the Indians on the continent; to have carried some arts, particularly the potter's, to great perfection; and to distinguish the seeds of genius capable of great improvement by due cultivation. This is all we chuse to advance upon f a subject where scarce two writers perfectly agree, as if their intention was only to confound and mislead the reader.

NOVA SCOTIA, or NEW SCOTLAND.

PROCEEDING to the southward, the next British province we meet with is Nova Scotia, so called by Sir William Alexander, secretary to king James I. and to this day distinguished by the name of Acadia by the French nation. This country, extending from the gulph of St. Lawrence to the river St. Croix, on the frontier of New Hampshire, the English have always claimed as a part of Norumbegua, or Virginia, while the French found g pretensions to it on the discovery of the Florentine pilot Verazzon, and the repeated attempts to establish themselves in the province. We have already observed, that the right ^a derived from discovery or pre-occupancy is in itself ridiculous, after it has been once annihilated by subsequent conquests and treaties; we shall, therefore, wave a dispute now entirely silenced by the late reduction of Canada and all the French settlements on that side the river Mississipi; and endeavour to engage the reader's attention to particulars better ascertained, and more essential at a juncture when we may reasonably expect the whole territory in dispute, and much more that has been since conquered, shall henceforwards remain the property of Great Britain. New Scotland, in which we comprehend Acadia, is bounded by the ocean to the east; by the same Atlantic Ocean and the bay of Fundy to the south; by the river St. Lawrence on the north-east and north-west; and by part of Canada and New England on the west and south-west. The coast stretches from the forty-third to the ^b fifty-first degree of north latitude, including a space of between five and six hundred miles, mostly desert, uninhabited, and incapable of cultivation.

We have already touched upon the expeditions of governor Argol against the French who were settled in this country, because he regarded all Nova Scotia as an appendage of Virginia, and part of the discovery of Sebastian Cabot. In the year 1618, when he was governor of the colony at James-town in Virginia, he made a kind of cruising voyage as far as Cape Cod, where he received advice from the Indians, that some white people had made settlements to the northward at St. Croix. This intelligence whetted his curiosity, and determined him to proceed to the place specified, where he found a little colony of Frenchmen, a small fort, and a ship riding at anchor close to the settlement. He began with attacking the ship with so much vigour, that she soon struck; and then debarking his men, ^c advanced against the fort, and summoned the garrison. The enemy desired time to weigh the proposal, and in the mean time seized the opportunity of evacuating the fort, and retiring with their most valuable effects to the adjacent woods; whence they returned next day, submitted at discretion to the English governor, and cancelled the patents granted by the French king for their settlement. Those of the prisoners who were disposed to return to Europe, were provided with vessels; the rest were transported to Virginia, where they became useful subjects to his Britannic majesty. Here the governor had intimation given him of another French settlement at Port Royale, standing on a bay towards the south-west coast of the territory, distinguished by the particular name of Acadia. The reduction of ^d this place was attended with as little difficulty as the former enterprize; the French submitted on his first appearance, and were transported to Canada, where they probably began to found colonies, though some writers imagine this was the origin of the formidable power of France in that province. In 1622, Sir William Alexander, at the instigation of Sir Ferdinando Gorges, obtained a patent to plant colonies in this country; and accordingly sent a ship full of passengers to settle in Nova Scotia. The ship being late in her voyage, wintered in Newfoundland, an island now extremely well known, and next spring set sail, and made the promontory at the north space of Cape Breton island. These adventurers coasted along Acadia, entered several fine bays and creeks, wrote home the most picturesque and flattering descriptions of the beauty and fertility of the country, and by every ^e art in their power endeavoured to engage others to share in their fortune. They settled in Nova Scotia, but were dispossessed in consequence of a treaty between the first Charles, of unfortunate memory, and the French king, on the family-alliance between these princes.

From the patent of Charles I. to Sir David Kirk it is plain, that not only this country, but the whole territory of Canada, was regarded as the property of the crown of England; for the king bestowed on that gentleman, as proprietor and governor, all the lands to the north of the river; the south side being given to Sir William Alexander. Thus it appears, that the king then pretended a right, which he conveyed to the two above gentlemen, and then relinquished it entirely to France by a treaty in 1632; bestowing, as his own, a ^f right which had already been vested in the British adventurers, who had been at all the labour and expence of planting colonies and cultivating the country. At the close of the civil war, Cromwel took upon himself the cognizance of this affair, and determined to redress the injury done to the English adventurers. Major Sedgwick was sent to retake Canada; but the French pretended they had purchased the English right at the price of five thousand pounds; a price which most certainly was never paid, admitting there was an agreement to this purpose. The colonel executed his commission, reduced the whole country, and obliged the French to submit at discretion; accordingly, it was confirmed to England by the treaty which took place the year following. The purchase of Canada was supposed to be made by M. Claude de la Tour D'Aunay, whose son and heir, M. St. Estierac, ^g now came to the court of London to solicit his right. He made out his claim, and had the property surrendered to him, which he soon conveyed by sale to Sir Thomas Temple, an Englishman; who kept possession till the year 1662, when it was delivered by Charles II. to the a the French king, an equivalent of one thousand pounds being made, or rather promised, to Sir Thomas. Such were the vicissitudes of Nova Scotia, confirmed to the French by the treaty of Breda, who now appointed M. Marival governor, and built a fort at Port Royale, upon a baion of salt-water, at the distance of nine miles from the bay of Fundy. It was confirmed to M. La Tour as his property, by the court of France, on his renouncing the Protestant religion. He built a fort at St. John's River, which being deemed an encroachment on the royal prerogative by M. Donneè, the French governor of Acadia, was reduced, and the wife and family of La Tour were cruelly butchered, during his absence in France. The vicissitudes of fortune brought this proprietary to poverty; he borrowed money of M. Betijbe, a rich merchant, and great trader to North America, assigning over b to him for his payment half his property in Nova Scotia; and thus the lordship again changed its master.

THE French became such troublesome neighbours to the English, after they had formed alliances with the natives, and instructed them in the art of war, that it was thought essentially necessary, for the safety of the English colonies, to check their progress, and redress a variety of insults and injuries sustained from the incursions of the natives. Accordingly, in the year 1690, an armament of seven hundred men and a considerable fleet was let on foot by the province of New England, and the command given to colonel Phipps; who arrived on the eleventh day of May before Port Royale, at that time a pitiful defenceless place, fortified only with single pallisadoes. Marival, the governor, finding himself so ill provided to resist a regular attack, capitulated, and was conveyed to Canada, while the French inhabitants took an oath of allegiance to the crown of Great Britain. The fruits, however, of this conquest were yielded up at the peace of Ryswick, and so was the fort of St. John, likewise reduced, upon this occasion, by the same armament. Major Church, at the head of a body of five hundred volunteers, visited several parts of this coast in the year 1704, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Port Royale; and about three years after, another expedition was undertaken by colonel March against the same place. This enterprize was supported by the ministry; and a man of war was ordered to attend the transports from New England, and facilitate, by every possible means, the operations of the land-forces: however, the design miscarried, and the blame was charged on d the sea-officers.

IN 1709, application was made to the court of Great Britain by colonel Nicolson and captain Vetch, for a proper force to reduce the French settlements in Canada; but this being an object too great for a ministry which began to fall into confusion and factions, leave only was granted to attempt the intire reduction of Nova Scotia. Orders were accordingly issued, to all the governors of the British settlements in America, to promote the enterprize with their utmost ability. Nicolson was appointed commander in chief, and the commission of adjutant-general was granted to Vetch. Four men of war and a bomb-ketch were ordered as convoy; and the armament, consisting of twenty-six sail, including transports, weighed from Boston in New England on the eighteenth of September; and, arriving in six days at Port Royale, landed the troops with little opposition, and soon obliged e the French governor Subercasse to capitulate. The terms granted were, That all the inhabitants within the Banlieu, or three miles of the fort, should be entitled to the privileges of British subjects, on their swearing allegiance to her majesty: That the garrison, consisting of two hundred and fifty-eight soldiers, should march out with the honours of war, six cannon, and two mortars: That they should be transported to Rochelle in Old France, at the expence of Great Britain: That such of the inhabitants as chose to retire to Canada, or France, should be sent thither in the most convenient manner; and that they should have all their effects preserved to them free from the pillage of the English soldiers. The name of Annapolis Royal was given to the new conquest, which was garrisoned with a body f of four hundred soldiers; such was the issue of an expedition that cost the American provinces about twenty-three thousand pounds, which was afterwards repaid by the government.

A. D. 1710.

THE reduction of this place was of very essential service to the American colonies, by forming a barrier to New England, and depriving the French of a situation which was a nest for their privateers, and might be called the Dunkirk of this part of the world; but it did not altogether answer expectation. The inhabitants without the Banlieu had been declared neutrals by the capitulation; notwithstanding which they continued hostilities, in conjunction with the Indians, and kept the garrison of Annapolis in perpetual alarm. Upon this, the English seized the French missionary and five of the principal inhabitants, g whom they detained as pledges of the actual performance of the treaty, and good behaviour of their countrymen; notwithstanding which a party of sixty men, from the garrison, sent up the river for timber to repair the fort, was surprized and cut off by the French and Indians.

By the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht, all the province of Nova Scotia, or L'Acadie, with all its ancient boundaries; also the city of Port Royale, now called Annapolis Royal, with all its dependencies in land, islands, and other particulars, together with the dominion, property, and possession of the said islands, lands, and other rights, by treaty or otherwise obtained, was ceded in perpetuity to the crown of Great Britain. To this was subjoined an exclusion of the subjects of France from fishing on the coast of Nova Scotia, or within thirty leagues, beginning from Cape Sable, and stretching along to the south-west; but the French, who knew that neither Newfoundland nor Nova Scotia were of any value but on account of the fisheries, and the security they afforded our colonies, retained the right of fishing on the coast of Cape Breton, and in the gulph and bay of St. Lawrence; a privilege of which they might easily have been divested at this juncture, had proper regard been paid by the administration to the interests of the colonies, of navigation, and of commerce. The cession of Nova Scotia, and the most solemn treaties, could not, however, restrain the French. They excited the Indians to repeated acts of hostility; and, in the year 1721, captain Blin, a trader of Nova Scotia, and Mr. Newton, collector of the province, were made prisoners by the Indians of Lasamaquady; but released, when reprisals were made by the governor of Annapolis, and twenty-two of the savages brought in prisoners to the fort. But though this spirited act procured the liberty of the English captives, it did not restrain the enemy within the limitations of the treaty of Utrecht. By means of the Indians, they insulted the British fishing-vessels on the Cape Sable coast, took some, and killed or captivated the crews; insomuch that governor Philips at Canso was reduced to the necessity of equipping two armed sloops, attacking the Indians, and forcing them, by the rigors of war, to pay a more religious regard to treaties. Soon after they nevertheless resumed their hostilities, killed captain Watkins, two other European men, and a woman and child, in Durell's island, and even ventured to attack Annapolis, but were repulsed. From this time to the year 1744, mutual injuries were daily committed, while Nova Scotia was equally neglected by the British government and American colonies. At the beginning of the last war with France, the fort was in the most wretched condition; the garrison not exceeding eighty effective men, and the fortifications being in so deplorable a state, that the cattle crossed the ditch, and mounted the ramparts at pleasure. Every other settlement within the English jurisdiction was in a similar situation; and the French at Louisbourg having earlier intelligence of the declaration of war than the English, took the opportunity of seizing Canso, making the garrison, which consisted of four incomplete companies, prisoners, taking a man of war tender, and then destroying the little settlement. Privateers annoyed St. Peter's and the small settlements in Newfoundland, and even threatened Placentia itself, though defended by a fort and garrison. In the month of June one Luttre, a French missionary, made an attempt on Annapolis, at the head of three hundred Cape Sable and St. John's Indians, destroyed some houses and cattle, killed two men, summoned the garrison to surrender, and, on their refusal, denounced vengeance as soon as a party of French arrived from Louisbourg. However, the arrival of a privateer from Boston with a company of militia to the assistance of the garrison, obliged Luttre to decamp without waiting to be reinforced by his countrymen; which did not so intirely remove the fears of the inhabitants of Annapolis, but that they sent their families and most valuable effects to Boston.

LUTTRE had not long relinquished the enterprize, when Du Vivier joined him with sixty regular forces and seven hundred militia and Indians trained to arms, both encamping at Minas, from whence they sent divers messages to the officers of the garrison of Annapolis, endeavouring to intimidate them with boastings of the large armament which he daily expected from Louisbourg, and persuading them to embrace the present favourable moment of obtaining moderate conditions. The garrison, suspecting the truth of his allegations, replied, it would be soon enough to demand terms when the expected armament was actually arrived; at which Du Vivier was so much chagrined, that he broke up his camp, retired first to Bay Vert, then to Canada, and from thence to Old France, where he was censured for precipitately alarming the English colonies by his sham-hostilities, before the French colonies were in a situation to support the consequences of a war; and likewise for his not marching immediately after the reduction of Canso to Annapolis, when that place must inevitably have fallen for want of a sufficient garrison.

MEAN time the government of Massachusetts Bay declared war upon the Indians of Cape Sable and St. John's for persisting in hostilities against the subjects of Great Britain, and joining the French in the late attempt on Annapolis, forbidding all the nations of allied Indians to hold any communication or intercourse with them, and ordering præmiums for scalps; a cruel policy, that only can be justified by the necessity of retaliation: but these orders were ill obeyed, the French having artfully drawn many of the Indians from their allegiance to Great Britain, which obliged the government to extend the præmium. Yet could

- a could not all these precautions prevent M. Marin, a subaltern officer in Canada, from assembling above a thousand Indian rangers and other troops, with whom he laid siege to Annapolis; but with the same fortune as the last attempt, he being called away to the relief of Louisbourg, at that time besieged by the British army and fleet. Next year the enterprize was resumed by M. de Ramsay, who had collected an army of sixteen hundred men, composed of regular forces, Canadian militia, and Coueurs des Bois, with which body he marched to Minas, expecting to be soon joined by the duke D'Anville from France; but, disappointed in this expectation, he was constrained, by the severity of the approaching winter, to return to Canada, and relinquish the enterprize. Just after his departure, the French succours arrived in Chebueto, and D'Anville detached couriers to recal Ramsay;
- b but he had disbanded most of his forces, and could bring back no more than four hundred regulars and militia, with which, and the French armament, he resumed his designs, and laid siege to Annapolis. However, there being two English men of war in the basin of the town, and the French fleet returning home before the dangerous season came on, he was again forced to undergo the mortification of abandoning a second time an enterprize on which he had fixed his heart, resolving, however, to quarter at Minas and Chiconiëto during the winter, and join the fleet and land-forces which were expected to reduce Annapolis. This design furnished Mr. Masurani, who commanded as governor in Annapolis, with an opportunity of countermining the enemy. He reasonably imagined that a reinforcement of a thousand men from New England, in conjunction with the three companies of volunteers arrived from Boston in the autumn preceding, would be able to dislodge the French quartered at Minas, keep the Indians in their allegiance, and consume the magazines they had formed, so as to render any future attempts impracticable. This scheme he proposed to the government of Massachusetts, and accordingly five hundred men were immediately voted for the service by the assembly, to which body were added three hundred men from Rhode Island, and two hundred from New Hampshire. All entertained the greatest hopes of seeing our colonies secured against all future hostilities, and the French driven from that part of Nova Scotia; but the event disappointed expectation. The supply from Rhode Island was shipwrecked; that from New Hampshire put back on some frivolous pretence; and only the reinforcement from Boston arrived at the appointed rendezvous, after having sustained great hardships and considerable losses from the enemy, who attacked them in small parties on their march. The return of this party was still more unfortunate, most of the troops falling into the hands of the enemy, and several of the best officers being killed.

It would be unnecessary to recapitulate the infractions subsequent to the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, by which Nova Scotia was again confirmed to Great Britain, but with such indefinite limits, as left an opening for farther prevarication; these facts, which gave birth to the late war, are too recent, and too generally understood, to need any relation. We shall therefore proceed to the description of a country, which has occasioned the effusion of so much blood, and consumption of more treasure than all our dominions in North America are worth; were every thing to be estimated by real utility, and nothing due to the honour and security of the nation, and to her colonies. This province having been long the property of France, the bulk of the inhabitants are the descendants of Frenchmen, educated in the religion, political principles, and language of their ancestors. Since the treaty of Utrecht, they have sworn allegiance to Great Britain; but their partiality to their native country is very perceivable, whenever a rupture happens between the two crowns; an inconvenience, which can be remedied in none of our conquests so effectually any other way, as by making it their interest to continue the subjects of Great Britain, and by gradually changing their religion, language, and principles, by certain rewards and encouragements. After the peace of Utrecht, the crown reserved the power of bestowing the non-appropriated lands upon protestant subjects; but the governors Philips and Armstrong are accused of having assigned these lands indiscriminately, though the intention was to give extraordinary encouragement to those who embraced the established religion of the constitution; by which means, the French were left without any inducement to alter either their faith or language. The former of these gentlemen took upon him the government in 1717, and was empowered to form a council for the management of the civil affairs of the province. Accordingly, in the year 1720, a council was formed, consisting of twelve members, who, by the fifth instruction, were prohibited from being absent above a twelvemonth from the province, without leave from the governor, for more than two years, without the king's special permission, under the penalty of vacating their seats in the assembly.

With respect to the boundaries of Nova Scotia, it is plain from the rise of the late war, they were never clearly ascertained, nor is it now of consequence to draw the exact line between it and Canada, since both countries, it is more than probable, will ever remain the property of Great Britain. Hitherto, it continues undivided into lesser districts, which alone sufficiently indicates how poorly it is cultivated (D). Annapolis and Canso are the only towns that deserve to be mentioned. The former is the capital, but a very inconsiderable place; except for the excellency of the harbour, which is capable of containing a thousand vessels at anchor in the utmost security. Canso, situated on the eastern shore of Acadia, may, in time, become a place of importance, on account of the excellent fishery in its neighbourhood, especially as the French will now have no opportunity, as formerly, of disturbing the fisheries, and encroaching on the territories of this province; more particularly since the demolition of Louisbourg. The most valuable appendage of Nova Scotia is the Cape Sable coast, along which is one continued range of cod-fishing banks, and excellent harbours; though the impenetrable fogs, which, for one part of the year, obscure this country, render it of less utility to commerce and navigation. The communication which the bay and river of Chebueto have with all parts of the province, either by land carriage or navigable rivers, makes it probable that the seat of government may one day be translated thither from Annapolis, which is devoid of every convenience besides a harbour.

THE island of Sables, lately well known to the public, as having been demanded by M. Buffy for the convenience of the French nation for curing and drying fish, must be deemed within the jurisdiction of the province of Nova Scotia, as it lies the nearest to that coast, though at a considerable distance; which is also implied by the British exclusive line of fishery, stipulated at the treaty of Utrecht, which begins at this island. It can indeed prove of no other advantage to the British nation, than that of depriving our rivals in trade of a place so serviceable to their fisheries, which may justly be regarded as a very considerable negative advantage.

THE largest island in the gulph of St. Laurence is Cape Breton, memorable chiefly on account of the strong fortification of Louisbourg, demolished since the last reduction of that place, by order of the British government. This island lies from forty-five to forty-seven degrees of north latitude, and is, from the nature of its situation, of the utmost consequence to the British colonies and fisheries in North America. How it came to be restored to the French at the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, with the fortifications intire, is what we cannot pretend to determine; certain we are, that true politics will always dictate a

(D) Since the above was written, we learn on further enquiry, that the province of Nova Scotia is actually divided into twelve districts; each of which annually elects a deputy, who must be approved by the governor and council at Annapolis. This deputy is regarded as a kind of agent or solicitor for the district, who reports its situation from time to time to the government. They enjoy no legislative or executive capacity. It is affirmed, that French missionaries are not appointed by the bishop of Quebec, under his direction, but that they act as civil magistrates, and justices of the peace, in divers districts, as a reproach and scandal to the British government. However, appeals may be made to the governor and council at Annapolis. There is no agreement among geographers about the limits of Nova Scotia; even de Lisle, one of the most celebrated geographers in Europe, differs not only from others, but from himself, in this particular. In his map of Canada, published in 1703, L'Accadie comprehends the country of the Eschemins, or Ischemins, placed by the bulk of our map-makers on the west side of the bay of Fundy, and a part of the continent larger than the peninsula; whereas in M. de Lisle's general map of America, engraved in 1722, L'Accadie is confined within the peninsula, and bounded on the north-west by the country of the Gaspessons. Father Charlevoix makes it two hundred and fifty leagues in compass, and Mr. Bellin, engineer and hydrographer to the marine office, reckons it by French computation from Cape Canso on the east, to Cape Sable on the west, about eighty leagues. M. la Houton, another French writer of credit many years resident in the country, gives it a much larger extent than de Lisle's map of Canada, for he includes in it a great part of what that geographer gives to Canada and Gaspesia. According to him, it is three hundred leagues along the coast from Kennebeck, the frontier river of New England, to the isle Perce, towards the mouth of the river St. Laurence, including the bays of Fundy and Challeurs.

WRITERS differ no less about the quality than the extent of the country; some describing it as scarce fit for the residence of the most barbarous nations, while others extol its fertility. La Houton's account is, that Nova Scotia abounds with little rivers, the entrance of which affords anchorage for the largest vessels; that they abound in salmon; and that most of the gulphs and rivers, with which they communicate, produce great plenty of cod. He further observes, that almost every part of Acadia yields corn, fruit, pease, and other pulse; that the four seasons of the year are easily distinguished; that the winter is very severe for three months; that the country produces excellent timber for masts, and upon occasion for building any kind of shipping. The baron affirms, that Nova Scotia is admirable for hunting, and speaks of it in general as a fine country; the air pure and salubrious, the climate tolerably moderate, and the water light and pellucid. With this gentleman the intelligent Charlevoix agrees, alledging, it abounds with all the necessaries of life, and that the inhabitants may live very comfortably without much fatigue. Here is abundance of feathered game, such as partridges, ducks, teal, widgeon, and bustard; the latter flock in such crowds to the banks of the rivers and all the ponds in the month of April, that their eggs alone are sufficient to subsist the inhabitants for that season; and yet notwithstanding the extraordinary consumption of these eggs, it is not perceivable that the species is diminished. At the close of March, the fish begin to spawn, when they enter the rivers in such shoals as are incredible. Here also are multitudes of beavers, otters, and some other quadrupeds, chiefly valued for their furs; yet after all, the security which this province affords to the British fisheries and plantations, is its principal utility (1).

a proper regard to the establishment of the French in an island, which, in a manner, commands the fisheries in the bay of St. Laurence, and, by affording shelter for the fleets of France, can give great disturbance to our Newfoundland trade and navigation. We say nothing of St. John's island, which is not of consideration enough to merit notice in a general history.

N E W E N G L A N D.

WE have already, in the introductory discourse on the British settlements in North America, given a general view of the first establishment of the English in this country, and the grants made to Sir Walter Raleigh, the Plymouth and London companies, and to others; for at that time Virginia or Norembegua comprehended a vast tract of coast now divided into separate governments, and distinguished by particular names. According to captain Smith's map, which was approved by the government, New England originally extended from twenty miles beyond Hudson's river to the east, and northward to the river St. Croix, or perhaps to the gulph of St. Laurence; by which it included Nova Scotia, a grant to which effect had actually been made. When James II. bestowed the government on Sir Edmund Andrews, his commission expressed the limits of his authority; namely, over the late colonies of Massachusetts Bay, Plymouth, Connecticut, and Rhode-Island. These were called the limits of New England; but the same gentleman was also made governor of New York, and Sagadahoc; New Hampshire, and the province of Maine, being then of so little importance as to go as an appendage to Massachusetts Bay.

In New England, the summer season is warm, but of short duration. For the space of two months, the sky continues perfectly clear, which renders the country so healthy, that it is reported to agree better with British constitutions than any other of the American provinces. The winters are long and severe, the wind often boisterous, and the air extremely sharp, but not intolerable. Naturalists ascribe the early approach, the length, and the severity of the winter season, to the large fresh water lakes lying to the north west of New England, which, being constantly frozen over from the beginning of November for at least two thirds of the year, occasion those piercing winds that prove so fatal to mariners on this coast. Towards the sea, the land is generally low, and frequently marshy; but, as you approach the interior country, it rises into hills, and on the north-east becomes altogether rocky and mountainous. Round Massachusetts Bay, the soil is black, and rich as in any part of England; and the first planters found the grass above a yard high, but rank for want of mowing. The uplands are less fruitful, being for the most part a mixture of sand and gravel, inclining to clay; though even here there is a sufficient quantity of corn, and culinary vegetables, produced for the subsistence of the inhabitants.

Few countries are better watered with rivers and lakes than New England, though the latter are not so considerable as those to the west and northward. Seven of the rivers are navigable, all abound in fish, and many of them answer every purpose of commerce. Connecticut river, in particular, may be navigated a great way by the largest vessels. It rises in the northern frontier of the province, and runs directly south through the district of its own name, until it discharges itself between the towns of Saybrook and Line, after a course of two hundred miles. The other most considerable streams are the Thames, Piscataqua, Merimech, Saca, Kennebec, Patuxet, Cusco, and a few others; and to the convenience of so many fine rivers, may we ascribe the great number of large and populous towns in this province. Besides river fish, the coast abounds with cod; and formerly there was a whale-fishery between New England and New York, which is now entirely engrossed by the Newfoundlanders. The cod taken here are salted and exported, not only to the sugar colonies, but likewise to Europe, constituting a very considerable article in the trade of the province.

WE have already observed that the country is fruitful in all kinds of esculent plants, pulse, and corn; but Indian corn, or maize, which the natives call Weachin, is the most cultivated, and was alone known here on the first arrival of the Europeans. The following is the account of it communicated to the royal society by Mr. Winstrop, and judged worthy of being inserted in the Philosophical Transactions. "The ear is a span long, composed of eight or more rows of grain, according to the quality of the soil, and about thirty grains in each row; so that each ear at a medium produces about two hundred and forty grains, which is an astonishing increase. It is of various colours, red, white, yellow, black, green, &c. and the diversity frequently appears not only in the same field, but in the very same ear of corn; though white and yellow be the most common. Strong thick husks shield the tender ear from cold and storms; and in many of the provinces in North America, the stalk grows seven or eight feet high, and proportionably strong and thick. It is observable, that the maize dwindles the farther you advance to the northward, whence whence it appears that warm climates are more congenial to its nature; and indeed its luxuriance in the hottest climes on the coast of Africa sufficiently evince the Indian corn to be a native of the more southern latitudes. The stalk is jointed like a cane, is supplied with a juice as sweet as that of the sugar cane; but from the experiments that have been made, it appears to be incapable of being rendered useful. Every joint is marked with a long leaf or flag, and, at the top, shoots a branch of flowers, like rye blossoms. The usual time of sowing, or, as it is here called, of planting, is from the middle of April to the middle of May; but, in the northern countries, the corn is not put in the ground before June; yet the harvest is ripe in due season, owing to the extreme warmth of the summer months. This corn the Indians boil till it is tender, and eat with fish, fowl, or flesh, as bread. Sometimes they bruise it in mortars, and then boil it; but the most usual method is to dry the corn high, without burning, to sift and beat it in mortars into fine meal, which the Indians either eat dry, or mixed with water. The English bake it into bread in the same manner as flour; but the best food made from it is called Samfi, the corn being steeped in water for half an hour, beat in a mortar until it is thoroughly cleared of the husk, then sifted, boiled, and eaten with milk, or butter and sugar, like rice; which is not only an agreeable, but a wholesome strengthening diet." The English brew good strong beer from it, and their method of malting it green points out an experiment, which might possibly be improved to advantage by the masters of Great Britain. The saccharine rich juice of green corn appears to us capable of yielding a due fermentation, and sufficient body for beer, without the expensive process of malting.

No country in the world produces a greater abundance and variety of fowl than New England; as geese, ducks, turkeys, hens, partridges, widgeon, swans, herons, heath-cocks, pigeons, &c. Nor is the feathered kind in greater plenty than the quadrupeds more immediately necessary to human subsistence and convenience. All kinds of European cattle thrive here, and multiply exceedingly; the horses of the province are hardy, mettlesome and serviceable, but small. Here also are elks, deer, hares, rabbits, squirrels, beavers, otters, monkeys, racoons, fables, bears, wolves, foxes, ounces, and a variety of other tame and wild quadrupeds; some of which are imported into Great Britain, as foreign curiosities. But the most extraordinary of these animals is the Moose, which is thus described by Mr. Jesselyn, in his rarities of New England.—We describe the animal entirely upon the authority of this writer, who has obtained some reputation.—“The Moose is about twelve feet high, with four horns, and broad palms, some distant near twelve feet from the tip of one horn to the other. His body is about the size of a bull, his neck resembles a stag's; his tail is somewhat longer, and his flesh extremely grateful.” Our author describes the manner of hunting the Moose; but, as we believe this diversion is now pretty well over, we shall not extend an extract, which many writers may ascribe to credulity (F). The rattle-snake is another natural curiosity of this country, though not peculiar to New England. The account given of this venomous animal is, that nature has wisely provided it should give warning of its motions by a rattle of twenty loose hard cartilaginous rings in the tail, which shake and beat as it moves, without any voluntary exertion. Some, indeed, alledge it only makes a noise when the animal apprehends itself in danger, and calls out for assistance. In length, this snake is commonly about four or five feet, is less hazardous than other snakes, but seldom attacks any human creature without provocation; is provided like the viper with a poisonous bag, at the root of a hollow forked tooth, which, being compressed as the animal fixes its jaws, pours out a strong poison on the wound, that is mortal in a few hours, unless proper remedies are applied. Descriptions, however, of all the animals in North and South America, have so often been exhibited to publick view by voyagers, travellers, and writers of natural history, that it is almost superfluous to transcribe what has been so frequently repeated, though our intirely omitting such particulars might possibly be attributed to neglect or to ignorance.

(F) We do not intend that the reader should entertain any doubt of the real existence of the Moose, but of the extraordinary height which Mr. Jesselyn gives the animal. We are told, indeed, by other writers, that the black Moose, or Moose, as the natives pronounce it, is exceeding large, and sometimes the height of fourteen spans, reckoning nine inches to a span, a quarter of his venison weighing two hundred weight. The flesh is less delicate in the opinion of many men, than our venison; while others think it richer and more substantial. It will bear salting, and was often used as ship beef by the buccaneers. The light-coloured Moose, called Wampoose by the Indians, is of a smaller stature, is more gregarious, and indeed more frequently met with. The black are seldom found above four or five together. They calve every year, generally produce two together, bring forth their young standing, without any apparent pain or labour; while the young fall upon their feet, and run about the moment they have breathed the air, and touched the earth. Such is the strength of this animal, that after he is unharboured, he will run a course of thirty or forty miles without halting, but with less swiftness than a stag (1).

a NEW ENGLAND abounds in excellent timber, oak, ash, pine, fir, cedar, elm, cypress, beech, walnut, chestnut, hazel, sassafras, samach, and other woods used in dying, or in the forests, that a law passed to prevent the waste of woods, by inflicting penalties on those who cut down trees of a certain kind, before they were arrived at specified growth and age. The pines are equal to those of Norway in growth and straitness; and it is certain, Great Britain might be provided from this country with all the materials of shipbuilding, at present purchased in the northern kingdoms, at the expence of a considerable sum of ready money to the nation. The oak, indeed, is reported to be inferior in quality to that of England, but as the forests of Great Britain are on the decline, it is certainly b politick to be careful of this valuable commodity.

THE seas round New England, as well as its rivers, abound with most of the fish that is common in Europe; and even whales, we are told, were formerly taken between New England and New York. They are of several kinds, viz. the whale bone whale, the sperma ceti whale, which yields ambergrease, the fin-back'd whale, the scrag whale, and the bunch whale; and each species has a separate property. Those whales are said to have something remarkable in their manner of generation, and the female is supposed to go with her young nine or ten months; but to be pregnant only every other year. The sagacity and affection of those animals, in nourishing and bringing up their young, is incredible.
The bone of the New England whale is however too brittle, and not so serviceable as that c of the Greenland. A terrible creature called the Whale-killer, which is from twenty to thirty feet long, with strong teeth and jaws, persecutes the whale in these seas; but, afraid of his monstrous strength, those killers seldom attack a full-grown whale, or indeed a young one, but in companies of ten or twelve.

THE province of New England seems to have been neglected by the original discoverers Discovery of
of our American colonies; for, though it is more than probable that Sebastian Cabot disco- New England.
vered it, and though it is certain that the adventurers under Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir Francis Drake knew of this country, yet we have no satisfactory account of it till 1602, when captain Gesnold performed his voyage to this province. He had received a hint from Sir Francis Drake of the advantages that might arise from a settlement here, and for that d purpose he and his sailors and passengers, who amounted in the whole to thirty-two, carried out with them seed corn to sow the ground. After touching at various places, he at last made a settlement on a place which he named Martha's Vineyard, where his planters sowed their corn, and found it answer; and to protect them from the natives who lived in the neighbourhood, he here raised a small fort, and mounted six guns on a platform.
It was not long before he and his little colony traded with the savages, whom they perceived to be an hospitable inoffensive people, and whom they found, by the dress and accoutrements of some of them, to have before traded with Europeans. In general, however, they were dressed with deer-skins upon their shoulders, and seal skins about their waists. Their hair was long, and tied up in a knot behind; and, though all over paint-e ed, their natural complexion appeared to be the same with that of the other savages on the same continent. The commerce of the English with them was so profitable, in furs, skins, and sweet wood, which they exchanged for toys, that the merchants who employed him, who were most of them Plymouth men, obtained a grant from James I. authorizing them to plant where they should think fit and convenient, between thirty-eight and forty-five degrees of northern latitude. The country thus described was then called North Virginia; and the grantees held it under the title of the council of Plymouth. The chief of these grantees were the lord chief-justice Popham; Sir Ferdinando Gorges; Thomas Han- ham, Esq; Raleigh Gilbert, Esq; son of the famous navigator Sir Humphrey Gilbert; Wil- liam Parke, Esq; and George Popham, Esq; These gentlemen, with the other grantees, f in 1606, sent a ship commanded by Mr Henry Chalons to North Virginia; but he and his crew, consisting of about thirty persons, were taken by the Spaniards, and sent prisoners to Spain. Lord chief-justice Popham was so public-spirited as not to be discouraged by this accident; and, at his own expence, fitted out another ship, the command of which was given to captain Hanham, whose report of the country was so encouraging, that captain Popham and captain Gilbert carried thither two ships, with one hundred men, and proportionable stores for a settlement, which they began to make at the mouth of Sa- gadabock river.

It appears from the general history of the English settlements in America, that the chief Difficulties of discouragement of the planters settled there arose from the difficulties they were under of planting it.
g subsisting themselves all the year through. As to the trade itself, it was evidently gainful; and notwithstanding what had happened, captain Rawden, captain Langham, Mr.
Buliy, and Mr. Skelton, fitted out two ships for North Virginia, giving the command of one of them to captain John Smith, who had acted as president of South Virginia, and of the other to Thomas Hunt. On their arrival, Smith, taking eight of his crew along with him, went up the country, and made a map of it, which he shewed to Charles prince of Wales; afterwards Charles I. and his royal highness gave it the name of New England. As to Hunt, the other commander, he behaved most infamously, for he kidnapped between thirty and forty of the natives, and carried them to Malaga, where he sold them to the Spaniards. This perfidious action was resented by the Indians, and revenged upon the English, particularly upon captain Hobson. Smith, who had made a very gainful voyage, having put 1500*l.* in his own pocket, besides indemnifying his owners, sailed with two ships in 1615 once more to New England; but being dismasted, he returned to Plymouth with his own ship. When he attempted to renew the voyage he was taken by the French, while his other ship made a very gainful voyage, and returned safe to England. Hunt's villainous action, however, had rendered the natives so irreconcilable to the English, that the latter were unable to continue their settlement, though the trade was carried on to very beneficial purposes by other adventurers.

New Ply-

ed.

NEW ENGLAND, at last, owed its settlement and prosperity to the noblest of all principles, a generous disdain of civil and religious tyranny. Our histories are full of the impolitic persecutions of the dissenters under the two first princes of the Stuart race, who sat upon the throne of England. Many of them had been driven into foreign countries, particularly to Holland, where the complaisance of the government for that of England, rendered them unsafe in the exercise of their religion. Sir Robert Naunton was then one of the secretaries of state, and the exiled puritans, as they were then called, knew him to be their friend. Some of them were men of substance as well as sense, and they had formed themselves into a congregation at Leyden, of which Mr. John Robinson was the pastor, and one Mr. John Brewster, a person of about sixty years of age, the ruling elder. From this congregation the noble hint of retiring to New England, where they could have the free exercise of their religion without being persecuted by bigots and churchmen, arose. They applied to Naunton for leave to settle in those inhospitable wilds, where the Indians, savage as they were, were more desirable neighbours than the tyrants from whom they fled. Naunton had the address to persuade James I. that it was bad policy to unpeople his own kingdoms for the benefit of his neighbours; and that whatever exception he might have, he could have none in granting them liberty of conscience, where they would still continue to be his subjects, and where they might extend his dominion. His majesty's answer was, that it was a good and honest proposal, and liberty was accordingly granted. After various schemes and disappointments, the new adventurers, many of whom had sold their estates, and generously thrown the produce into a common bank for carrying on their undertaking, hired a ship of 180 tons, called the May flower, and another ship called the Speedwell of 60 tons, on board of which they put all their necessary implements, and sailed from Plymouth the 6th of September. Their intention was to have made a settlement under the sanction of Gesnold's patent, being one hundred and twenty persons on board, besides thirty seamen; and after arriving at Cape Cod, being betrayed, as is said, by Jones, the master of the Speedwell, who was bribed by the Dutch, they were obliged to land there; and here they associated themselves by a formal instrument, as subjects of England, and engaged to submit to the laws that should from time to time be made for the good of the colony. This association, though made with a very good intention, was really void in itself, as the place they took possession of was not included in Gesnold's grant. They pretended, however, that they treated with the cacique, or lord, and other principal natives of the country, from whom they purchased a right of settlement on their lands. About forty substantial planters, and some of them gentlemen of fortune, but all of them dissenters, were at the head of this undertaking. They chose for their governor for one year Mr. John Carver, who with sixteen men landed on what is now called Barnstable County to search for a convenient situation to settle on; but though they saw evident tracts of an inhabited country, they could find none, and returned; another detachment was sent out for the same purpose, and in search of a harbour. They ranged about the Patuxet County, and at last on Christmas Day, having found a spot, which they thought would answer their purpose, but not before they had a slight skirmish with the natives, they returned to their ship, made their report, landed their goods, stores, and utensils, erected a kind of storehouse, and agreed to call their infant settlement New Plymouth. Here they remained without seeing any Indians all the winter, which proved so severe that half their number died. About the middle of March, a Segamore, one of the petty lords who lived to the northward, but who had been so much conversant with the English that he had picked up a little of the language, came to New Plymouth, and was so well satisfied with his reception, that he brought several others of the natives to visit their country, till at last their great sachem or king, Massasoit, with his brother and sixty attendants, did the new colony the same honour. A native, who understood English, served a as interpreter on this occasion, and the governor, with the gentlemen of the colony, received their visitors in great state. The visit, however, seems to have been somewhat unreasonable, for the colony began to be distressed for provisions, and their visitors eat and drank most enormously. It was on this occasion, if we are not mistaken, that Massasoit made a present to the settlers, their heirs, and successors for ever, of the spot on which New Plymouth was built, and all the adjacent lands. Upon the death of Carver, William Bradford, Esq; was chosen governor, and he sent two of the principal gentlemen of the colony to repay Massasoit's visit; but though their excellencies were received with much savage politeness, yet they were in great danger of being famished for want of victuals and drink, so miserably was this court provided for their reception.

b Soon after some of the savage segamores, who could not be reconciled to the English, having been guilty of some hostilities, captain Standish was sent with fourteen men from New Plymouth to Namasket to demand satisfaction. This had so good an effect, that the neighbouring sachems and segamores made their submissions, and according to the historians of *New England*², they subscribed the following instrument.

War with the Indians.

"Know all men by these presents, that we, whose names are underwritten, do acknowledge ourselves to be the legal subjects of king James, king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. In witness whereof, and as a testimony of the same, we have subscribed our names or marks, as followeth, Obquamchud, Caw-nacome, Obbatinua, Nattamawbunt, Coubatant, Chillaback, Quadaquina, Huttamoiden, Apadnow."

A grant.

c NOTWITHSTANDING the good opinion we have of the British title to New England, we must entertain great doubts as to the authenticity of this submission; for, though such a paper may be produced, it may be questioned whether the subscribers knew what they were signing; and, to this day, the American savages, notwithstanding their connections with the Europeans, seem to have few ideas of deeds in writing. Be this as it will, the planters found that, with a little support from England, they should be able to make good their undertaking; and, in the spring of the year 1621, the May-flower was dispatched to England. In May following, Mr. Weston, one of the original Plymouth adventurers, sent a ship with seven passengers to New Plymouth, and soon after sixty more arrived; but,

Progress of the colony.

d bringing no provisions with them, they served but to encrease the mouths, and consequently the distresses, of the colony, which had been unfortunate in its harvest. More passengers arriving soon after, a famine must have ensued, had not a small trading vessel touched on the coast, provided with English toys, such as beads, scissars, and knives, which the colony bought up; and, by exchanging them for the native peltries, they soon procured themselves a comfortable subsistence. By this time, Weston broke off from the colony, and produced a patent for establishing a settlement upon part of Massachusetts Bay, at a place called Wasagusquaset, under pretence of propagating the church of England worship (G). During the residence of Weston's men in New Plymouth, we cannot suppose there was any good understanding between them and the planters, not only on account of religion, but because the latter did not think they held their possessions and properties from the crown of England, though they acknowledged themselves to be its subjects. The strictness of the lives of the puritans disgusted Weston and his men; whom the original planters accused of being guilty of all manner of vice and wickedness. We cannot say what might have been in this charge, nor can we affirm that the old colonists spirited up the natives against them; but it is certain, that Weston and his men were scarcely arrived at their new settlement, when the savages entered into a conspiracy for cutting them all off. The New England historians attribute this conspiracy to Weston's men's riotous way of living, which gave scandal to the savages, and obliged the new planters to consume their stock, and to barter away their goods, even to their cloaths and bedding, to procure subsistence. If the truth was known, their distresses, perhaps, would be found to arise from the prepossessions the savages had conceived against them, so as, by not trading with them, to force them into those desperate circumstances.

Dissentions amongst themselves.

f THE conspiracy we have mentioned was discovered and prevented in the following manner. Governor Bradford, being informed that his friend Massasoit was sick, again sent Mr. Winslow and Mr. Hopkins, his former ambassadors, to visit him. They found him very weak, and, in gratitude for some relief that Mr. Winslow administered to him, he discovered to him the conspiracy, which was instantly suppressed by captain Standish, at the head of no more than eight men. If there is any truth in this conspiracy, the New Plymouthers

² NEAL. MATHER. British Empire in America. System of Geography.

(G) We are to read this part of the New England history with great caution, as the writers were violent puritans, and opposers, even to enthusiasm, of the church of England.

behaved very nobly, for they not only saved Weston's men, but offered them a retreat in their own settlement; and when that was declined, they victualled a vessel to go in quest of their head, who was trading to the eastward. It appears, however, that the sachem of the Massachusetts savages disowned the execrable conspiracy; but a plague soon swept him and all his people off.

The colony flourishes.

FROM the year 1623, the industry of the New Plymouthers and their associates in New England rendered this a flourishing colony. Its reputation increased every day in its mother-country, and it became the refuge of all who were oppressed by the bigots, either of the church or the state. It grew at last to be such an eye-sore to both, that attempts were made to introduce into the colony episcopacy. For this purpose, Mr. Gorges, son to Sir Ferdinando Gorges, arrived with several families, besides a church of England clergyman; and, as is said, with a commission to be governor of New England: but the New Plymouthers stood so firmly to their principles and their consciences, that Gorges and his people soon left the country. All this while, the New Plymouthers held their possession under agreement with the council of Plymouth, whose patent comprehended the continent of America from New Scotland to Carolina; so greatly, however, did the planters thrive, that in seven years time they offered to buy out the patentees, to take the whole property into their own hands, and to indemnify the patentees for their expences in the adventure. The patentees, as such, had been no great gainers by the prosperity of the colony, and they willingly gave an ear to the proposal. The colonists' agent, at first, was one Pierre; but, discovering that he wanted to betray them, they sent over Mr. Winslow, who obtained the patent they wanted in the name of governor Bradford, and he, upon demand, surrendered it to the general council. Thus did those industrious colonists find means to erect themselves into a republic, even though they held their possessions under the sanction of an original patent from the crown of England; a case that is rare in history, and can be effected only by that perseverance, which the true spirit of liberty inspires.

New constitution of its government.

THE governor's assistants were now increased to five; for though those planters had no reason to distrust him, yet they were willing that as little power as possible should be vested in one of their own body, and the number of the council was now seven. It is a memorable æra in the history of New England, that in the year 1624, upon Mr. Winslow's return to New Plymouth, amongst other articles of a considerable supply he brought along with him, there was that of three heifers and a bull, the first ever seen in that country, together with hogs, goats, and poultry, all which increased incredibly. But while we mention the thriving condition of the colony at this period, the reader is not to carry with him the idea of an European state; and yet any infant state in Europe, if any such we can suppose, might profit by the wise and humane policy of those planters. The town of New Plymouth, at the time we speak of, contained only an hundred and eighty persons, living in thirty-two houses. Though each head of a family had his separate portion of land, yet the whole produce was paid into one common stock, from whence it was dealt out to the families, in quantities proportioned to the number each contained. The town itself was about half a mile in circumference, and paled in, and a kind of watch-tower was erected upon an eminence in the middle. We are not, however, to imagine that all the strength and riches of the colony were contained in this town; for large quantities of lands had been cleared, sown, and enclosed in the country by settlers, who lived there on their own plantations.

Disturbed by a mutiny of Morton.

THE thriving condition of the New England colony served only to increase the desire of the government of Old England to send over fresh planters to settle on Massachusetts's Bay. With this view, one captain Woolaston, with some gentlemen of fortune, in 1626, came over thither, and settled at a place called Mount Woolaston, since changed into that of Braintree. Woolaston soon found his scheme impracticable, went to Virginia; and, his men mutinying in his absence, chose one Morton for their head. They are accused by the New England historians of the same crimes as Weston's men, particularly drunkenness, and perhaps, for the same reasons, their deriding the sober plain manners of the puritans, in contempt of whom they are said to have danced round a may-pole. But another charge was brought against them, which, if true, was highly punishable; and that was, that they instructed the savages in the use of fire-arms. The government of New Plymouth, finding their remonstrances on this head had no effect upon Morton, sent against him captain Standish, which service this sober puritan performed in a most gallant manner, by disarming Morton with his own hand, and carrying him and all his men prisoners to New Plymouth, from whence Morton was sent to England to be prosecuted by the New England council, who took no notice of their complaint; so jealous were they become of those colonists.

2 THIS second settlement projected at Massachuset failing, the puritans, who continued to be most miserably harrassed in England, very sensibly thought that they could not do better than to make a settlement there of their own body. Mr. John White, the puritan minister of Dorchester, was at the head of this noble design, which he seems to have long had in view. He sent over one Connant and some others as forerunners, and he managed with such prudence and zeal, that he procured a patent from the council of Plymouth, or New England, to Sir Henry Roswell, Sir John Young, Thomas Southcot, Esq; John Humphreys, Esq; John Endicot, Esq; and Simon Whetcomb, Esq; for all that part of the country that lies three miles north of the river Merrimack, which falls into the sea near Salisbury; and three miles south of Charles river, which falls into the sea near Boston, at the bottom of Massachuset Bay. Those patentees, being sensible of the former failures of this project, resolved to associate with themselves a number of gentlemen of their own principles, but well acquainted with trade and commerce; the following gentlemen therefore were taken into the patent, viz. Sir Richard Saltonstall, Isaac Johnson, Esq; Samuel Adderly, Esq; John Ven, Esq; Matthew Craddock, Esq; George Hammond, Esq; Increase Nowel, Esq; Richard Perry, Esq; Richard Bellingham, Esq; Nathaniel Wright, Esq; Samuel Vassal, Esq; Theophilus Eaton, Esq; Thomas Goff, Esq; Thomas Adams, Esq; John Browne, Esq; Samuel Browne, Esq; Thomas Hutchins, Esq; William Vassels, Esq; William Pinchon, Esq; and George Foxcraft, Esq. Some of those gentlemen's names occur in the general histories of England, particularly that of Mr. Samuel Vassal, who was one of those patriots that made the noble stand in favour of public liberty under Charles I. The addition of so many new patentees, I perceive, obliged Mr. White and his friends to take out a new patent, dated March 4, 1628, by which they were incorporated by the name of the governor and company of Massachuset Bay, in New England; impowered to elect a governor, deputy-governor, and magistrates, and to make plantation-laws, provided they were not repugnant to those of England; and liberty of conscience was granted to all who should settle there. To give this grant all the validity possible, a patent was obtained from Charles I. 1627, to hold the said lands (contained in the patent from the Plymouth company) as of his manor of East Greenwich in common soccage, yielding and paying to his majesty one-fifth of such gold or silver ore, as should be found from time to time within the said limits.

d THE first governor elected under this new company was Matthew Craddock, Esq; whose deputy was John Endicot, Esq; Mr. White had with some difficulty prevailed with Mr. Connant and his friends to remain in Massachuset, till the new charter could be expedited; and Mr. Endicot was immediately dispatched to join them with a fresh reinforcement. He found them at Neumkeak, now called Salem; but his numbers before and at the time of his landing were greatly diminished by the scurvy and other infectious diseases, and more must have perished, had it not been for the great skill of Dr. Fuller, a physician of New Plymouth, who recovered them. In the mean while, the new adventurers were making great preparations for carrying their scheme into execution. The following ships were prepared, viz. the George Bonaventure, of twenty guns; the Talbot, of twenty guns; the Lion's Whelp, of eight guns; the May-flower, of fourteen guns; the Four Sisters, of fourteen guns; and the Pilgrim, of four guns. The passengers on board this flotilla were about three hundred and fifty, men, women, and children; about a hundred and fifteen head of cattle, viz. horses, mares, bulls, and cows; six pieces of cannon; proper stores of ammunition of all kinds, with every thing that could be required for such a settlement, not forgetting even goats and conies. Our new colonists were upon their passage from the first of May till the twenty-fourth of June. The reader is to observe, that the colony of New Plymouth had got such credit with the natives, that they were of infinite use to the Massachuset adventurers; but upon the express condition, that the latter should exclude all forms of worship but that of the puritans. It soon appeared how little men may profit by persecution, and how apt they are to exercise the rod under which they themselves have smarted. The two brothers, Browne, were joined with some others in making use of the church of England worship; but so far were they from being indulged in this, though both of them were patentees, that Mr. Endicot sent them back to England, though, as we have already seen, one of the clauses of the company's charter provided for liberty of conscience. This indefensible conduct very probably procured peace to the colony, which, in a short time, made a most surprising progress.

In the year 1630, the governor, Mr. Craddock, being too old to go over in person, the company chose for their governor John Winthrop, Esq; a gentleman bred to the law, and one who had sold an estate of about 700 l. a year, to raise money for the uses of the colony. His deputy was Thomas Dudley, Esq; who at first had been bred a soldier, but became afterwards a violent puritan. Under those two gentlemen, a fleet of no fewer than ten ships, with stores and provisions in proportion, set sail this year for New England. Before they arrived, the noxious qualities of an uncleared country appeared in the deaths, during one winter, of one hundred of the colonists, carried over by Mr. Endicot. This second fleet, on board of which were some persons of distinction, and about two hundred passengers, all of them voluntary exiles for religion, besides many others, who went thither for the purposes of commerce, and were a kind of occasional conformists, had but a very indifferent passage, and arrived in July at Salem in a sickly condition. Those new emigrants divided into two bodies, of which one settled in Charles-Town, so called from its being built on the banks of the river Charles; and the other at a place called Dorchester, at the bottom of Massachuset bay. The inhabitants of Charles-Town soon perceived the superior advantages of the spot where Boston is now built, and, removing thither, they there founded that metropolis of New England. It is to the honour of the puritan ministers, that they were highly instrumental not only in forming the manners, but in promoting the interests of this promising colony. The chief of them were Wilson, Warcham, Hooker, and Elliot, which last is deservedly stiled the apostle of America. The colony now prospered, and was encreased to a degree that rendered it formidable to the natives, so that the colonists were obliged to live perpetually upon their guard; but the apprehensions of the latter were removed by a calamity, which an European can scarce have an idea of, but was not uncommon in that country among the savages; for the small pox all of a sudden swept off nine parts in ten of the natives, and the despicable remainder fled to new and distant habitations.

History of Gardiner.

In 1632, Winthrop, the new governor of Massachuset Bay, and Wilson, the minister of Boston, travelled for forty miles through the woods to settle a regular correspondence with the colony of New Plymouth. About this time, a new phenomenon appeared in the American world. One Sir Christopher Gardiner, having run through a capricious round of pleasures, pretending to be a puritan, though he is said to have been a papist in his heart, settled with a lady he carried along with him amongst the Indians, in the neighbourhood of Boston, intending, as he pretended, to pass the remainder of his life in retirement. It was not, it seems, so perfectly regular as to impose upon the governor of New Plymouth, who promised the Indians a reward, if they could take him alive, which they did; but not till after a gallant resistance, in which he was wounded. Being carried to New Plymouth, his wounds were cured, and he was from thence sent to Old England, where he exclaimed against the injustice that had been done him, and joined with the enemies of the New Plymouth colony, who were numerous and powerful. As no particulars of this gentleman's offences are either specified or proved, we suspect that he was guilty only of a behaviour, which the puritans there looked upon as the worst of crimes. Gardiner, on his arrival in England, was joined by Sir Ferdinando Gorges, and the chief of the New England council, in a petition which they presented to the privy council of England against the colony; but in this they had no success. Next year, some of the heads of the puritan ministers then settled in New England arrived in Old England to solicit farther supplies for their colony. The good sense, the policy, and the great national advantages accruing from it, got the better of Laud and his brethren of the established church, all-powerful as they were with their misled master. Some of the members of the council-board, sensible of the national advantages arising from the colony, patronized them; and all the puritans in England, who were then a formidable body, favoured them, as did most men of sense even of the established religion.

Murder of two Englishmen.

It must, however, be acknowledged, that some of the colonists settled in New England did not behave with proper moderation, even in temporal affairs. They had no ideas of the right which the natives had to their own country; and whatever may be pretended of the puritans having purchased it from the Indians, the latter were often treated with an impolitic barbarity. Pity it was, that they had no other means of testifying their resentment, but by actions reciprocally barbarous. The Pequots was an Indian nation, lying in the neighbourhood of New Plymouth. Two English gentlemen, captain Stone and captain Morton, were incautious enough to set out in a small bark from New England towards Virginia, and to force two of the natives, whom they seized, to pilot them up Connecticut river. The Pequots, suspecting that this was done with a design to seize on their lands on the borders of that river, both the gentlemen, with six men attending them, were surprized and put to death; their bark blowing up after it had been plundered by the savages. This, in the main, seems to have been the truth, and, though the Indians endeavoured to excuse themselves by pretending that the bark blew up by accident, yet they never could be prevailed upon to restore the plunder they had seized.

In a society primarily founded upon religious principles, it is not surprising that religion had there a great influence. One Mr. Williams, the minister of Salem, had broached several wrong-headed opinions, and amongst others the following, viz. That it was not lawful a for good men to join in family prayer with the wicked; that it was unlawful to take an oath to the civil magistrate; and that the king of England having no right over the Indians of America, his patent was invalid; with several other principles of the like tendency. Williams was so obstinate, that he defended his doctrines, for which he and his followers were driven out of Massachusetts colony, and took refuge on the banks of an adjoining river, where they built a town, which they called Providence, lying to the southward of Plymouth, opposite Rhode-Island, and in the country of the Narragansets. Williams, in other respects, seems to have been a wise, virtuous, worthy man; and proved afterwards to be one of the greatest benefactors to the new settlement that ever went from Old England.

In the year 1635, the famous Sir Henry Vane, the younger, who afterwards lost his head b for high-treason in England, and who, notwithstanding all his parts, was at this time a gloomy hair-brained enthusiast, went over to New England in a fleet of twenty sail, well provided with stores and passengers of all kinds. He is said to have been encouraged to this voyage by Charles I. himself, who wanted to be rid of him, and persuaded his father to let him be absent for three years. A man of his figure and reputation highly engaged the attention of both Old and New England; and, instead of forming a settlement, as he proposed to do, on the banks of Connecticut river, he accepted of the government of Massachusetts, which was offered him. His scheme of government was entirely different from the principles of the ruling party there, who, most inconsistently with their own conduct, demanded a rigorous conformity, through all their colony, in matters of religion. Sir c Henry, who, if he had any principle, was that which was afterwards called independency, was for a comprehension of the baptists, and all the other sectaries who dissented from the church of England; nor would he be dictated to by the ministers and their ruling elders. Being as violent as they were obstinate, at the next election he was set aside, and Mr. Winthrop was replaced in the government; upon which Sir Henry returned to England, where he acted a part sufficiently known in history.

Sir Henry Vane governor.

THE more the colony prospered, the more did the aversion of the Pequots to the English manifest itself; so that the scheme of making a settlement on Connecticut river for bridling d them was still pursued. The two settlements at New Plymouth and Massachusetts were, by fresh emigrations from England, now become so populous, that they contained towns, to which the names of the principal cities and towns in England were affixed. The situations of some of those towns, however, were not always well-judged; and upon the report of certain commissioners, who had been sent to survey the banks of Connecticut river, of their e amazing fertility and conveniency, many inhabitants already settled resolved to transplant themselves thither. Mr. Hooker, the minister, put himself at the head of the first detachment of those emigrants, and after easy journies of ten or eleven days, they arrived at the banks of that river, where they began to build a town, which they called Hertford; other detachments followed afterwards, who built Windsor, and three or four towns more. It happened unfortunately for those new planters, that they were obliged to draw all their f subsistence from Massachusetts; and it was so late in the year before the ship that was to carry them could be freighted, that she was frozen up at the mouth of the river, sixty miles below the nearest of the new plantations. This accident proved a dreadful blow upon the settlers, especially the poorer sort of them, many of whom were frozen to death in endeavouring to get back to their former habitations; nor indeed can we well conceive how the others could subsist, unless they carried their provisions with them, or had drawn them from the ship. Be this as it will, it is certain, that they who remained, by their courage and perseverance, conquered all difficulties, and, in the spring of the year 1636, this colony was in a condition, not only to subsist, but to defend itself from the natives. Great part of its settlements, however, being without the limits of the Massachusetts's Bay company, under whose commission they acted, they agreed upon a plan of government amongst themselves, and chose for their governor Edward Hopkins, Esq;

The Connecticut company settled.

Their difficulties.

THE independency with which those colonists acted, the prosperous state of their settlements, with the beauty and fertility of the country, now made it to be considered by the heads of the puritan party in England, many of whom were men of the first rank; fortunes, and abilities, as the sanctuary of liberty; and some of them, particularly the lord viscount Say, and the lord Brooke, formed a design to transport thither themselves, their families, and effects. It happened, that the earl of Warwick, who was a puritan likewise, had obtained a grant from the crown of all that part of the country, extending from the river Narraganset forty leagues in a strait line, near the sea-shore towards Virginia, for so the continent, south of New England, was then called. This grant was assigned by the earl g of Warwick to the lords Brooke and Say, Charles Fiennes, Esq, Sir Nathaniel Rich, Sir Richard Saltonstall, Richard Knightly, Esq; John Pym, Esq; John Hampden, Esq; and Herbert Pelham, Esq. But matters, about this time, began to take a turn in England. The friends of the constitution had secretly united themselves against the court, and had entered tered into a correspondence with the heads of the Scotch parliament; so that the above gentlemen thought it would be cowardly for them to desert their country, while there remained the smallest probability of their being able to serve her. They therefore sent over a commission to Mr. Fenwick, their agent in New England, authorising him to dispose of their lands, which he accordingly did, to the colony of Connecticut, who thereby luckily obtained for the first time a legal patent for a great part of their possessions.

Aburd conduct of the English government.

THE design of the lords and the gentlemen to transport themselves to New England came to the ears of the court; and it was publickly known that several other members of the house of commons, amongst whom were Oliver Cromwell and Sir Arthur Haselrig, had the same intention. Laud, and the bigots about king Charles, trembled at this, and prevailed with Juxon, bishop of London, then lord-high-treasurer, to lay an embargo upon eight ships lying then in the Thames for New England. A proclamation, at the same time, was emitted to restrain the disorderly transporting of his majesty's subjects. Thus Charles and his ministers sought to undo the only prosperous measure of his reign, as if they had been ashamed of having so long connived at the felicity of England. They, at the same time, procured the lord admiral's order for stopping all divines, who did not conform to the church of England, from transporting themselves to his majesty's plantations; and several other orders, equally absurd and impolitic, of the same kind were published. Those foolish measures seemed to encrease the desire of the people to leave England; and, in the summer of 1636, so many planters arrived, that they could find no place for them to settle on Massachusetts Bay. They, therefore, purchased from the natives the land that lies between Connecticut river and New York, called Hudson's river; and there founded the town, colony, province, and government of Newhaven; which, with Long Island, which was comprehended in their purchase, was soon filled with towns, all of them, as usual, with Old English names. The heads of those emigrants were Theophilus Eaton, Esq; an eminent merchant, and the reverend Mr. Davenport, minister of Coleman-street, who, having been obliged to fly for non-conformity to Holland, returned to England in disguise, where he shipped himself off for New England. This colony at first, being most of them traders, applied to commerce, in which they were unsuccessful; but when they turned themselves to clear and improve their lands, they throve like the rest.

Trade of New England.

THE trade of New England consisted now of two great branches; the product of the earth, in which we include the peltry; and that of the sea: but the furs and fishes were commonly in the same hands, and the north-east parts of New England were found to be the most commodious for both. Two counties were therefore there laid out, those of New Hampshire and Main, between the rivers Merrimack and Sagadahock; and here likewise several towns were built. The difficulties which this last settlement, which lay within the line of the Massachusetts colony, met with, arose from their own feuds and dissensions, which in the end deprived them of their independency. The French colonies in Canada having great communications with the Indians, who lay nearest to New England, used all means to disturb their settlements; and it is certain that the French councils at home had a great effect on the mind of Charles, and were a principal means of the impolitic discouragement which he now gave to his New England subjects. Add to this, that the Dutch were then settled in the country now called New York, and did not behold the flourishing state of New England with pleasing eyes.

War with the Pequots.

THE Pequots, whom we have already mentioned, had for some time been at war with their neighbours, the Narragansets, and likewise with the Dutch at New York; but they on all occasions manifested their ill-will towards the English, whom they considered as the invaders and usurpers of their country. The English, for some time, were not able to act offensively, or they would have brought them to account for the deaths of the captains Stone and Morton, and likewise for many alarms which they had given their settlements, particularly their mother-one at New Plymouth. But at the time we now treat of, the four colonies of New Plymouth, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Newhaven, could muster 7000 men. This struck the Pequots with terror, and they pretended to court the friendship of Mr. Winthrop, the governor of Massachusetts. Winthrop agreed to a treaty, but insisted upon terms not a little arbitrary, viz. That the murderers of Stone should be given up; that the Pequots should make a cession of their lands adjacent to Connecticut river, and that a free trade should be opened between the two nations. The Pequots seemed disposed to grant those demands, provided the English would bring about a peace between them and the Narragansets, which it seems could not be effected. The Pequots then seized a Massachusetts vessel, and murdered its owner. They then proceeded to other hostilities; killed nine men at Weathersfeld, an English town upon Connecticut river, and took prisoners two young women, who escaped being put to death by torture by the sachem's wife taking a liking for them. The governor and council at Boston, which was already become the residence of the New England legislature, to revenge those insults, sent the captains Endicot, a Underhill, and Turner, with one hundred and twenty men, the greatest army of Englishmen that had ever been before seen in New England, to demand satisfaction. The Indians fled to the woods, and all the satisfaction the English obtained, was their destroying their corn and cottages. Upon their departure, the savages attacked Seabrook, the fort that had been erected by Mr. Fenwick; but they were repulsed, though the garrison consisted of no more than twenty men. In revenge for this, they killed some people who were at work in the fields, and applied to the Narragansets for assistance against the English, but were refused it.

Underhill,

THE English of those parts foresaw and dreaded the consequences, should they suffer such insults to remain unchastised; and, therefore, a kind of crusade was preached up b against the infidels, through all the confederated colonies. That of Connecticut, young as it was, furnished ninety men under captain Mason; Seabrook twenty, under captain Underhill; and these, being joined, sailed to the Narragansets port, where they demanded from the sachem a free passage into the Pequots country, which was granted. Five hundred Narragansets, who joined them on their march, deserted them when they came near the Pequots country, and returned home; but Uncas, a friendly sachem, and his men, stood firm to the English, though, when they came within sight of danger, they fell into the rear of the party.

ARRIVING at the Pequots country, they had intelligence that Sassacus, the sachem of the Pequots, and his men, were retired into two strong forts on the river Mistick, about c eight miles distant from each other. This Sassacus was the most tremendous champion of all the American chiefs, being so strong and so brave at the same time, that his people said he was a god, and could not be killed. The English set fire to the first fort they came to, while all within it were asleep, and killed all whom the flames did not consume, excepting seven or eight who escaped; so that, in fact, they may be said to have massacred four or five hundred unsuspecting, unoffending barbarians. By this time, Sassacus, who was in the other fort, got together three hundred of his men, and harassed the rear of the English for almost six miles. The victory, if it may be called so, of the English, appeared to be next to miraculous to the savages, who, measuring every thing by success, abandoned the brave Sassacus, and he was obliged to conceal himself. The second detachment of the d English from Massachusetts Bay, about a fortnight after the massacre committed by the first, arrived in the Pequot country, with an intention, as appeared by the sequel, to exterminate the very race. Finding no body of them, they scoured the woods in small parties, and killed or took prisoners all they met with. They cut off the heads of two sachems, but gave the third his life, for being so dastardly as to discover the place where Sassacus was concealed. The latter, however, was not to be surprised, and escaped to the country of the Maquas, or Mobocks, who inhumanly put him to death at the request of the Narragansets, instigated, probably, by the English. Amongst other adventures in this expedition, a party of the English met with eight hundred men, and two hundred women, with their children, whom they drove into a swamp, where they must have been starved to death if e they remained, or killed, had they attempted to leave it. A fog arose which favoured the escape of the men, but they were discovered, pursued, many of them killed, and some of them found dead in the woods of their wounds. The women surrendered, and became the prey of the victors. Amongst them was the sachem's wife, who had so generously f saved the lives of the two Weathersfield maids. With a modest dignity, which would have done honour to a Roman matron, she requested her captors, that her body might not be abused, nor her children taken from her; and the sweetness of her countenance and behaviour was answerable to the virtue and tenderness of her requests. The number of the prisoners in the whole was about one hundred and eighty, and they were divided between the colonies of Connecticut and Massachusetts. As to the women and children, the former were dispersed through the English settlements, and the male infants were sent to Bermudas. We own, unless those colonists had some other motives than those expressed in their history, which is not very probable, we cannot account for the humanity or justice of this war. Conquest, it is true, is said to establish a right; but then the grounds of the quarrel, from which that conquest arises, ought to be justifiable, otherwise the conquest itself is a wicked and an illegal title. As to the Pequots, their lands were distributed amongst the English planters; of the few who escaped, some fled to other countries, and others submitted to the conquerors, who divided them between the Narragansets and the Mobegins, who were friends to the English.

Expedition against the natives.

An example of savage virtue.

Religious differences.

A WAR of a different kind, which threatened the extinction of the colony, had by this time broken out. Diversity of religions in an undertaking of that kind, is only so far beneficial, as they are founded upon the principles of toleration; but no toleration is to be expected among hot-brained enthusiasts, such as the majority of those New Englanders were. They began upon the fanatical parts of controversy, and their madness was encouraged raged by young Vane. Whether the preference ought to be given to the covenant of a works or the covenant of grace, was a most important point to be decided, and the controversy took rise from women. One lady, Mrs. Hutchinson, held in her house assemblies of female devotees, where she held forth in sermons and other effusions of nonsense. This religious contagion was soon communicated to their husbands. Mechanics set up for preachers, and the old ministers were turned out. The clergy themselves were divided, till at last the magistrates interposed and a synod was called; the majority of which happened to be for the magistrates, that is, on the side of common sense. Notwithstanding the threatening aspect which those divisions bore to the affairs of the colony, yet in the end they turned greatly to its advantage. The madness of the Antinomians, for so the party condemned by the synod was called, obliged their antagonists to inflict some severities upon them; upon which the others purchased what is now called Rhode-Island, and made so judicious a choice of their situation, that it was soon so much overstocked with inhabitants and planters, that part of them were obliged to purchase lands near the river Patuxet, where they built two towns, Providence and Warwick; and the spot of Rhode-Island, with those two towns its dependencies, is at present amongst the most flourishing in all North America.

A college established.

FROM what has been said of those religious disputes, the governors of New England very reasonably thought that nothing could so effectually remove their causes, as the introduction of useful learning into their colony. This had been long foreseen, and so far back as the year 1630, a sum of money had been subscribed for founding a college there for the education of youth. But the sum being too small, and the Pequot war employing the attention of the public, the design lay long unexecuted, till the munificence of private benefactors, as well as of public bodies, now carried it into execution. A spot, about six miles from Boston, was pitched upon, and there a college, which goes by the name of its principal benefactor, Harward, was erected, which gives the town where it is situated the name of Cambridge.

Increase of the colony.

FEW of the places originally pitched upon for settlements in New England, were now able to contain or maintain their inhabitants, and frequent migrations happened. In 1640, the year we now treat of, the inhabitants of Lyn in Massachusetts purchased from the agents of the earl of Sterling, a great proprietary in those countries, the western part of Long Island. But, being there incommoded by the Dutch, they removed to the eastern part, where they built the town of Southampton; and, in imitation of the other settlements in New England, they formed themselves into a civil government. It is computed, that, about this time, the four colonies or settlements of New England contained above 4000 planters. Though all of them were under separate governments, yet a kind of a federal union subsisted amongst them; but they did not, till two years after, come into any certain plan of general government. In 1641, Massassoit, the son probably of old Massassoit, and his son Novanam, came to New Plymouth, which was now called simply Plymouth, and not only renewed the former league between his people and the English, but concluded with the latter a treaty offensive and defensive. This was a very wise measure on both sides: Massassoit thereby was taken into the protection of the English, and though they were then so powerful, that they could have brought 3000 armed men into the field, yet it was highly convenient for them to have savages to oppose savages, in case of being attacked. In the year 1642, the number of English capable to bear arms in New England were computed to be between 7 or 8000; by which it appears, how much the civil war improved that colony. No fewer than seventy-seven divines, expelled from England, settled in New England, besides sixteen students, who afterwards became ministers. Many of those, however, when the puritan and independent party got the upper hand in England, shewed that they had a regard for their interest, as well as their conscience, by leaving their flocks, and returning to Old England, where they met with places and preferments. At the time we now treat of, fifty towns and villages were planted, about forty ministers had houses, and public works of all kinds were erected at public expence. All this could not have been done, but through the almost incredible industry of the inhabitants, which had by this time rendered their country a near resemblance of England. Fields were hedged in, gardens, orchards, meadow, and pasture grounds were laid out, and all the improvements of husbandry took place, particularly the sowing of corn, and the feeding of cattle. As to the commercial part of the inhabitants, they shipped off vast quantities of fish for Portugal and the Straits, besides supplying other places, England particularly, Scotland and Ireland. They exported bread and beef to the sugar islands, with oil and lumber, or timber, of all kinds, some of which they sent to their mother-country; and, what is still more surprising, they carried on a great trade in ship-building, being plentifully furnished with materials both for themselves and others. It was about this time likewise, that Thomas Mayhew, Esq; purchased a patent for an island, which he called Martha's Vineyard, to the south east of Rhode-Island, with two other islands

a islands near it, called Nantucket and Elizabeth islands. Mahew took out this patent principally with a view of converting to christianity the natives of those islands. For this purpose he settled his son, who was of his own cast, in Martha's Vineyard; and both together gave themselves up entirely to the conversion of the Indians with great success, which is the less to be wondered at, as the converts were their own tenants, or rather their property. Maybew the son being drowned soon after, the father continued his evangelical labours, being assisted by his grandson, the third Maybew, who proved an able and a worthy minister. This spot, in a short time, became as flourishing as any in New England.

NEITHER their labours, however, nor those of the other christian ministers, could extirpate the barbarous usages of the natives, or reconcile their tribes to one another. b Miantonimo, king of the Narragansets, having failed in a design he had to assassinate Uncas, one of the kings of the Mohocks, declared war against him; but, though Uncas was far inferior in strength to his antagonists, he defeated him, took him prisoner, and cut off his head. The Narragansets were so exasperated at this, that, being more numerous than the others, they carried on the war with a resolution to exterminate Uncas' nation, who were therefore obliged to put themselves under the protection of the English. This was granted them, but on express condition that they should deliver up the sons of their new king, as hostages for their keeping the peace, and paying the expences of the war. Those savages are faithless oftener through indolence than design, and neglecting to perform their promise, the governor of Massachusetts ordered one captain Atherton to take a c small party of men, and to compel them. It is almost incredible with what ease Atherton performed this service; for such was the dread of the English power amongst those savages, that he marched to the wigwam or palace of Neriget, the Narraganset sachem, and without the smallest opposition from any of his subjects, he dragged him out by the hair of his head, and with a pistol at his breast compelled him to pay the money, and to deliver up the hostages.

It is certain, and indeed it appears from the accounts of the French themselves, that the French were very troublesome about this time; and that the French missionaries of Canada were extremely active in spiring up the more distant savages against the English colonists of New England. This put the latter upon a very wise expedient, for uniting d all the four governments into a political confederacy, yet each retaining the form and independency of its interior government. This project had been long in agitation, and, at last, on the seventh of September, 1643, the same was effected by an instrument under the following title, viz. "Articles of confederation, between the plantations under the government of the Massachusetts, the plantations under the government of Plymouth, the plantations under the government of Connecticut, and the plantations under the government of Newhaven, with the plantations in combination therewith." By those articles they declared that they all came into those parts of America with the same errand and aim, to advance the christian religion, and enjoy the liberty of their consciences with purity and peace; that two commissioners should annually be chosen, who should have full powers from e the general court of each settlement to meet at an appointed place to concert and conclude matters of general concernment, such as peace or war, and other affairs conducing to the general welfare of the confederacy. It is more than probable, that the plan of this excellent measure was taken from that of the government of the United Provinces. Their deputies sat as the states-general, but without the same inconveniences attending their constitution, because it was more simple, and under no controul but that of the four constituent bodies that appointed them; so that from this time we are to consider them under the common denomination of New England.

The French practices against the English.

By this time, the mother-colony of New Plymouth was overstocked with inhabitants, and its soil worn out, which put some of the principal inhabitants upon transporting themselves to a place called by the natives, from whom they purchased it, Namsset; and which f was every way proper for the purposes both of agriculture and commerce, the soil being rich for the one, and the situation convenient for the other, it lying near Cape Cod. Having removed hither with their best effects, they built the town of East-Ham, now lying in Barnstable county.

New Plymouth overstocked.

THE affairs of New England were then in so flourishing a situation, that, as has been the case with states of much greater importance, they grew wanton with prosperity, and the liberty they enjoyed threatened their ruin. They had nothing to apprehend from the savages, who were even useful to them in carrying on their affairs; and the French were at too great a distance to give them much disturbance. They split however amongst themselves; for the inhabitants of Hingham in Suffolk county, in a domestic contention, having broken the peace, Mr. Winthrop, the deputy-governor of the Massachusetts, committed the rioters to prison for refusing to give bond to appear at the quarter-sessions, and to answer for words spoken in defamation of the general court of the Massachusetts. This produced a petition from the inhabitants of the town, signed by seven of them; of whom g fix, fix, being cited to the court, appealed to the English parliament, and offered bail for standing to its award. This was a very dangerous precedent, and if admitted, must have ruined the public peace; especially, as they complained of many other grievances. The members of the general court were sensible of this, and fined and imprisoned the petitioners, whose chief complaints were levelled against the deputy-governor Winthrop. The general court, however, with a right republican spirit, commanded Winthrop to descend from his dignity on the bench, to clear his conduct at the bar, which he most magnanimously did to the admiration and satisfaction of all present, and a severer fine was added to the punishment of the offenders. Mr. Winthrop, having resumed his seat upon the bench, made the following speech, which is equal to any thing of antiquity, whether we consider it as coming from a philosopher or a magistrate.

“GENTLEMEN,

his being ac-

“I will not look back to the past proceedings of this court, nor to the persons therein concerned; I am satisfied that I was publickly accused, and that I am now publickly acquitted; but give me leave to say something on this occasion, that may rectify the opinion of the people, from whom these distempers of the state have arisen. The questions that have troubled the country of late have been about the authority of the magistrate, and the liberty of the people. Magistracy is certainly an appointment of God, and I entreat you to consider that you chose them from among yourselves, and that they are men, subject to the like passions with yourselves. We take an oath to govern you according to God’s laws and our own, to the best of our skill; if we commit errors, not willingly, but for want of skill, you ought to bear with us; nor would I have you mistake your own liberty. Their is a liberty in doing what we list, without regard to law or justice: this liberty is indeed inconsistent with authority; but civil, moral, federal liberty consists in every one’s enjoying his property, and having the benefit of the laws of his country; this is what you ought to contend for, with the hazard of your lives; but this is very consistent with a due subjection to the civil magistrate, and the paying him that respect that his character in common requires.”

THIS noble speech was of equal benefit to the reputation of Mr. Winthrop, and the peace of the colony. It settled him firmly in the esteem and the affections of the people, and the general court; and by his well-timed condescension, he became more powerful than ever. New England then was in a perfect state of tranquility, and we are to make use of this interval to shew how well it was improved for the great end of the colonists converting the Indians, by which a civil as well as a religious end was obtained, as by their conversion they were rendered useful members to society. The reverend Mr. John Elliot, whom we have already named, was the first of the English missionaries who ventured into the countries of the savages to preach the gospel. For this purpose, he applied himself to one of the most discouraging studies, that of learning, their language. In other respects, he was extremely proper for the labours of a mission. He had been educated at Cambridge, where he had acquired a considerable stock of learning, and coming over to New England, he was settled at Roxbury, where he continued minister for about sixty years, and became so great a proficient in the Indian language, that he published a grammar of it. In October, 1646, he set out on his mission, but sent forerunners to apprise the Indians of his intention. Upon this he was met upon the borders of the country he intended to convert by five or six of the savages, headed by a grave Indian, one Waubon, who welcomed him; and, ushering him into a large wigwam, he there began to preach and instruct his new disciples. According to his representation of their questions, arising from his religious discourses, they were not void either of quickness or docility, and, in a short time, several hundreds were converted. The civil government of New England wisely seconded the apostolical labours of this reverend person. They furnished him with all kinds of tools for agriculture, and with money to encourage the natives to labour, which he distributed amongst his converts; so that in a short time, they built a town upon a spot assigned them by the colony. The great difficulty of this undertaking was to break the natives of their idle habits, and to conquer their indolence; in which the missionary and his associates (for he had several) succeeded to admiration, though they never could bring them to go through the laborious works so well as an Englishman. They laboured, however, with great assiduity, women as well as men, after they came to taste the profits of their toil; and, at last, they agreed to the following laws, which will give the reader a lively idea of their manners. “1. If any man be idle a week, or at most, a fortnight, he shall pay five shillings. 2. If any unmarried man shall lie with a woman unmarried, he shall pay twenty shillings. 3. If any man shall beat his wife, his hands shall be tied behind him, and he shall be carried to the place of justice, to be severely punished. 4. Every young man, if not another’s servant, and if unmarried, shall be compelled to set up a wigwam, and plant for himself, and not shift up and

THEIR compliance with christianity, and the above institutions, wrought so surprising a change for the better upon those converts, that the Indians, about the town of Concord, longed to be converted likewise. Mr. Elliot, at their request, visited them; and a spot of ground was assigned them for building a town. As the Indians have different vices or superstitions in every tribe; Mr. Elliot prevailed upon those converts to abolish the powwow, or conjurings of their priests, which were most infamous impositions: b Drunkenness was punished by a fine of twenty shillings. A thief was to restore four fold. Twenty shillings was the penalty for profaning the sabbath, and for fornication; but the woman for the last named crime was to pay only ten shillings; the man who beat his wife was to pay twenty shillings; and murder and adultery were made capital crimes. They likewise agreed to lay aside their savage customs of greasing their hair, howling, and the like, and to conform themselves to the English dress and behaviour, to say prayers and grace before and after meat. Several English gentlemen and divines in the neighbourhood, undertook to enforce the execution of those laws, and the new converts had cloaths distributed amongst them.

THIS rapid progress of christianity alarmed the Indian sachems, who complained that c both their revenues and their authority were diminished since their subjects had turned christians. Even Uncas, the friendly sachem we have already mentioned, seeing his territory now quite surrounded with the English, became apprehensive that their government would issue orders for his and his courtiers praying in their wigwams, and therefore he came into the general court of Connecticut, and there entered a formal protest against any such proceeding. Cutshamequin, another sachem, stood very high upon his prerogative, and prohibited all his christian subjects building any town in his territories; "because," said he to Mr. Elliot, my praying subjects do not pay me tribute as formerly." Upon enquiry, however, it was found, that what his majesty said was not strictly true; and that d he had received the same revenues as before, only, being a despotic tyrant, he was not, so much as formerly, master of the lives and fortunes of his subjects. His complaints met with so much regard, that Mr. Elliot was chosen umpire between him and his people who enumerated thirty-two bushels of corn, fifteen deer, the discharging a debt he owed of 3 l. 10 s. and a beaver skin worth forty shillings, they had given him, besides building and enclosing his wigwam and several days work. They added that they would even do more, if he would govern them justly, and turn christian. Cutshamoquin, like other tyrants, could not bear with his subjects remonstrances, and their liberty of speech, and therefore left the assembly with high indignation; but, when he grew cool, he turned christian himself, as being the most ready means of encreasing his revenue.

BUT, notwithstanding the opposition those conversions met with, the converts multiplied e so greatly, that the praying christians, for so they were called, built a large town near Charles river, in the middle of the Massachusetts; and was the best Indian town, that had ever been seen either in the French or the English settlements of North America. It consisted of three long streets, (one of them on the other side of the river, but joined by a wooden bridge) and a large house built after the English manner, which served for a church, a school-room, a store-house, and a lodging for Mr. Elliot. This Indian town soon increased in bulk and populousness, and the natives called it Natick. Mr. Elliot's missionary labours grew so much upon his hands, that he was obliged to take for his pupil an ingenious Indian, whose name was Menequesson, whom he made his schoolmaster at Natick. It is to the honour of Mr. Elliot that we mention, he was so zealous and so f disinterested a missionary, that he translated several tracts; and, at last, the bible itself, into the Indian language, which was afterwards printed. In other parts of this great colony, (for such it now was) other ministers were equally zealous; and Mr. Mayhew, particularly, converted an Indian called Hiaccomes, who, with his son, turned preacher, and were extremely useful to them. Other English ministers, after Mr. Elliot's example, learned the Indian language; and, in a short time, no fewer than eleven Indian christian settlements, with churches and schools were formed and all of them but three supplied with Indian pastors and school-masters; nay, in some of the most populous; particularly, near East Ham, they had Indian justices of the peace. All this success was owing to the good usage those savages met with; for the remains of the Pequots, the Narragansets, and the Mchegins, who had been severely handled by the English, were still irreconcilable to christianity, notwithstanding the indefatigable labours of Mr. Mayhew.

It is not to be dissembled, that, however exemplary the lives of the English colonists might be at this time, the unconverted Indians, seeing them in possession of so great a g part of the country, and still acquiring more, had but a very indifferent opinion of their justice, and their goodness of heart. This appears by an excellent repartee given to Mr. Mayhew, who, wanting to convert a sachem, the latter bid him "go, and make the English good first." By this time, a society for propagating the gospel was formed in New England, and it was reckoned that about 5000 Indian converts, who were supposed to have been the fourth part of all the remaining natives, were made in that province. This very noble institution was confirmed in 1649, by the parliament of England, who then passed an act to encourage the propagating the gospel amongst the Indians in New England. In consequence of this act, a corporation was established in England, consisting of a president, a treasurer, and fourteen assistants, with power to receive and disburse money for those pious purposes; and so popular were the interests of New England at that time, that the money contributed in one year in Old England enabled the society to purchase estates to the yearly value of 600 l. But this subject has carried us a little beyond our time.

Conspiracy against the English.

In 1647, the French found means to engage in their interests some of the outlying Indians; and Sequassan, a sachem near Newhaven, undertook to murder the English magistrates there. The Narragansets and Mobegins likewise shewed dispositions for renewing the war against Uncas, but were over-awed by the English, who, at the same time, obliged them to give satisfaction for some murders and depredations they had committed near Rhode Island. The year 1648 was remarkable for nothing, but the New England churches agreeing to the confession of faith published by the assembly of divines at Westminster, and for modelling their ecclesiastical discipline. But, at this time, the inhabitants of New England were in so great security from their Indian enemies, that they gave way to the most inhuman persecutions of one another. Till then in England, all were blended under the denomination of puritans, which signified dissenters of all kinds from the established church. But when they came to have an established church, under the protection of the civil government, which was the case when the parliament and Oliver Cromwell ruled in England, their different sects shewed themselves; and the ruling party, the presbyterians, shewed no more mercy to the baptists and the quakers, than Laud and his party had shewed to themselves. At a place called Rehobeth, in the Plymouth colony, this persecution first broke out, and six or seven of the baptists, who had separated from their presbyterian brethren, were severely whipped, fined, and imprisoned, excepting such whose friends, unknown to themselves, bought their whipping off, to the great mortification of the parties, who were ambitious of suffering in their persons. Some years after, viz. in 1656, this spirit of persecution broke out still more bitterly against the quakers, many of whom had come from Barbadoes to New England, where the magistrates first were contented with ordering them to be re-shipped for that island. In the mean while, it was enacted, that every master of a ship bringing thither a quaker, or quakers should forfeit 100 l. That all quakers, landing in New England should be sent to the house of correction, there to be severely whipped, and held to hard labour, and none to speak to them; and that 5 l. should be the penalty for dispersing any of their books or pamphlets. Several sanguinary punishments were accordingly inflicted upon those deluded wretches; but these not being thought sufficiently severe, the following inhuman laws were added to the former. "If a quaker, for the first offence, that is, coming to New England, after having been banished, if a man, to have one of his ears cut and be kept to hard work in the house of correction, till he could be shipped off at his own charges. For the second offence, to lose the other ear, and be kept in the house of correction. If a woman, to be severely whipped and kept as aforesaid. For the third offence, man or woman, to have their tongues bored through with a hot iron, and then to be kept in the house of correction, till they can be shipped off at their own charges."

Their enthusiasm.

Those laws were productive of still greater mutilations and whippings; and Mr. Bradford, who had been governor of New Plymouth colony for about thirty-seven years, dying, he was succeeded by Thomas Prince, Esq; as was Mr. Eaton, the original governor of Newhaven colony, by Francis Newman, Esq. The severities against the quakers, instead of deterring them, seemed to invite them into New England; where, at last, the magistrates, ministers, and elders, made a law for shipping them off, and prohibiting their return under pain of death. It was with great difficulty carried, that the delinquents in such cases should have the benefit of a jury. It happened, to the disgrace of the English planters, that Endicot, the governor, was himself an enthusiast, and consequently a persecutor; and four quakers, one of whom was a woman, were actually hanged for returning from transportation. Upon the restoration, the colony sent over Bradstreet, their secretary, and Norton, a minister, with their congratulations to Charles II. who received them civilly; but, upon their return, they were upbraided, particularly Norton, for having laid the foundation for the colony's ruin. Some time after, secretary Morrice, who was himself a himself a presbyterian, by command of his master, Charles II. sent over an order for the government of New England to stop all proceedings against quakers, which was obeyed, only, so far as related to capital punishment.

ABOUT this time, the two sons of Massasoit, the deceased Indian prince, came to the general court at New Plymouth, and desired, without receiving baptism, to have christian names given them; upon which they received those of Alexander and Philip. It soon appeared, that Alexander was exciting the Narragansets against the English, upon which Mr. Winslow, who was called major-general of the colony, and next in authority to the governor, was sent with ten men to bring him prisoner to Plymouth. Winslow accordingly surprized his majesty at one of his country-seats; and Alexander, with a pistol, at his breast, consented to the journey, but insisted to go as a king; upon which Winslow offered to give him a horse, but the king was too polite to ride, while his squaw, or wife, and his other women were to go on foot, and walked to New Plymouth, where he was very civilly received by governor Prince. The affront he had received, however, put his spirits into such an agitation that it threw him into a fever, of which he died.

Submission of the Indian princes.

His brother and successor, Philip, was young, spirited, and politic; and, finding himself, at his accession in no condition to maintain a war against the English, he came to Plymouth, where he renewed his family-alliances with the colony; and farther obliged himself, by an instrument drawn up for that purpose, neither to sell nor alienate any of his lands without their approbation; they, on their parts, engaging to give him all friendly assistance. The year 1662 was spent at Boston in ridiculous theological disputes; but, when the Bartholomew act took place, by which the dissenting clergy, who did not comply with the church of England, were turned out of their livings, New England received a fresh reinforcement of pastors; of whom the famous Dr. Owen would have been one, had he not received his majesty's positive commands to the contrary, after some of his goods had been put on board.

History of king Philip.

THE hands of the government of New England being now tied up from putting the quakers to death, the spirit of persecution broke out again, in a manner disgraceful, not only to that colony, but to human nature and reason, by burning innocent people for witches. One Mrs. Greenwich, at Hertford, was hanged for having lain with the devil. This execution was scarcely over, when the magistrates of Connecticut began to reflect that they had really no title, in any case, to inflict capital punishments; and the colony of Newhaven perceived itself to be in the same situation. Upon this, John Winthrop, Esq; son to the late governor of the Massachusetts, was employed by those two colonies to solicit for them, at the court of England, a charter for uniting them into one body corporate. Winthrop, who on his own, as well as his father's account, was greatly respected by the government, succeeded in his solicitations, and was the first governor of the united colonies, continuing so till his death. The earl of Clarendon, a wise and a moderate minister, was then at the head of affairs in England, and did all he could to mitigate his majesty's passion for enlarging his prerogative. It is not to be denied, that the people of New England, in general, had, for the reasons we have already seen, always affected an independency upon their mother country; especially when it was governed by the princes of the house of Stuart. We have already mentioned the estates, bought by the corporation for propagating the gospel in New England; and part of them having been purchased from colonel Bedingfield, a papist and a royalist, he, upon the restoration, re-entered upon the possession of them; but he was obliged to quit it by the lord chancellor Clarendon. His lordship, at the same time, upon the application of the reverend Mr. Baxter, and alderman Ashurst, procured a new charter to the corporation, by which the members therein nominated, and their successors for ever, were to be a society for the propagation of the gospel in New England. At the head of this new society stood the following illustrious names, Edward, earl of Clarendon, lord chancellor; Thomas, earl of Southampton, lord treasurer; John, lord Roberts, lord privy-seal; George, duke of Albemarle; James, duke of Ormond; Edward, earl of Manchester, lord chambelain; Arthur, earl of Anglesey; William, viscount Say and Seal. Besides those noblemen, the celebrated Robert Boyle, Esq; several knights and baronets, three aldermen of London, and many other gentlemen of great distinction and learning, were of this society; while Mr. Boyle promoted it with great zeal, and, at the expence of his private fortune, was chosen to be its first governor. The members were empowered to appoint corresponding members in New England, and its borders; to which their powers were limited.

Institution of the society for propagating the gospel.

g UPON the breaking out of the Dutch war, his majesty, who seemed still to have been uneasy about the constitution of New England, made a grant to the duke of York of all the lands possessed by the Dutch on both sides of Hudson's Bay, and a squadron of ships, with land forces, were sent to drive them away, under the command of Sir Robert Car, and colonel Nicholls. That service being performed, the two commanders, with other two commissioners, Cartwright and Maverick, were ordered to repair to New England, there to decide all controverted points amongst the colonies. Arriving there, they presented to the governor and council of New Plymouth a letter from his majesty, in which he promises to preserve all their liberties and privileges both ecclesiastical and civil, without the least violation. "This, (continued his majesty) we presume will dispose you to manifest by all your ways in your power, loyalty, and affection to us, that all the world may know, that you look upon yourselves as being as much our subjects, and living under the same obedience to us, as if you continued in your natural country." Though those expressions from a king of England to one of his colonies were justifiable, yet the presence of the commissioners, we are given to understand, was very unacceptable at New Plymouth. Soon after this, upon some extraordinary, but natural, appearances in the air, the magistrates, who seem to have been as much superstition-struck as the lowest of their people, wrote circular letters to the ministers and elders of every town to promote the reformation of manners, as if some very dreadful event had been at hand. The only thing of that kind, however, that happened was a renewal of their own persecutions of the baptists and the quakers, whom they now ruined by banishments, fines, and imprisonments. This produced an interposition from the heads of the presbyterian clergy in England, for a mitigation of the sufferings of the baptists, addressed to John Leverett, Esq; governor of the Massachusetts. At the same time, the chief of the London quakers obtained a like letter, signed by eleven of the most eminent dissenting divines, in favour of their brethren, but all was to little or no purpose.

The Philippic war.

WHILE the government of New England was thus, out of zeal for christianity, exercising a most unchristian spirit, Philip, king of the Wampanoags, the same we have already mentioned, mindful of his brother's disgrace, was meditating a most severe revenge against the English; and conducted himself with as much policy and courage as his namesake of Macedon could have done, had he been in like circumstances. According to Charlevoix^c, in the year 1673, there was no dispute in America between the courts of France and England; but it appears from him, at the same time, that this was owing to the tameness of the court of England, which was persuaded by the French to order its subjects to leave the fine settlements they had upon the banks of the river Kennebek, which they accordingly did, and retired to New England; which now far exceeding the French boasted colony at Quebec in populousness, strength, riches, commerce, and every circumstance that could render the lives of the colonists secure and agreeable. The French, therefore, considered Boston as the Carthage, that was, at any rate to be demolished; and early entered into secret connexions with king Philip. He saw they were not then in a condition to assist him; and, though he was a complete master of dissimulation, the English at New Plymouth began to suspect his intentions, and ordered him to repair to Taunton. Philip obeyed, and not only confirmed his former treaty with that government, but consented to pay 100*l.* for damages done by himself and his subjects; and, to shew that he was a vassal to the colony of New Plymouth, he agreed to send them every year by way of tenure five wolves heads. If the colony demanded this, it was unjust, as they could have no such claim of superiority over a native and independent prince. If the submission was voluntary, it was impolitic in them to accept of it, as they must know that it was dissimbled. Upon the whole, it appears but too plain, that those colonists now thinking themselves invincible, proceeded against Philip and his allies too haughtily, and unguardedly, and with too great a contempt of their power.

PHILIP had a secretary, one Sansaman, but whether he was his natural born subject does not appear, though he probably was. He was the son of a converted Indian, but growing up, he returned to the religion of his forefathers, from which he apostatized, and again turning christian and a preacher, he was sent upon the Wampanoag mission. Having in his heathenish state been secretary to Philip, such an apostle could not be a very agreeable guest in his dominions; and, as he was travelling the country, he was murdered by some of Philip's counsellors, at which we ought to be the less surprised, as we are told, that, during his mission, he held a correspondence with the English. The governor of New Plymouth, suspecting the truth, ordered the body to be taken out of its grave, and, the coroners inquest setting upon it, they brought in their verdict wilful murder; upon which one Tobias, one of Philip's counsellors, and his son, were upon the evidence of an Indian, and the ridiculous one of the body's bleeding at the touch of Tobias, tried by a jury, half English, half Indians, convicted and executed.

As the credibility of the history of New England at the time we treat of, depends originally upon the information of Mr. Cotton Mather, one of the weakest men that ever took a pen in his hand, but at the same time the very firebrand of persecution; and as Mr. Neal, a much more sober writer, was obliged to follow him in his facts, we are therefore Difficulties of history.

- a to be cautious, and to judge from probabilities, as well as narratives. It is certain, that the love of lucre, and mutual jealousies amongst the French, English, and Dutch, who were settled in North America, had furnished the natives with fire-arms, of which they now knew the use; and being naturally better marksmen, and swifter of foot than the Europeans, they were dangerous enemies. All the advantages the English had in this respect was, that the converted Indians, who lived amongst them, continued faithful, and in every respect behaved like true Englishmen. About this time, some pirates ran away with a ship, after putting the master and some of his men on board the long-boat, and both parties happened to meet at the very same time in the port of Boston, upon which the pirates were seized, tried, and the ringleaders executed.
- b KING Philip's patience was by this time worn out, nor can we be surprized at it, considering the indignities he had suffered from the English. His first hostilities broke out near mount Hope, where he plundered an English plantation; but instead of giving satisfaction as usual to the governor of New Plymouth, who demanded it, his Indians murdered three Englishmen in the fields by day, and six others in the town of Swansey by night. This was in the year 1675, and the governor of New Plymouth immediately demanded from the confederate colonies their stipulated assistances. The Plymouth forces lay at Swansey, under captain Cudworth, and the Massachusetts colony detached captain Prentice, with a troop of horse, captain Henchman, with a company of foot, and captain Moseley, with another of volunteers, to join him. The Indians seldom or never could be brought to stand a pitched battle with the Europeans; and this junction being formed, they fled into the woods, upon which the English took possession of mount Hope, and ravaged their country. They then compelled the Narragansets to renounce their alliance with king Philip, and to enter into articles to assist the English against him, and all their other enemies; and, by way of encouragement, they were promised two coats for every living, and one for every dead Wampanoag, and twenty good coats for Philip's head. How far this reward for the life of a sovereign prince was agreeable to justice or the law of nations may be justly doubted, especially as it did not then judicially appear that he authorized the barbarities that had been committed by his subjects. In the mean while, captain Cudworth marched to prevent the Pocassets, another Indian tribe, from joining with Philip; but he found that they had already taken arms, and he was too weak to reduce them.
- d PHILIP knew perfectly well how to avail himself of the Indian manner of fighting, which was by ambuscades and surprizes. The English officers, on the other hand, finding their enemies fled, scoured the country with little or no precaution, and were often overreached by the stratagems of the barbarians. The head quarters of the English were then at Taunton, from whence they broke up, upon advice that Philip was in a swamp, lying on a spot called Pocasset Neck, between Rhode-Island and Monument Bay, about eighteen miles distant from Taunton. Thither they marched, but, after losing some men, they found themselves obliged to turn their attack into a blockade, which they formed with two hundred men, in hopes of starving out Philip, or obliging him to surrender. This service was performed by the English with neither courage nor conduct, for Philip in the mean time crossed the river on a raft, and made his escape into the country of the Nipmucks; one hundred of his men, however, were made prisoners. The Nipmucks were Indians lying between Connecticut and New York, and had already made such devastations in Suffolk county, as had obliged the English to draw off great part of their troops from their expedition against Philip to suppress them. At first, the English endeavoured to detach them by a treaty from Philip's interest; but they no sooner heard of that prince's arrival in their country, than they fired upon captain Hutchinson, one of the two officers sent to negotiate with them, killed some of his men, and obliged the rest to fly. Philip, who was by this time very strong, pursued them, and drove them, to the number of about seventy, into a house, where they must probably have been taken or burnt, had they not been relieved by major Willard, another English officer, who, at the head of no more than fifty men, surprized the Indians in the night-time, killed eighty of them, and obliged Philip in his turn to retreat, which he did towards the Nipmuck country. By this time the Connecticut forces had taken the field under major Treat, who was directed to observe Philip's motions. A proof of that prince's great abilities, we will not say virtues, arises from his inspiring all the savages in those parts with a passion for recovering their native independence and country. When the English demanded hostages from the savages on the borders of the Nipmuck country, instead of obeying, they were so attached to Philip, that they cut in pieces their own king for listening to the proposition, and marched to join Philip. They were pursued by the captains Lathrop and Beers, who killed twenty-six of them with the loss of ten of their own men. The rest joined Philip. All the out-settlements of the colonists of New England were now ravaged by the natives, whom Philip had every-where roused into arms; but the Connecticut colony suffered the most. The inhabitants of Deerfield, field, an inland town, after seeing their plantations destroyed and burnt, shut themselves up in a slight fortification, where they defended themselves. Captain Bears was sent at the head of thirty-six men, but he was met by the savages, who put to the sword himself and ten of his soldiers, and obliged the rest to fly to Hadley. Major Treat, at the head of a larger detachment, had better fortune, for he brought off the besieged, but they were in danger of starving, having left their corn behind them. Captain Lathrop, on September the 15th, went at the head of a large detachment, consisting almost of the whole force of Essex county, with carts to fetch it off; but he was surrounded by the Indians, and, endeavouring to fight them in their own manner, he himself and seventy of his men were shot dead, through the superior dexterity of the Indians in managing their fire-arms. This was the greatest loss of men the New England colonies had ever sustained at one time, nor was it repaired by captain Moseley, who, though he came too late to save his countrymen, killed above one hundred of the Indians, losing but two of his own men.

Defeats of the English.

Narragantset
war.

LATHROP's defeat encouraged the savages upon Connecticut river to declare for Philip; and the hostages they had given for the preservation of the peace had the address to make their escape. Springfield, a town lying on that river, was the first object of their fury. There they burnt down thirty-two houses, and would have massacred all the inhabitants, had they not been put upon their guard by Toto, a faithful Indian, and retired into the strongest places of the town, which they defended till they were relieved by a detachment under captain Appleton. It is probable, however, that all Hampshire must have been destroyed, had not the government ordered the Connecticut forces to cover its frontiers, especially the towns of Hadley, Northampton, and Hatfield; all of them lying upon or near Connecticut river. This was done with so much secrecy, that an army of eight hundred Indians fell upon Hatfield; but being repulsed with great loss, they retreated to the country of the Narragantsets, whom the commissioners for the associated colonies voted to be enemies to the English for sheltering them. Though it was now far in the winter, the necessity of chastising the Narragantsets was so great, that Mr. Winslow, the governor of New Plymouth, put himself at the head of a hundred men, and having for his guide one Peter, a Narragantset renegade, about the beginning of September, he carried fire and sword into their country, and burnt a hundred and fifty of their wigwams, and killed or took prisoners about a dozen of their inhabitants. But the operations of this winter campaign soon assumed a new face. The enemy still continued their ravages and murders, particularly about Petequamset; and Winslow understood from Peter, that the whole flower of the enemy's force was shut up in a fort, the most regular that had ever been raised by the Indians, built upon a kind of an island, accessible only one way. Winslow, being joined by a hundred and fifty Mobegins, bravely resolved to lose no time, but instantly to attack this fort. The officers under him were the captains Moseley and Davenport, who led the van; Gardner and Johnson, who were in the center; and major Appleton and captain Oliver, who brought up the rear of the Massachusetts forces: by which it is probable that Winslow had been considerably reinforced by the English. He himself as general, with his New Plymouth men, commanded in the center, and major Treat, with the captains Gallop, Mason, Senly, and Willis, served with the Connecticut forces in the rear. All of them were under the direction of Peter, who conducted them through the swamp to a breach, but of what kind we are not informed, which was attacked and defended with equal obstinacy and resolution. The fire of the savages was steady, and no fewer than six brave English captains, Davenport, Gardner, Johnson, Gallop, Senly, and Marshall, were killed in the attack. The English soldiers, exasperated that so many of their gallant officers should fall by the hands of barbarians whom they used to despise, at last carried their point. The enemy was beaten from post to post into a cedar swamp at some distance. Their fort was burnt down; the fortifications were levelled; seven hundred of the savages with arms in their hands were put to the sword, amongst whom were twenty of their chief captains; three hundred, besides, died of their wounds; and a great number of defenceless men, women, and children, who had taken refuge in the fort, believing it to be impregnable, perished either by the sword or in the flames. The loss of the English, besides the six captains, was eighty-five men killed, and a hundred and fifty men wounded. This attack, which, in modern times, would be but just mentioned in the course of a campaign, forms a principal æra of the New England history, and was the most important action that ever had happened in North America. It was plain from it that the savages had been disciplined, and the construction of the fort had in it a strength and regularity, to which those barbarians were utter strangers before they were instructed by the French.

Treachery of the French.

COUNT de Frontenac, whom Charlevoix himself^b allows to have been a violent, haughty, suspicious man, was then governor of New France; and having a mortal antipathy to the a English Americans, he both openly and secretly supported the insurrection; or, if the reader will, rebellion, of the savages against the New England colonists. If we are to believe our New England historians, he, this winter, sent a detachment from Canada, who acted in concert with the barbarians, and threatened the very extinction of the Massachusetts colony. They burnt down the town of Mendham, and carried off all the live stock of the inhabitants; whose farms were generally as well stocked as those in England. They plundered or burnt the town of Lancaster, and carried forty-two persons into captivity. Marlborough, Sudbury, Chelmsford, and Medfield, where they killed twenty English, underwent the same fate; and they spread their ravages within a few miles of the gates of Boston.

The successes of the barbarians seem to be owing to two causes. The first was that the English colonists were so intent upon protecting their private properties, that they split their strength into too many subdivisions; while the French had taught the barbarians to march in a body, to move quickly from place to place, and to mind no other object, but the spreading around them as much desolation as possible. This second cause is assigned by Mr. Neal, who informs us that the cold of this winter was so extremely intense, that the English durst hardly look out of their quarters. Notwithstanding those two reasons, something still seems to have been wanting on the part of the English, who, while pursuing their enemies, left their own country exposed, and, before the campaign opened, had not taken proper precautions to defend themselves.

In the spring of 1677, a party of seventy English and one hundred Indians, under captain Dennison, slew seventy-six of the hostile Indians, and a party of the Connecticuts killed or taken prisoners about forty-four. Canenchet, son of Miantonimo, the chief sachem of the Narragansets, was amongst the prisoners. He was accused by the English of having concluded a peace with them at Boston six months before, and of having broken it as soon as he returned home. We are to observe, however, that his father, who was no friend to the English, was alive and possessed of the government. Be this as it will, the Indians delivered him into the hands of the Mobocks, and they cut off his head out of hatred to his father.

Success of the English.

PHILIP had commanded in the famous defence of the fort, and was one of them who had escaped to the swamp, from whence he went to the Maquas, one of the Mobock nations, to excite them to a war with the English. Finding that they were backward in answering his solicitations, he fell upon an expedient to induce them, which could be suggested only by a more than barbarous spirit of revenge; for, going into the woods, he murdered some of the Maquas with his own hands, and, returning in the utmost hurry, he informed the prince of the Maquas, that the English had invaded his lands, and were then butchering his people. Unfortunately for Philip, one of the savages happened only to be severely wounded, and crawling home, he informed the sachem and his people of the truth, which turned against Philip all the rage they had conceived against the English; for their whole nation immediately declared for the colonists. Their alliance was, by giving a diversion to Philip, of infinite service to the English; for his Indians could now no longer march in large bodies; and though the inhabitants of Plymouth, Taunton, Chelmsford, Concord, Havenhill, Bradford, and Woburn were sometimes alarmed, they did not suffer much from the small numbers of the savages, who attacked them. Several, however, were killed, and some carried off; but two English boys, who made their escape, described a place towards the falls of Connecticut river, where a body of Indians were surprised by captain Turner, with one hundred and eighty men, who put a hundred of them to the sword, and drowned as many. He afterwards was killed in an ambush of the Indians, who had been driven from Bridgewater. In short, the fortune of the war now entirely inclined towards the English, who had profitted by their misfortunes; and, in a short time cut off about six hundred of the savages. Famine co-operated with the arms of the English; for those thoughtless barbarians had been so intent upon revenge, that they had neglected their harvest, and two hundred of them threw themselves upon the mercy of the colonists at New Plymouth; and all of them were pardoned but three, who, being convicted of atrocious crimes, were hanged. Philip still kept the field; but, being at the head of no more than two hundred savages, he could do nothing effectually, and returned to his old retreat at Mount Hope, where his chief employment was to plan ambushes against the English. Major Bradford, with a party of English, happily escaped one of them; and marching into the country of the Taconets, obliged the queen of that country, with her whole army, which consisted of ninety men, to receive the English yoke. About the end of July, a sachem or sagamore of the Nipmuck Indians, with one hundred and eighty of his men, submitted to the English, and delivered up Matoonas, the first savage, who, in that war, had appeared in arms against the English. We shall, once for all, observe, that the colonists seem to have acted, in all this war, upon principles that self-preservation alone could justify. If those Indians were the subjects of England, it was necessary for the colonists to have had legal powers from England for proceeding capitally against against their fellow subjects. If they were independent, it will perhaps be difficult to a assign a reason why they should be put to death, because, in the last case, they could only be prisoners of war. The colonists seem to have been somewhat apprised of their own doubtful situation; for, instead of putting Matoonas to death themselves, they ordered the Nipmuck segamore to shoot him dead, which he accordingly did; but the son was pardoned. A great many other skirmishes, but all of them, in general to the advantage of the English, happened about this time; and though they figure greatly in the New England history, are of very little consequence. As to Philip, all his arts could not keep up the spirit of his party when they met with ill success. One of his allies, the queen of Pocasset, as she is called, deserves particular mention. Being surprised by the English, she animated her men to hold out to the last; but they meanly deserted her, and b in endeavouring to escape upon a raft, she was drowned. Her body being found, the English, not knowing whose it was, cut off her head, and set it with others upon a pole at Taunton, where it was soon recognized by the Indians, and her obsequies were celebrated with howlings which testified the high esteem she held amongst her countrymen. Philip, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, continued the undaunted and irreconcilable enemy of Englishmen, and went so far as even to cut to pieces with his own hands an Indian, who had dared to mention proposals for a peace. One of his friends and counsellors, who probably was of a pacific disposition likewise, taking warning by the fate of his fellow-subjects, went to Rhod-Island, where he discovered to the English where Philip was, and the means by which he might be surprized. Captain Church upon this went with a c a small party, and found him with a few attendants in a swamp, which, by the description, is a place surrounded by fordable stagnated waters. Philip endeavoured to escape, but was singled out by an Englishman and an Indian. The Englishman's piece missed fire, but that of the Indian laid him dead. His body being taken up was quartered, and his head was carried in triumph to New Plymouth, where his skull is said to be seen at this day. Thus ended what is very properly called the Philippic war; and it is observed even by the New England historians, that the Indians to the eastward were an independent people, their country lying without the line of the charter of the Massachusetts. They continued the war, even after Philip's death, with some advantages, till the government of Boston interposed, and sent a body of men, who made four hundred Indians prisoners; d two hundred of whom were sold for slaves, and the rest, excepting a few who had been made examples of for having been guilty of murders, were sent home, on promise of behaving better for the future. In the relation of this war, we have purposely omitted many little skirmishes, that have been described with great minuteness by the New England historians; but they consist only of surprises of very small bodies, not proper to enter into a general history. After the death of king Philip, major Walderen was sent to make up matters with the sachem of Penobscot, in which he succeeded but indifferently; and, after all, when a kind of a general peace was concluded, the English were obliged to allow the Indians of the eastern parts a certain quantity of corn yearly, and to pay a small quit-rent for their lands, which they possessed, or e rather had usurped from them.

war.

Upon the whole, the English had no great reason to boast of the laurels they acquired by this war: It is said, that three hundred and forty of their countrymen had perished in it, and three thousand of the Indians. Notwithstanding this seeming disproportion, we are to observe, that the English, had they not been too much taken up by their interested pursuits of trade, were always in a condition to have brought into the field a body of men that might have driven the Indians from their own country, had they acted together. But besides the disadvantages we have already mentioned, some arose from the jealousies the colonies entertained of each other, which greatly retarded the public service; and, by their not pushing the war vigorously, the natives had many opportunities of learning the art of war, as the English often felt to their woful experience. Though the war was extinguished in one part of New England, yet it still continued in another, where the natives resented the gross affronts and impositions of the English; especially upon the borders of New Hampshire. Those savages had heard that the English were not invincible; and while the war was raging in the west, they fell upon the plantations in the east, where they murdered all the English they met, while the latter made severe reprisals. The government of Boston, though sufficiently employed in the war with king Philip, sent a body of men under captain Hawthorn to the relief of their eastern colonists; and they surprized four hundred Indians as they were plundering major Walderen's house, and made them all prisoners. Half of them were sold for slaves, the other half, g excepting a few, who were executed for atrocious crimes, were dismissed on promise of a more pacific behaviour. This, in fact, finished the war, which gave occasion for many serious reflections to the English. They found the vast inconvenience of their having no strong places to defend themselves against the flying attacks of the Indians, f a Indians, and therefore they set themselves to build them at Scarborough, Falmouth, York, Dover, and other parts. The war had occasioned a neglect of agriculture, and an uncommon profligacy of manners among the people; and, therefore, in the year 1679, a true presbyterian synod, in which lay-members were admitted to vote, was held at Boston for the reformation of manners.

ABOUT this time, the province of New England in general met with three severe blows, in the deaths of Mr. Winthrop, the governor of Connecticut and Newhaven; Mr. Leveret, the governor of the Massachusetts; and Mr. Winslow, the governor of New Plymouth colony: all of them gentlemen of great experience and honest intentions. The first was succeeded by William Leet, Esq; the second by Simon Bradstreet, Esq; and the third by Robert Treat, Esq; but Charles II. towards the end of his reign, getting the better of his parliament, the province of New England underwent a most severe persecution. A Quo Warranto was brought against the New Plymouth colony, and judgment entered up in chancery. The Massachusetts colony in the years 1683 and 1684, had pretty much the same fate; but when the Quo Warranto was sent against Connecticut and Newhaven, their governments were given to understand, by a letter from the king, that if they quietly resigned their charter, they might have it in their option to be associated either under New York or Boston. Finding their fate inevitable, they wisely chose the latter. Rhode Island, whose charter is said to have been very valuable, gave it up without a struggle; and New Hampshire and Maine resigned, into the hands of the crown, the association under which they were constituted; since which time their governor and council have been named by the king, but their governor has generally been the same with that of the Massachusetts. Henry Cranfield, Esq; was the first governor under this new regulation, and, on his arrival in New England, he turned out Mr. Bradstreet, Mr. Leet, and Mr. Treat. Cranfield was turned out of his government upon the death of Charles II. and succeeded by Thomas Dudley, Esq; a New England man. This governor endeavoured to support himself in favour of the court, by favouring the church of England against the presbyterians, which so provoked the New England men, that, by a very uncommon strain of liberty, they deposed and sent him prisoner to Old England.

SIR Edmund Andros, who is said to have been a poor knight of Guernsey, came over to be governor of New England just at the time the people had resumed their charter government. It was likewise about the same time that captain William Phipps, a New England man, made his fortune in the following extraordinary manner. Understanding that about the year 1640, a large Spanish galleon had been lost near Port de la Plata, he applied to the court of England for liberty and assistance to fish up her treasure. Charles II. gave him a small frigate of eighteen guns, and ninety-five men, with which he sailed to Hispaniola, and continued diving, but without success so long, that his men were quite tired out, and he was obliged to give up the enterprize. The duke of Albermarle, son to the restorer duke, being in desperate circumstances, adopted the desperate undertaking of Phipps, who proposed to divide the contingent prize money into a number of shares; each proportioned to the share of expence advanced by the adventurer. A ship of about two hundred tons was bought, with which Phipps set sail to the old spot of exploration; but after various most tedious attempts by a canoe and a tender, on board of which were divers of all kinds, he was about to have entirely given over the enterprize, when the wreck was discovered; and so industriously did they work, that in a few days, no less than thirty-two tons of silver was brought up, with an immense treasure in gold, pearls, diamonds, and rich commodities. It is said, that the whole, when brought by Phipps to England, amounted to 300,000*l.* of which 90,000 came to the share of the duke of Albermarle; and 20,000 to that of Phipps, who was knighted by king James II. This adventure, in a reign less unpopular than that of king James, must have made a figure in history, whereas it now scarcely mentioned.

A L N G calm in the affairs of New England succeeded, and continued to the time of the revolution, when the Indians began to complain of the little attention that was paid to the treaty by which they were to have an allowance of corn. They complained, at the same time, of their being interrupted in their fishery upon Saco river; that their fields were trespassed upon by the English cattle, and that the government of Boston had given away their lands. The truth is, the English planters of New England, about this time, were a little too free with the natives, as well as with the French. They took upon themselves to affix new boundaries to their jurisdiction, by which they seized a great deal of French property; particularly some belonging to one St. Casten. The French ambassador had procured an order from the English court, for restoring Casten's goods, and particularly, a parcel of wine, which the English had arbitrarily seized; but no regard seems to have been paid to it. It is probable, that the people of New England, by this time, began to suspect that king James's government in Old England would be but short-lived; and they had conceived at once a contempt and an aversion for their governor Andros. Casteen was himself an almost naturalized Indian, having married the daughter of a sachem or segamore; and, therefore, in the bad humour the natives were, he had no great difficulty in persuading them to enter upon hostilities. They accordingly killed some English cattle, whom they pretended to be trespassers upon their grounds, and one Blackman, a busy justice of the peace, seized eighteen or twenty of the offenders, and sent them under a strong guard to Falmouth. This produced reprisals on the part of the Indians, who seized some English, particularly the captains Rowden and Gendal; the former of whom died in their hands. It would have been easy for the English, by making proper concessions, to have brought the Indians to reason; but the latter were dissuaded by the French, and killed several of the inhabitants of New Yarmouth, which obliged the other to take shelter in their fortifications. Andros was then at New York; but, upon his return to Boston, he disapproved of Blackman's conduct, and ordered all the Indian prisoners in the hands of the English to be released, without insisting upon any equivalent. The savages considered this pusillanimous conduct, as proceeding from weakness, and captain Gendall, whom they had released, being sent with a party to New Yarmouth, was attacked by them; but most of his men, whom they had taken prisoners, were afterwards recovered. In the mean while, the Indians murdered two English families near Kennecobec, and all the frontiers were filled with blood and devastations.

Andros takes the field.

ANDROS put himself at the head of 1000 men, and marched towards the frontiers in the very depth of winter, but without the smallest success, and he is accused by the New England historians, not only of neglecting the colony, but of persecuting those who stood up for its defence, and even of corresponding with the French in Canada, and of setting the Indians, who had been guilty of murder, at liberty. The truth is, the government of New England, at this time, was in a most deplorable condition. Mr. Dummer writes, that the governor, with four or five strangers of his council, men of desperate fortunes, and bad, if any, principles, made what laws, and levied what taxes they pleased on the people. They, without an assembly, raised a penny in the pound on all estates in the country, and two pence on all imported goods, besides twenty pence per head, as poll-money, and immoderate excise on wine, rum, and other liquors. Several worthy persons having, in an humble address, represented this proceeding as a grievance, were committed to the county-jail for a high misdemeanor; denied the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act; tried out of their own county; fined exorbitantly, obliged to pay 160 l. for fees, when the prosecution would hardly have cost them so many shillings in Great Britain, where prosecutions are so managed by lawyers, as to make them equally terrible and ruinous; and to complete the oppression, when they, upon their trial, claimed the privileges of Englishmen, they were scoffingly told, "these things would not follow them to the ends of the earth."

History of Sir William Phipps.

THE reader will not be surprized at those acts of tyranny, when he reflects how very reverse the principles of king James's government were to that of New England, which was founded on liberty, and had all along supported itself by a determined resistance to arbitrary power. Sir William Phipps was then in England, and, being a kind of favourite with king James, he took the freedom to remonstrate against the behaviour of Andros and his counsellors, and to solicit the king to restore his countrymen to their charter government; but his majesty's usual reply on that head was; "Any thing but that Sir William." King James, however, created a new kind of post for Sir William; for he made him by patent sheriff of New England, which gave so much umbrage to Andros and his creatures, that they are said to have attempted to murder him. At last, the government of Andros growing quite intolerable, Mr. Increase Mather, rector of the college at Cambridge, with two other gentlemen, were sent over to England to complain of him to the king and council. The revolution was then in agitation, and news arriving at New England of the prince of Orange's landing, Andros not only imprisoned the bearer, but published a proclamation for preventing any one, commissioned by the prince, from landing on the province. Those violences introduced a suspicion, that Andros and his creatures intended to massacre the inhabitants, and it was artfully kept up, to give the people an opportunity of confederating together to do themselves justice upon their tyrants. On the 18th of April, 1689, proper dispositions being previously made, a report was spread at the north end of the town that the south end was in arms, and the like was spread of the north, in the south end. This report effected the thing; the governor's creatures, wherever they were found, were secured and thrown into jail. The principal inhabitants took possession of the council house, and the governor shutting himself up in the castle, they sent him the following letter.

^d Discourse addressed to lord Carteret, secretary of state.

a " SIR,

" Ourselves and many others the inhabitants of this town, and the places adjacent, being surpris'd with the people's sudden taking of arms, of the first motion whereof we were wholly ignorant; being driven by the present accident, are necessitated to acquaint your excellency, that for the quieting and securing the people inhabiting in this country from the imminent danger they many ways lie open and expos'd to, and tendering your own safety, we judge it necessary, that you forthwith surrender and deliver up the government and fortifications, to be preserv'd and dispos'd according to order and direction from the crown of England, which suddenly is expected may arrive; promising all security from violence to yourself, or any of your gentlemen, or soldiers, in persons or estate: otherwise we are assur'd they will endeavour the taking the fortification by storm, if any opposition be made. White Winthrop, Simon Bradstreet, William Stoughton, Samuel Shrimpton, Bartholomew Gidney, William Browne, Thomas Dansurth, John Richards, Elisha Cook, Isaac Addington, John Nelson, Adam Winthrop, Peter Sergeant, John Foster, David Waterhouse."

plac'd.

THIS letter was a sufficient intimation that the writers of it, who were the most respectable names in New England, were resolv'd to carry their point. Andros at first stood upon his defence, and sent for arms to a king's frigate then lying in the port. But they were intercepted by a party of the townsmen under John Nelson, Esq; who demanded the surrender of the fort; and the governor, finding he had no farther means of resistance, gave it up. The gentlemen then, with a true republican spirit, repaired to the council-chamber, from whence they read a declaration of their grievances to the people; about 3000 of whom were in arms. They then summoned a general assembly, consisting of the representatives of the united colonies; and on the 24th of May, by their own authority, they resum'd their charter government, which proceeding of theirs was approv'd of by king William and queen Mary, who confirm'd the restor'd magistrates in their power. Sir William Philips was in England at the time of the revolution; and king James offer'd him the government of New England: but he is said to have declined it, though he serv'd under that prince in other arbitrary proceedings.

Charter re-
stor'd.

THE revolution in England taking place, an open war ensu'd between the French and English in America, as well as in Europe. The French, who had been at great pains to win over the natives, endeavour'd to persuade them that the English, being rebels, were abandon'd by God and man; and promis'd to support them with all the power of the Quebec colony. Major Walderen then command'd in Quacheco, a frontier fort of great importance. He had entertain'd Mesandonit, a sachem, and had given him leave to lodge in the fort; but the barbarian in the morning unbarred the gates, and admitted a party of the savages, who had been ambusht at a little distance, and who, rushing in, kill'd the major, and about twenty-two men, burnt several houses, and led off twenty nine English prisoners, besides committing other acts of murder and violence. Captain Noyes was order'd to march with a party to Penecook; but the savages had retir'd from those quarters before he could come up to them. He had, however, the satisfaction of laying waste their country, and destroying their wigwams. The savages, afterwards, surpris'd Pemiquid fort, and kill'd fourteen Englishmen; they likewise broke the capitulation upon which the fort surrender'd, by butchering the garrison, and some troops who were advancing to its relief; upon which the inhabitants of Sheepscot and Kennebek retir'd to Falmouth.

The continuance of the war with France:

IN the time of the last Indian war, the New England men were fully convinc'd of their error in acting by small detachments; and, now seeing that the French were even aiming at the ruin of their colony, they rais'd a thousand men, five hundred of whom were sent from the Massachusetts, under major Swayne, and five hundred, under major Church, from New Plymouth; but, by this time, the French had taught the barbarians their own arts, particularly those of gaining intelligence by means of corruption. They had every where their spies, who inform'd them of the motions of the English, many of whom were thereby cut off; and the savages were so well instruct'd in all the arts of treachery, that they behaved towards the English with a brutality even foreign to their nature, barbarous as it was. Particular mention is made of the bravery of two English boys, who defend'd a fort that was surpris'd by the Indians, and though reduc'd to the last extremity refus'd to surrender it, till they obtain'd a capitulation, which was infamously broken by the barbarians, who murder'd three or four children and one of the boys, whilst the other made his escape. The majors Swayne and Church were, by the practices of the French, who had found means to corrupt even the English Indians, disappoint'd in all their designs; so that the former, after garrisoning Blue Point, was oblig'd to retire into winter-quarters, without effecting any thing farther worthy of notice. The English government was fully sensible of the French practices, and resolv'd to strike at the root of the evil, by attacking, at one time, both Quebec and Acadia, or New Scotland, then in the possession of the French. An account of the former expedition will fall under the article of Canada; but the command of the expedition against Acadia was given to Sir William Phipps. It consisted of a frigate mounting forty cannons, another ship of sixteen, and a third of eight. Sir William immediately bore down upon Port Royal^a, where, according to Charlevoix^b, the garrison consisted of no more than eighty-six men, with eighteen unmounted cannons, and the works not tenable. On the 22d of May, 1690, the English armament appeared before the place, and Manneval, the French governor, sent a priest to know Sir William's demands, which were, that the governor should surrender at discretion. This was pre-emptorily refused by the priest, who produced articles of capitulation ready drawn up. The first was, that the soldiers, with their arms and baggage, should be transported to Quebec in an English vessel. The second, that the inhabitants should be maintained in peaceable possession of their properties, and that the honour of the women should be preserved. The third was, that the inhabitants should have the free exercise of the Roman catholic religion, and that none of the church goods should be touched. Phipps, according to Charlevoix^b, readily agreed to those conditions, but refused to sign them, saying, that his word, as a general, was better security than any signature. Manneval was obliged to put up with the verbal assurance; and, next day, came on board the English ship, where the capitulation was ratified, and the keys of the fort delivered to Phipps. Upon entering it, the latter was surprised at the weakness of the place, and repented his having given the garrison such good terms. According to the same authority^c, he soon found means to break them. While Manneval was on board the English ship, some stores, belonging to the former governor, were seized upon by certain drunken soldiers and the inhabitants. Phipps construed this into a breach of the capitulation, which it undoubtedly was; as the fact is not denied by Charlevoix himself. He made a handle of this for disowning the capitulation. He disarmed the soldiers, and shut them up in the church. He confined Manneval to his own house under the care of a centinel, stripped him of his money and cloaths, and plundered the inhabitants, without sparing either the priests or the churches, and then re-imbarked his men, after obliging the inhabitants to take an oath of fidelity to king William and queen Mary. As to the rest of Phipps's undertakings, they will be found under the articles of the places against which they were intended, particularly that of Canada.^d

Quebec expedition.

THE colony of New England suffered greatly by his ill-managed expedition against Quebec, in which 1000 of its natives perished; and the public there ran 140,000 l. in debt, besides losing almost all their men and ships in their return. One Artell, a French Canadian officer, and Hoopwood, a Huron chief, attacked Salmon Falls, a frontier-town, where they killed thirty people, and carried off fifty prisoners. Lieutenant Clark, venturing out of Casco, was surprised by a body of four or five hundred Indians and French, who, after killing him and thirteen of his men, burnt down the place; the garrison surrendering, on condition of their being carried to the next English town. This capitulation, however, was broken under the ridiculous pretence, that the English were rebels to their lawful sovereign. Some of the garrison, with major Davis the commandant, were sent prisoners to Quebec,^e and the rest were murdered by the natives. The garrisons of Papcodac, Spanwick, Black Point, and Blue Point, were thrown into such consternation by the destruction of Casco, that they fled as far as Saco, which garrison likewise abandoned its post, and Hoopwood, the Huron, pursuing them, destroyed all the open country round, and murdered all the inhabitants, who fell into his hands. The captains Floyd and Greenleaf at last came up with him, routed his party, and wounded himself. He was afterwards killed by the French, who mistook him for an Iroquois. The French and Indians after this had the advantage in many encounters, which, though of too little consideration to be separately particularized, yet formed upon the whole a very considerable loss both of men and property. The only expedition worth notice, was that undertaken by major Church with three hundred men to Casco Bay, where he burnt some French and Indian forts, and released a few English captives.^f The war after this continued with various success, but by no means to the advantage of the English; and, at last, a cessation of arms till May 1691, was agreed on on both sides.

A new charter granted.

SIR William Phipps, all this time, was busied at the court of England in soliciting to be put at the head of a new expedition to Quebec: but the terrible war, in which king William was engaged, and the bad success of his late attempt, rendered all his endeavours fruitless. Sir Henry Ashurst and Mr. Increase Mather were at the same time in England, as agents for the people of New England, soliciting the restoration of their old charter; which, considering their zeal for liberty, and their abhorrence of a popish government, they had good reason to expect under a revolution-establishment. But neither king William nor

- a his then ministers were of dispositions to encourage any motion that tended towards the independency of the colony upon the prerogative; and the renewal was in effect refused. They then contented themselves with petitioning for a new charter with more ample privileges. They obtained, indeed, a new charter; but their privileges, even under the late one, were abridged or rather annihilated; and had they been treated in that manner under the Stuart family, the peace of the colony would probably have been in danger. By king William's charter, the crown has the nomination of the governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, and the officers of the admiralty, all which was before in the people, and the power of the militia was vested in the governor. All judges, justices, and sheriffs were appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of his majesty's council, and he likewise was to have a negative upon all laws, and public acts of the general assembly and council. Lastly, all laws, when approved of by the governor, were to be transmitted to England, and to be void if disallowed of in the space of three years. In short, all the favour the New England people obtained was the power of electing their first governor; and their choice fell upon Sir William Phipps.

SCARCE was this important affair settled, when hostilities recommenced by the Indians near Berwick, Exeter, and Cape Nidduck. Upon this, some officers, with four hundred men, marched to Pechypset; but, not observing discipline, they were attacked by the barbarians, and driven with some loss to their ships. This was followed by barbarities and murders in many other places, and the Massachusetts itself was attacked from the eastward; which it never had been before. This filled the colony with alarms, and the fort of Cape Nidduck, one of the strongest in those parts, was abandoned by its garrison, which had been greatly thinned by draughts. The French savages were now likewise in motion, and attacked the town of Tork, where they killed fifty of the inhabitants, and carried a hundred into captivity. The government, upon this, sent parties under different officers to redeem the captives; but they found that French officers headed the barbarians; that French soldiers were intermingled with them; that no fewer than five hundred christian Hurons were in the field; and that four or five Indian chiefs with their troops were confederated against them. An English captain, one Convers, is mentioned on this occasion with great honour for having maintained a post with no more than fifteen or twenty men, and beating off two hundred of the barbarians, headed by Moxus, one of their chiefs. Convers after this took the command of the English, and beat the French and savages from Sagadahock; the French commandant la Brosse, being killed in the action. It was remarked, that during this expedition the barbarians charged the New England men with these English words, in their mouths, "Fire and fall on brave boys," a proof of their great intercourse with the English, though the French missionaries had the address to detach them from their interest.

An Indian war breaks out.

SIR William Phipps was now arrived in New England with the colony's new charter, which gave great dissatisfaction to many. After confirming the laws enacted by the assembly he declared his resolution of marching against the Indians in person. No man could be better qualified than he was for such an undertaking, being a native of that part of the country where the chief seat of the war lay, near Kennebek river, and well acquainted with every spot and lurking-place about it. He immediately marched eastward with four hundred and fifty men; and gave orders for building a new fort at Pemmaquid (D). Accordingly, one of the strongest and largest in all North America was erected there. The charge of building it, however, was so great, that it is said to have alienated the affections of the New England colony from Sir William ever afterwards. But this could be only the effect of private resentment on account of their charter; for it is certain, that both that fort and the others he constructed were of great use to the eastern parts of the colony, to whom he likewise performed many important services in his own person against the savages, who were now become more unruly than ever. Being still spirited up by the French, they had been guilty of many murders towards the North of the rivers Merimack, Oyster, and Connecticut. The governor gave Convers, now a major, the command of the eastern garrisons, and sent three hundred and fifty men to reinforce him: with which assistance he was enabled to invade the Indian country, and to destroy all their lands and habitations about Ta-

Built forts.

(D) Captain Bancroft and capt. Wing laid the foundation, and captain Marib finished it. It was built of stone in a triangular figure, about seven hundred and thirty-seven feet in compass, without the outer wall, and one hundred and eight square within the inner one. It had twenty-eight port holes, eight feet from the ground, and fourteen guns mounted, six of which were eighteen pounders. The south wall facing the sea was twenty-two feet high, and six broad. The round tower at the west end was twenty-nine feet high. The east wall was twelve feet high; the north ten, and the west eighteen. The fort stood about twenty rods from high water-mark, and had a garrison of sixty men for its defence (1).

conet. Near Connecticut river the savages, who were there in arms, were attacked by the English, who gave them a total defeat, and retook the captives they were carrying off, while Sir William, the better to bridle them, built another fort at Saco. All those dispositions, with the fear of bringing a Mohawk war upon their hands, inclined the barbarians to a peace. The French agent, or, as he is called, ambassador, who, as usual, was a priest, at the court of their sachems, did all he could to persuade them to continue the war, and probably he might have been successful, had the French in Canada been in a condition to have sent them the arms and assistance they had promised. But that not being the case, the barbarians actually begged for a peace; and a congress was held at Pemmaquid fort, since called fort William Henry, between three English commissioners, and thirteen Indian sachems with proper interpreters. This meeting was very formal and important; and, by the articles then concluded, the Indian acknowledged themselves subject to the crown of England; confirmed them in possession of their lands, renounced their alliance with the French, and submitted their commerce between themselves and the English to the general assembly.

WHILE those scenes of murder upon the frontiers were closing, a more horrid than any was exhibited in the heart of the colony, where an irresistible spirit of witch-burning again broke out. The reader is to observe that this spirit raged the more as it was encouraged equal by the civil as the spiritual power; Sir William Phipps himself being a great believer of the existence of witches, and the ministers thought it as bad as blasphemy to doubt it. One Paris, the minister of Salem, by torturing a poor Indian woman, obliged her to confess her having bewitched his niece and daughter. But the persecution was not confined to the female sex. One Mr. George Burroughs, minister of Salem, was tried for witchcraft before a court consisting of six of the principal gentlemen of the colony, convicted and executed upon evidences that were impossible to be true, or the facts sworn to have any existence; not to mention that this, and all the other trials of the same sort, were so many insults upon the common understanding of mankind. The persecution raged with such fury, that no character or station could be secure against it. One Rebecca Nurse, a woman of great piety and virtue, being tried, the evidence against her was so poor, that the jury, zealous as they were for witch-burning, acquitted her; but so greatly to the dissatisfaction of the court and the bye-standers, that they were obliged again to go out and bring her in guilty. Her behaviour at the place of execution was remarkably composed, rational, and devout. As if both judges and jury had solemnly adjured common sense as well as humanity, some men were hanged on the evidence of ghosts; an absurdity which the reader may find explained in Matther's history of this persecution. One woman (Easly) presented to the court a most rational and affecting petition in favour of her innocence, but without the least effect, for she was executed. The same was the case with Martha Cory, whose husband, rather than allow himself to be convicted upon the infamous evidence by which his wife was hanged, suffered himself to be pressed to death. At last, the persecution raged so dreadfully, that no fewer than a hundred and fifty of both sexes were imprisoned, and two hundred more accused of witchcraft, many of whom found no safety but in flight. Amongst the latter was one Mr. English, a gentleman of fortune, who, being obliged to fly upon this ridiculous accusation, had his effects to the value of 1500 l. seized by the sheriff. Even girls of eleven years of age did not escape; and some women saved themselves by pleading their bellies.

THE effects of those barbarities were that the government of Old England heard of them with horror and relentment, and they awakened the small remains of common sense and humanity in that of New England, when they began to reflect upon the innocent blood they had shed. This naturally produced a backwardness in those magistrates, however zealous they had been before, to grant new warrants. One Dudley Bradstreet, in particular, tho' he had granted thirty or forty such warrants, refused to issue out any more. The witch-prosecutors and witnesses accused him and his lady of having killed nine persons by their witchcrafts; and they were obliged to fly out of the colony. His brother, John Bradstreet, was accused upon oath of riding through the air upon his dog to witch-meetings. Mr. Bradstreet narrowly escaped being executed upon this notable evidence; but his dog was put to death as an accomplice. One captain Aldin, a man of as much sense and virtue as any in the colony, suffered fifteen weeks imprisonment upon the like charge, and, making his escape, he returned next year, being 1693, to take his trial; but he was cleared by a proclamation. In short, of twenty-eight persons, who received sentence of death, twenty were executed. Their blood made their persecutors ravenous for more; and, upon their being somewhat checked, they accused the friends of the governor, and Dr. Increase Matther, the two great patrons of witch-burning. It was now time to stop the prosecution: Sir William Phipps, the governor, pardoned all who were under condemnation; and the grand jury would not find the bills preferred against supposed witches, even though they confessed themselves guilty; upon which this bloody persecution ceased.

a We are here, in justice to the ministry and people of New England, to observe that those persecutions were carried on by wretches, partly to gratify their private resentments and interests, and partly from a spirit of enthusiasm and cruelty; nor could they have happened, had it not been for the weakness of the governor and Dr. Matther, who were rendered the tools of more designing men. The people in general, and some ministers, particularly Mr. Caleb of Boston, detested them, and remonstrated against them from the beginning; but all to no purpose. It is farther remarkable, that tortures were applied to make the poor wretches confess themselves witches; but that all of them, who did so, retracted their confessions at the place of execution.

Reflection.

THE minds of the people of New England were now entirely alienated from the person and government of Sir William Phipps. The establishment of the peace with the Indians had brought no abatement to their taxes; and many considered him, notwithstanding his recantation, as the cause of shedding all the innocent blood that had been spilled in the late witch persecution. Add to those considerations, that they did not think Sir William's capacity was equal to the government of so great a colony as New England was now become. It appears that the discontented had long complained to their friends in England of their governor's conduct, and they had influence enough to bring the court to the same way of thinking as themselves; till, at last, articles of a formal charge having been sent over, Sir William was called to Old England, to answer for himself before a committee of the privy-council. On the other hand, Sir William had on his side a majority of the clergy, and of the general assembly, who sent over a counter-petition in his favour, praying that he might be restored to his government; but before the matter could come to any decision, Sir William died at London of a malignant fever. He was succeeded in his government by William Stoughton, Esq; who had not been quite innocent in the affair of the witch persecution. He had a difficult province to manage during his administration. The French of Canada, as shall be more fully related in our history of Canada, not only continued to have the ascendancy over the savages lying between them, and the English settlements, but were of themselves become very powerful. This was occasioned by a plan, which the French king had adopted for extirpating the colony of New England, and for which he was making great naval preparations. The sea armament was put under the command of the chevalier Nesmond, one of his best naval officers, who was to be joined by 1500 French from Canada. In the mean while, it was agreed at the court of France, to remit to count Frontenac, governor-general of New France, money and arms for the use of the French Indians, who would not have been such bloody enemies as they were to the English, had not the priests found means to make them papists, and consequently enthusiasts against protestants. This spirit increased their natural ferocity, and rendered them not only more brutal, but more treacherous, than ever.

Charge against Sir William Phipps.

His death. Succeeded by Stoughton.

NOTWITHSTANDING the solemn peace that had been concluded at Pemmaquid, twelve months did not elapse when they and the French all of a sudden invaded the town of Oyster River, where they carried off a hundred captives, twenty of whom were of the trained bands. They then murdered one Mrs. Cutts, and all her family; but were repulsed from Greton by one lieutenant Lukin. They next fell upon the open country, where they killed twenty or thirty English, plundered the plantations, and carried off captives, or scalped, all whom they did not put to death. One woman, particularly, who was scalped on this occasion, was alive twenty years after. There seems, at this time, to have been a debility in the New England government, which now contained above 200,000 English, besides their Indian subjects. The French and their Indians were every where repulsed when they met with officers or men of spirit to oppose them, which seemed to make them the more cruel against the defenceless part of the inhabitants. At last, Bommafeen, one of their principal segamores or sachems, and who had been present at the Pemmaquid peace, was made prisoner by the English; and, notwithstanding all his evasions, he was sent prisoner to Boston. He was a chief of so great consequence, that the Indians were greatly daunted by his captivity, and not only forbore hostilities for some time, but sent proposals for peace to the garrison at Pemmaquid. At first, they proposed to release all the English captives, and actually delivered up eight. Upon this, they obtained a truce for thirty days, and the brave major Convers, with two other English officers, were appointed to treat with them. This negotiation came to nothing; because, on the one hand, the English refused to deliver up the segamore Bommafeen, and they, on the other, to fulfil their preliminary of releasing the English prisoners, of whom above a hundred were still in their hands. The war then went on with fresh fury, and, in August this year, the Indians, for the first time ever known, appeared at Billericay on horseback, and committed within the county of Essex, a great many murders and other barbarities.

Continuation of the war.

g THOSE transactions are but slightly touched upon in the English histories, which gives great reason to believe that Stoughton, and the government of New England, were not quite void void of blame with regard to the Abenquais, or French Indians, to bridle whom Pemmaquid fort had been built. We are therefore somewhat inclined to believe the relation of father Charlevoix, as to many particulars of this war, the rather, as he agrees in the main with the English accounts, and, as it is allowed on all hands, that the government of New England, both civil and military, was at that time very indifferently administered. The garrison of Pemmaquid had arrested seven Abenquais, who came to the fort with a flag of truce; four of whom were killed on the road to Boston, to which they were all sent prisoners. The rest of the nation demanded satisfaction for this breach of faith as they called it; and Stoughton, the governor of New England, reproached them, on his part, for their repeated breaches of faith. The government, both of Old and New France, saw now the necessity of taking Pemmaquid fort from the English; and two of their best officers in Canada, Iberville and Bonaventure^d, were charged with the execution, with orders from Old France to raze the fort, as soon as they should take it, and then to join an armament to be sent from Old France to proceed to the destruction of the English and their settlements. The French court had this enterprize so greatly at heart, that they assigned a very considerable force to support it. Their writers, however, admit that it must have been impracticable, had the English officers in New England done their duty. The governor of Pemmaquid fort was one captain Chub, and he was, at this very time, 1696, treating with some Abenquais se-gamores, two of whom he shot dead while they thought themselves in perfect security; a barbarity owned and condemned by the English themselves. This villainous action renewed hostilities in those parts on both sides, and they proceeded with their usual inhumanities. On the 26th of June, the two French commandants arrived at Spanish Bay, where they had intelligence of three English ships, lying in the mouth of St. John's river. Upon this, they set sail in quest of them, and, coming up with them on the 4th of July, Iberville took one of them, the Newport of twenty-four guns; and then proceeded to the attack of the fort, which they invested the 14th of July; having landed their artillery, and raised their batteries, in all which they were assisted by large bodies of the disciplined natives, who flocked to join them.

Siege and surrender of Pem-maquid fort.

BEFORE any firing began (F), the French summoned Chub to surrender the place, and he answered with great shew of resolution, that he was determined to hold it out to the last, though the French should cover the sea with their ships, and the land with their Indians. Upon this a smart firing began on both sides, and Iberville coming a-shore raised a battery, from whence he played with five bombs. This daunted Chub and his garrison, especially as they were informed by the French, that, if the place was taken by storm, they would be left to the mercy of the savages. A capitulation was then begun, and it was agreed that the English should be sent with all their goods and effects to Boston to be exchanged for an equal number of French and savages; and that, in the mean while, they should be protected from the fury of the Indians. Charlevoix says, that Chub was forced by his garrison, which consisted of no more than ninety-two men, (the English say two hundred) to accept of this capitulation. When the French entered the fort, they there found one of the natives in irons, and ready to expire under the severities he had suffered in his confinement. The sight of this captive put the Indians in such a fury, that the French pretended it was with great difficulty they could prevent the savages from falling upon the garrison. It is on all hands admitted that this fort might have held out a long time, had it been garrisoned by brave men, they having fifteen cannon, and plenty of ammunition and provisions. The capitulation met with some difficulties in the execution of it. The French commandant sent indeed a few of the garrison to Boston; but he demanded, at the same time, that all the French and Indian prisoners in New England should be set at liberty, in exchange for the remainder of the garrison, and the crew of the Newport, which amounted to above one hundred men; and, in the mean while, he demolished the fortifications of Pemmaquid. Before he received an answer, he departed to execute the rest of his commission; but, perceiving that he was falling short of provisions, he sent to Boston all the English prisoners, detaining only the officers.

Exploit of Hannah
Dunster.

THE unexpected news of the loss of Pemmaquid fort spread great terror all over New England; and governor Stoughton, when it was too late, ordered three men of war to sail in pursuit of the French squadron. At the same time, colonel Gedney marched eastward with five hundred men, but found the country evacuated both by the French and their allies; and all he could do, was to carry Chub prisoner to Boston, where his commission was only taken from him: which is a farther proof that he behaved better than the English writers a allow. The English were now in a manner despised by the barbarians, who invaded Haver- kill in Essex county; from whence they carried off thirty-captives. Amongst them was one Hannah Dunster, (who had been but a few days brought to bed) a woman of most amazing strength and intrepidity: for, perceiving herself in danger of being sacrificed to the cruelties of the barbarians, she animated her nurse, and an English boy, who was with her, so effectually, that they three killed ten of the Indians with their own weapons, and then made their escape to Boston, where they deservedly received 50 l. from the assembly, besides handsome private presents. The war, all this while, to the reproach of the English, was carried on by detached parties of the Indians, who cruelly murdered all that fell in b and surprizes.

BESIDES the expedition against Peminaquid fort, another was now fitting out both from Old and New France, for carrying into execution their grand plan of conquering all New England in the beginning of the year 1697. How this expedition came to miscarry will be seen in the history of Canada. When certain accounts of it came to Boston, the inhabitants seemed to awaken from a lethargy. They immediately repaired the fortifications of that town, and the militia of the province was every where raised and disciplined, so that it is likely that the French, if they had landed, must have miscarried in their main design. The valour and good conduct of major March, was of vast service to the colony on this occasion. Being dispatched to the eastern parts, where the greatest danger from the savages c was apprehended, he drove them from the neighbourhood of Casco bay; and putting his men on board some small vessels he landed them near Damascottes river off the eastern isles before the barbarians could recover their fastnesses, and drove them, with some loss to himself, but much greater to them, to their canoes. The importance of this seasonable check consisted in its dispiriting those savages from joining the French, whose fleet and army after this disappointment returned to Europe.

THOUGH Mr. Stoughton still continued to act as governor of New England, yet it does not appear that he had ever obtained a formal commission from the crown of England, being only continued in his government from time to time. About the year 1695, the clamour against the people of New England and New York for piratical practices growing very outrageous, king William had bestowed the government of New England, to which that of New
d York was now added; upon the earl of Bellamont an Irish peer, the king expressing himself at the same time, that he thought him a man of resolution and integrity, and with those qualities the more likely than any other he could think of to put a stop to the growth of piracy. The lord Bellamont continued for two years after in England, during which time Stoughton had acted as his deputy-governor. Bellamont consulting with colonel Robert Livingston, a person of reputation, and considerable property in New York, the latter recommended to him one captain Kidd as a proper person to suppress the piracies so much complained of. Bellamont mentioned this proposal to the king; but upon his consulting the e admiralty, it was found that the then situation of affairs did not admit of their granting Kidd what he demanded, viz. the command of a thirty gun ship, properly manned and equipped for that service. The project was then as good as dropt, when it was revived by Livingston, who proposed to the earl of Bellamont, that a ship, at the expence of 6000 l. of which he and Kidd were to bear a fifth, should be fitted out, and that the other shares should be advanced by other great lords, particularly the lord chancellor Sommers; the duke of Shrews- bury, the earls of Romney, Orford, and others. This proposal was likewise communicated by the earl of Bellamont to the king, who highly approved of it, and consented that the adventurers should have a grant of all that Kidd should take from the pirates, excepting one tenth, which was reserved to shew that the king was concerned in the undertaking.
The bargain was struck by all parties, and a commission in the usual form was made out for f Kidd, to act as a privateer against the pirates. Kidd, after cruizing for some time upon the coasts of New England and New York but with very indifferent success, bore away for the East Indies, where he was guilty of various acts of piracy, especially on the subjects of the Great Mogul, by which the East India company's estate and effects in those parts were in danger of being seized.

His piracies made a great noise all over Europe, especially in England, where the disaffected to the government represented them as being committed by the authority of the king and the ministry. The earl of Bellamont, in the year 1698, after a very tedious voyage, landed on his government at New York, where he found every thing in great disorder. The massacres of the Indians upon the defenceless inhabitants had been renewed. Many of them, g amongst whom was a minister, captain Chub and colonel Bradstreet, both whom we have already mentioned, were murdered in Essex county; but the savages were beaten off from Derfeld on Connecticut river, by the valour of the minister, one Mr. Williams, who headed the inhabitants. The peace of Ryswick restored for sometime those parts to a state of some a tranquility. Count Frontenac intimated to the sachems of the Ilurons, and other sachems in the French alliance, that they ought to make the best terms they could with the English, because he had no longer any authority to support them. The earl of Bellamont remained all this while at New York, but nominated major Convers, and colonel Philips, to repair to Penobscot, there to confer with the Indian sachems upon the means of restoring peace. At the same time his lordship wrote a very polite letter to the count de Frontenac, informing him of the publication of the peace at London, and sending him back by colonel Schuyler, nineteen French prisoners; but with a demand of having all the subjects belonging to England, both English and Indians, who were prisoners in New France, delivered up to him^f. The count readily agreed to the restitution of the English captives, but pretended b he had no power over the Indians, particularly the Iroquois, many of whom had settled after they had become prisoners in New France. A long negotiation between the earl and the count ensued upon this. The count's main drift was to convince the Iroquois, that he was ready to release all their prisoners, but not to deliver them up to the English, as they themselves were an independent people. All his art however had very little effect upon those savages, and he himself soon afterwards died, in the 78th year of his age, after raising the affairs of Canada to a higher pitch than they had ever been in before.

THE conferences at Penobscot were still continued between the English commissioners and the Indian sachems; the latter of whom laid the blame of all the perfidious cruel conduct they had been guilty of upon the Jesuit missionaries. At last the English commissioners concluded a treaty with them upon the footing of that of Pemmaquid, but received from the sachems the following separate instrument of submission to the crown of England, which we insert here, because it is the best evidence the nature of the thing can admit of to prove their subjection to the British nation. c

“WHEREAS notwithstanding the aforesaid submission and agreement, the said Indians belonging to the princes aforesaid, or some of them, through the ill counsel and instigation of the French, have perpetrated sundry hostilities against his majesty's subjects the English, and have not delivered and returned him the several English in their hands, as in the said submission they covenanted.

“WHEREFORE we, whose names are hereunto subscribed, segamores, captains, and d principal men of the Indians, belonging to the rivers of Kennebeck, Ammenoscoggin, Saco, and parts adjacent, being sensible of our great offence and folly, in not complying with the aforesaid submission and agreement, and also of the sufferings and mischiefs that we have hereby exposed ourselves unto, do in all humble and submissive manner cast ourselves upon his majesty's mercy, for the pardon of all our rebellions and violations of our promises, praying to be received into his majesty's grace and protection, and for, and in behalf of ourselves, and of all the other Indians belonging to the several rivers and places aforesaid, within the sovereignty of his majesty of Great Britain, do again acknowledge and profess an hearty and sincere obedience to the crown of England, and do solemnly renew, ratify, and confirm, all and every the articles and agreements contained in the aforesaid recited submission: and in testimony hereof, we, the said segamores, captains, and principal men, have hereunto set our hands and seals, at Casco Bay, near Mare's Point, the 7th day of January, in the tenth year of the reign of his majesty king William the third, Anno Dom. 1698-99. e

THE earl of Bellamont appears to have been in every respect a proper governor for New England, not only as he understood the interests of the colony perfectly well, but because he was well qualified to deal with the French governors of Canada. He affected, however, to f make his chief residence at New York; and Stoughton continued still to act in New England, as his deputy or lieutenant-governor. In the beginning of the spring of 1699, he came in person to Boston, where he held a general assembly, which consists of deputies from the freeholders and other inhabitants of the respective towns and places^g. He seems to have been the first governor who received from the province a determined salary; being allowed 1000 l. a year, and a present of five hundred pounds, by which it would appear that the assembly were of opinion his not residing amongst them was of no detriment to their province. While he was at Boston he had the good fortune to seize Kidd the noted pirate, and to send him over to England; where his trial, for reasons foreign to this history, made a very great noise; but he was afterwards executed. As to lord Bellamont himself, he died g soon after his return to New York; and lieutenant-governor Stoughton again resumed the a government. The Indians being now quiet, nothing remarkable happened; but a dreadful fire, that might be well called a public calamity, which broke out at Boston, consumed several houses, and damaged others. In this interval of tranquility, however, the colony acquired great property in commerce; and they wisely attached themselves to those views even after the breaking out of the war between France and England. This was in a great measure owing to the prudence of Calieres and Vaudreuil, the French governors of Canada, who were sensible that that province was as much benefited by repose as New England was, and that the Iroquois and other savage nations would prove a firm barrier to New England in case of an attack from Canada. The New England men, however, were far from being idle at the beginning of this war; for they fitted out as many privateers as, in a very short time, b brought into their ports seventeen or eighteen French prizes.

On the death of the earl of Bellamont, Joseph Dudley, Esq; a native of the province was appointed governor of New England. The people of that province seem at this time to have been particularly careful to avoid rendering their own country the seat of war; and they rather chose to contribute as far as the circumstances of the colony could permit, towards carrying it on in other quarters; for which reason we are obliged to refer to the history of those colonies to be inserted in other parts of this work, for many brave and generous actions performed by the New England men in the course of that war. They were so public spirited as upon the application of the people of Jamaica, who were apprehensive of a French invasion, to send to their assistance two companies of foot under colonel Walton and captain c Lawrence, who served there for two years. They likewise generously relieved the people of Nevis, when ruined by the French, by sending them all kinds of provisions and materials for building, without their either receiving or demanding any return.

The government of Old England early in this war were sensible that nothing could more effectually distress the French than to attack their colony of Quebec. This project had been formed by the whig ministry, and had gone so far, that the earl of Sunderland, secretary of state, had sent an advice boat to Boston to have every thing in readiness in that town and harbour for the reception of the troops who were ready to sail from England against Quebec. This design however was laid aside upon the government receiving news of the unfortunate battle of Almanza, and the troops were sent on another destination. There is some d reason for doubting when this design was reassumed, whether the New England men were really friends to it. The probability lies that they were not. They knew the difficulties of such an undertaking, and they were afraid, if it was unsuccessful, of having their country again rendered the scene of French and Indian barbarities. Add to this, that we cannot well suppose them to have had any great opinion either of the ministers who planned, or the admiral and general who were to execute it. The first was Sir Hovenden Walker, and the latter was colonel Hill, brother to Mrs. Masbam, who had supplanted the duchess of Marlborough in the queen's favour.

Be that as it will col. Nicholson, who had recovered Nova Scotia for the English, having been over in England in the spring of the year 1700, had brought with him some Indian e chiefs, and so effectually persuaded the ministry of the utility of the undertaking, that five regiments of foot and a battalion of marines, the latter under the command of col. Charles Churchill, were appointed to the service, and the ships of war that sailed from England were the Edgar, Monmouth, Devonshire, Humber, Swiftsure, Kingston, Sunderland, Montague, and Dunkirk. This force was to be joined by an additional number of troops and ships when it arrived at New England, which was the first place of its destination. It does not however appear that the people of New England had received any instructions for that purpose; or if they did they seemed to have neglected them. The armament sailed from Plymouth the 4th of May, and arrived at Boston the 4th of June 1711, and so little was it expected, f that upon its first appearance a troop of guards, and a regiment of foot that were in the town, put themselves under arms, and the inhabitants made the proper dispositions for repelling the enemy, but were soon undeceived. The general and the admiral had at first no thoughts of landing their men here, but coming ashore, after some conference with the inhabitants, found that they themselves were not in the secrets of the ministry. The latter had often brought severe charges against the whigs for entering on designs not laid before parliament, and for which no supplies had been given, and the parliament had a little before declared, That to enlarge the service, or increase the charge beyond the bounds prescribed, and the supplies granted, was illegal, and an invasion of their rights. Those circumstances filled the patrons of this expedition with apprehensions, and they had nothing to trust to but success for being indemnified. Looking upon secrecy as being one of the g great means of success, they had either concealed their design from the New England men, or explained it so imperfectly, that when the admiral and general came on shore they were amazed to find that no provisions were in furtherance for their proceeding on the expedition; so that, all their own provisions being spent, notwithstanding the shortness of the passage, passage, the men were landed out of the ships, and encamped on Noddies island near Boston, where colonel Nicholson likewise was. This delay, probably, was the ruin of the expedition, but it is owned on all hands, that the New England men seeing the good appearance the troops and ships made, and perceiving the officers to be thoroughly in earnest, expedited the raising their quota of men, and got ready the provisions demanded of them in a shorter time than could have been well expected. It was however the 20th of July before the British troops reembarked, and they were joined by two fine regiments of 1000 New England and New York men, under the colonels Walton and Vetch. The fleet then consisted of twelve, some say fifteen men of war; six store ships with all kind of warlike stores, besides five-ships, bomb ketches, tenders and transports, with forty horse on board for drawing a fine train of artillery. It was the 30th of July before the fleet sailed for the river St. Lawrence. At the same time colonel Nicholson set out from Boston for New York, from whence he proceeded to Albany, where the forces of New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, about 1000 Palatines, and about as many Indians of the Five Nations, under the caziques, who had been in England, rendezvoused to the number of about 4000 men, commanded by col. Ingoldsby, col. Schuyler, and col. Whiting, who marched toward Canada the 28th of August. It was the 14th of the same month before the fleet arrived at the mouth of St. Lawrence river; but proceeding upwards, partly by the unskilfulness of the pilots, and partly through contrary winds, the whole was in great danger of being lost, as eight transports, with about 800 men on board, actually were. After two or three days remaining in this uncomfortable situation, a resolution was taken, by a consultation of the sea-officers, to return to Spanish river bay; and there a council was held, consisting of sea and land-officers, "who, says Sir Hovenden Walker in his account of this expedition, considering we had but ten weeks provision for the fleet and army, and that the navigation in these parts of the world being so bad and dangerous, that, at this time of the year, we could not depend upon a supply of provisions from New England, it was unanimously agreed to return home, without making further attempts elsewhere." Thus ended an expedition that has been variously represented; but we cannot help thinking that the conducters of it were in earnest, though their delaying it so long was inexcusable, if it was owing to them. It was however considered by the whigs as so desperate an undertaking, that one of the articles of the earl of Oxford's impeachment, was his having suffered it to go forward. As to what regards the part which the people of New England bore in it, we shall here present the reader with part of their governor's apology for them in a speech he delivered to the assembly soon after the expedition miscarried. "Before we proceed (says he) I must offer you my sincere sense and sincere condolence of the fleet and forces sent hither by her majesty's special favour. I have had time enough, since the account thereof, to consider the several articles of her majesty's command to this government, for the putting forward this expedition. I cannot charge this assembly with neglecting any particular; but, on the contrary, when I peruse the journals of the proceedings, I think there was provision and expedition made in every article, referring to soldiers, artificers, pilots, transports and provision for the service of her majesty's British forces as well as our own. I hope you will see reason to consider and represent home, for our justification, that it may be demonstrated, that we were in earnest to do our duty to the utmost for our own benefit and establishment, as well as her majesty's honour and just right set down in the instructions for the expedition."

and rebuilt.

ABOUT this time the greatest part of the town of Boston was laid in ashes by an accidental fire: but though the public of New England was at that time considerably in debt on account of the late war, it was soon rebuilt in a far more elegant and commodious manner than before; a proof of the prodigious acquisitions the inhabitants had made by commerce and industry since the foundation of their colony. The peace of Utrecht, however disgraceful or disadvantageous it might be in other respects, gave a prodigious spring to the wealth and welfare of New England. The inhabitants of that colony, to their native love of liberty, added now the polite arts of life, industry was embellished by elegance; and what would have been hardly credible in ancient Greece and Rome, in less than fourscore years, a colony, almost unassisted by its mother-country, arose in the wilds of America, that if transplanted to Europe, and rendered an independent government, would have made no mean figure amidst her sovereign states.

Colonel Shute
governor.

UPON the accession of the family of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, colonel Samuel Shute, brother to the then lord Barrington, was by king George the 1st. appointed governor of New England. He had served in the English army under the great duke of Marlborough with great reputation, and having been wounded in the cause of public liberty, both his person and principles were extremely agreeable to the people of New England.

^b Letter of Sir HOVEDEN WALKER, dated Sept. 12, 1711.

- a They accordingly provided him with a house suitable to his dignity; but they still retained so much of their original character, that they could not be prevailed upon to render him independent on themselves by settling upon him a certain salary. He had succeeded one colonel Burgess, who, for that reason probably, refused to go over to his government; and his lieutenant governor was Mr. Dummer, a man of understanding, and very well versed in colony affairs, especially those of New England. By this time, that province was so far from being a wild uncultivated land, where the colonists must work for their bread to clear it from trees, that there was a necessity for a law passing to prevent any more from being cut down; as appears from the following speech of this governor to the assembly. "Notwithstanding, says he, the law passed in England for encouraging naval stores, and for the preservation of white pine trees, his majesty has been informed that great spoils are daily committed in his woods, in the province of Main, and in some parts of Massachusetts Bay, by cutting down, and putting to private use such trees as may be proper for the navy-royal; therefore he recommends that all laws against it may be put in execution, and new ones be made, if these are not sufficient." In the same speech he recommended the rebuilding of the fort Pemmaquid, or erecting a fort in that neighbourhood. In 1717 he met the heads of the eastern Indians near Kennebek river, and found that the French priests from Canada had been again tampering with them to renounce their alliance with, and submission to the crown of Great Britain. This appeared in the haughtiness of the behaviour of the Sachems, who, with a peremptory air, demanded that the English should build no more forts, nor make more settlements on their lands; to which the governor resolutely answered, that he would not part with an inch of ground that belonged to his province, and threatened to build a fort upon every settlement in it. Upon this, the savages departed to a neighbouring island with a shew of resentment; but upon the governor's ordering the ship of war which attended him, to put herself in a sailing posture, they sent to desire another conference, which with some difficulty was granted, and the Sachems, to the number of 23, renewed their submission to the crown of England, and all the articles of their former agreement, saying at the same time in their native tongue, that they hoped it would last as long as the sun and moon endured. Upon their return home, however, the French renewed their practices with them, and two hundred of them marched under French colours to the town of Arrowseck, from whence they sent a menacing letter to the governor, who laid it before the assembly. This produced a new expedition, which was attended by five of the counsellors, and which soon dissipated the danger. Next year about thirty or forty pirates, taken by captain Solgard of the Greyhound man of war, were brought prisoners to Rhode Island, where they were tried, and about twenty-four of them executed.

NOTWITHSTANDING colonel Shute's easy administration, and the services he had done the colony, he could not prevail upon them to fix his salary, and the assembly gave him so much trouble that he was at last forced to carry over to England a complaint against them, consisting of seven articles for invading the royal prerogative; viz. "1. Their taking possession of royal masts cut into logs. 2. Refusing the governor's negative of the speaker. 3. Assuming authority jointly with the governor and council to appoint fasts and thanksgivings. 4. Adjourning themselves for more than two days at a time. 5. Dismantling of forts, and ordering the guns and stores into the treasurer's custody. 6. Suspending of military officers, and mutilating them of their pay. 7. Sending a committee of their own to muster the king's forces."

MR. Cook, the agent for the house of representatives, admitted the first, third, fifth, sixth and seventh articles to be true; and on the part of his constituents he acknowledged their fault, but laid the blame upon the precedents of former assemblies. As to the two articles not acknowledged, an explanatory charter was made out in the 12th of George I. in which is the following clause: "Whereas in their charter nothing is directed concerning a speaker of the house of representatives; and their adjourning themselves; it is hereby ordered, That the governor or commander in chief, shall have a negative in the election of the speaker, and the house of representatives may adjourn themselves, not exceeding two days at a time."

COLONEL Shute's successor was William Burnet, Esq; son to the famous bishop of that name. When he entered upon his government he found the people more numerous than those of any colony in the world; their commerce flourishing, and their riches immense. But they had not laid aside the independent principles of their ancestors; and the government of England thought that they affected powers inconsistent with their duty to their mother country. To put them to a test of their obedience, Mr. Burnet had an instruction peremptorily to insist upon a settled provision for him as governor, which was as peremptorily refused by the assembly. The disputes on this head encreased so much, that for some time no public business could be transacted. Mr. Burnet was a zealous promoter of the good of the colony; and had many schemes for its service, which were so just that he had credit enough to carry them into execution. It is thought that he would even have given up the point of his salary had he not had been tied down by his instructions from England. But finding that was impracticable, he having given up a very lucrative place in Great Britain for the government of New York, in which he succeeded governor Hunter, as colonel Montgomery did him. The province of Massachusetts perceiving they could gain nothing upon their governor in the matter of his salary, sent over Jonathan Belcher, Esq; to join with Mr. Wilks in an application to the government of England to get a revocation of his instruction on that head. The whig ministry being at that time, viz. 1727, pretty much divided, the New England agents who were charged with other complaints against their governor, besides that of his insisting upon a salary, received great encouragement from one part of the administration, and were threatened by the other, that the affair should be laid before parliament; but Mr. Burnet dying September 7, 1729, Mr. Belcher was appointed to succeed him as governor of New York. In the mean while, Mr. Dummer acted as lieutenant-governor. Mr. Belcher arrived at New York on the 8th of August 1730, and was received with great joy by the natives, who thought that under their own countryman they had nothing to apprehend, especially as he had so lately been employed by them as their agent; but they were deceived. The first step he took in his government was to lay before the assembly of New Hampshire his instruction to obtain a salary, and they accordingly granted him two hundred pounds a year. But their example did not further his main end, which was to obtain a proportionable sum from the assembly at Boston. The general assembly of New England met at Cambridge on the 9th of September, and was opened by the governor with a speech, in which he had the following expressions:

“Gentlemen, the king’s placing me at the head of his government here, taken in all circumstances of it (without assuming any personal merit to myself) is such an instance of his majesty’s grace and favour to the people, as I want words to express. The honour of the crown, and the interest of Great Britain, are doubtless very compatible with the privileges and liberties of her plantations; and it being my duty to support the former, it will also be my care to protect the latter. I have in command to communicate to you his majesty’s twenty-seventh instruction to me, respecting the support of his governors in this province for the future; I therefore desire, from the affectionate regard I have for my native country, that you will give your most calm and deliberate attention to this affair, of so nice a consequence, and now brought to a crisis.” The crisis he mentions was the former threat of obtaining the sanction of a British parliament for fixing a salary; and Mr. Belcher, to shew he was not to be baffled, insisted upon the arrears due to the late governor Burnet’s children at the rate of 1000*l.* a year for his salary. At length his salary was fixed by a bill passed in the assembly, but in so ambiguous and uncertain a manner, that he refused it his consent. The council, however, was willing to have agreed to his terms; but the house of representatives still stood out, which produced from the governor the following expressions: “With you, gentlemen of the house of representatives, this matter more especially lies, for you must stand alone in your present unhappy situation, and after my discharging my duty to the king and to this province, I do not intend to give you any farther trouble in what I have so often urged to you. I cannot help mentioning to you the opinion of your present agent, that any longer contention will be but a fruitless spending of money, and still bring this province into a less esteem with his majesty and his ministers. You may depend the king will take care that what he has now directed, shall be finally effected; and, as I have often told you, so I still fear, in such a manner as may make you wish, too late, that you had come into an early dutiful compliance.”

Speech of the governor
Belcher.

THE house of representatives, in answer to this speech, quoted the governor’s own letters to the general assembly, when he was employed by them as their agent against their granting any fixed salary, in which there were expressions importing, that such a salary could not be granted without the highest prejudice to the public. In the mean while, the house was far from denying to their governor an honourable support; for on the first of January, being the very day before the governor dissolved them, they entered the following minute in their books: “After the most serious consideration of his majesty’s instruction for fixing a salary on his excellency and his successors, together with the rights and privileges of the people, we apprehend the house ought not to accede thereto; but at the same time, we esteem it the duty of this house, as well as their honours, willingly and unanimously to give their votes in passing acts for the ample and honourable support of his majesty’s governor.”

a THE assembly which met upon the above dissolution, being as refractory as that which was dissolved, it met with the same fate, and a new assembly was called, to whom the governor afresh urged the necessity of their complying with his majesty's 27th instruction, relating to his salary. At last, after various expedients had been proposed and rejected, the governor was prevailed on to accept of 1000 l. a year; but in such a manner, as that the payment of it should not be obligatory upon future assemblies. Other matters of great moment to the peace and prosperity of the colony happened about the same time, particularly a dispute between the province of Massachusetts Bay and that of New Hampshire, about the white pines, already mentioned to be so essential to the shipping of Great Britain. It is almost impossible, considering the vast extent of territory, where the white pines grow, b to ascertain those several boundaries between the king and the private subject. It is certain that Ralph Gulston, Esq; who was contractor for the ship-timber for the royal navy, met with such difficulties in executing his contract, that he was forced to have recourse to the governor's authority, who referred the affair to the assembly. After some deliberation, a proclamation was issued by desire of the house, to prevent any kind of molestation being given to Mr. Gulston or his agents; and Mr. Dunbar the surveyor-general gave the following publication:

" WHEREAS a number of people, who call themselves proprietors of lands in Sheepscot River, and other parts to the eastward of Kennebeck River, have, by their agent Mr. Waldo, petitioned his majesty upon their said claims, and are, as I am informed, proposing to send thither and take possession of the said lands, without waiting for his majesty's pleasure and determination thereupon: I do hereby give notice to all persons concerned, that I am directed, by his majesty's royal instructions, to lay aside 300,000 acres of land, bearing the best timber, as contiguous as may be to the sea-shore and navigable rivers within the province of Nova Scotia, to be reserved as a nursery of trees for the royal navy: I have, in obedience to my said instructions, made choice of several places from the east-side of Kennebeck River, and more especially in Sheepscot River."

d THE reader here is to observe, that by the charter granted to the colony, all trees of the diameter of twenty-four inches and upwards, twelve inches from the ground, growing in the province, were reserved to the crown. This reservation, however, though wise and necessary, had often very pernicious consequences, as it gave a handle for the servants of the government to be very troublesome to the planters, by visiting and searching their estates: Besides this inconveniency, it discourages the growth of white pines near navigable rivers; as men are too often fond of preferring their private interest to the public good, and the expence of the carriage of such as grow at a distance from those rivers, exceeds the value of the timber.

e IT is foreign to the intention of this history to pursue all the private heats and animosities that happened in this colony under Mr. Belcher's administration. He had the fate of his predecessors; for notwithstanding all his public-spirited endeavours for the good of the colony, letters were sent over to the government of England, complaining of his administration, his tyranny, and his being an enemy to the dissenting interest in New England. Those letters, most of which were written in the incendiary strain, would have had very little effect, had not the government of England resolved to adopt a new system, with regard to their American affairs. They were provoked to this, by a dispute raised by the assembly of New England, about the disposal of public money, which they pretended, because they granted it, ought to be vested solely in them. This was talking in a very high strain of independency; and upon its being checked by the governor, a complaint was carried over to England, where it was voted in parliament, " That the complaint, contained in the New England memorial and petition, was frivolous and groundless, and f " high insult upon his majesty's government, and tending to shake off the dependency of the said colony upon this kingdom, to which, by law and right, they are, and ought to be, subject." The assembly even ventured to censure Mr. Dunbar, for giving evidence before the house of commons in a bill relating to the better securing and encouraging the trade of the sugar-colonies in America; upon which that house voted, nem. con. " That the presuming to call any person to account, or pass a censure upon him, for evidence given by such person before that house, was an audacious proceeding; and an high violation of the privileges of that house." The government of England, not willing to encourage the heart-burnings of the colony, nominated William Shirley, Esq; to succeed Mr. Belcher, in August 1741. As we shall have occasion, in the course of this g work, often to mention that gentleman's conduct and actions; and likewise the noble spirit the New England men exerted in the war with France, which broke out in the year 1742; we shall here avoid particulars, which it will be necessary for us to mention in the history of Canada, where, as in one common center, the merits and spirit during that war, war, of all our North American colonies, will appear in their full and true light, and thereby prevent numerous repetitions, which must happen, should we give separate details of their conduct. It is sufficient to say here, that, in the year 1748, the colony of New England gave peace to Europe, by raising, arming, and transporting four thousand men, who took Louisbourg, which proved an equivalent at the peace of Aix la Chapelle, for all the successes of the French upon the continent of Europe. In the late war with France, which was concluded in the year 1762, they exerted the same glorious spirit against the common enemy, and greatly contributed to that extension of territory in North America, that probably in a few years hence will make the crown of Great Britain, if it is not already, the most powerful of any in the world. It now remains that we give some account of the constitution and trade of this flourishing colony, in as concise a manner as is consistent with perspicuity.

Constitution of
land.

THE general assembly of New England is the supreme legislative body in the colony. In concurrence with the governor it imposes taxes, makes grants, enacts laws, and redresses public grievances of every kind. It consists of the magistrates, and a certain number of representatives, which form two chambers so nearly resembling our lords and commons, that the consent of the majority of both is necessary before any bill can be presented to the governor for his assent. But as we have an authentic representation from the commissioners of trade to the house of lords in January 1733-4, we cannot do better than to repeat their sense of the general government of New England, viz. "That there are likewise three charter governments, of which the chief is the province of Massachusetts Bay, commonly called New England; the constitution whereof is of a mixed nature, the power being divided betwixt the king and the people, in which the latter have much the greatest share; for here the people do not only chuse the assembly, but the assembly chooses the council also; and the governor depends upon the assembly for his annual support, which has too frequently laid the governors of this province under temptations of giving up the prerogative of the crown, and the interest of Great Britain."

"CONNECTICUT and Rhode Island are the other charter governments, or rather corporations, where almost the whole power of the crown is delegated to the people, who make an annual election of their assembly, their council, and their governor likewise; to the majority of which assemblies, councils and governors respectively, being collective bodies, the power of making laws is granted; and, as their charters are worded, they can, and do make laws, even without the governor's assent, and directly contrary to their opinions, no negative voice being reserved to them as governors in the said charter: And as the said governors are annually chosen, their office generally expires before his majesty's approbation can be obtained, or any security taken for the due observance of the laws of trade and navigation, and hold little or no correspondence with our office. These colonies have the power of making laws for their better government and support, provided they be not repugnant to the laws of Great Britain, nor detrimental to their mother-country. And these laws, when they have regularly passed the council and assembly of any province, and received the governor's assent, become valid in that province, yet remain repealable by his majesty in council upon just complaint, and do not acquire a perpetual force unless they are confirmed by his majesty in council. But there are some exceptions to this rule in the proprietary and charter-governments. Thus, in the Massachusetts Bay, if their laws are not repealed within three years after they have been presented to his majesty for his approbation or disallowance, they are not repealable by the crown after that time: and the provinces of Connecticut and Rhode Island are not under any obligation by their respective constitutions to return authentic copies of their laws to the crown for approbation or disallowance, or to give any account of their proceedings. There is also this singularity in the governments of Connecticut and Rhode Island, that there, laws are not repealable by the crown, but the validity of them depends upon their being not contrary, but as near as may be agreeable, to the laws of England."

Its laws:

THE laws of the greatest consequence in this colony are thus specified by Mr. Dummer: "There has been from the beginning, an office erected by law in every county, where all conveyances of land are entered at large, after the granters have first acknowledged them before a justice of peace, by which means no person can sell his estate twice, or take up more money upon it than it is worth. Provision has likewise been made for the security of life and property, in the election of juries, who are not returned by the sheriff of the county, but are chosen by the inhabitants of the towns; and this election is under the exactest regulation that human prudence can suggest, for preventing corruption." Our author observes, "That sheriffs in the plantations are comparatively but little officers, and therefore not to be trusted like ours. Redress in the New Eng-

a "land courts of law, says he, is very quick and cheap: all processes are in English, and
 "no special pleadings or demurrers are admitted; but the general issue is always given;
 "and special matters brought in evidence; which saves time and expence: and in this "case a man is not liable to lose his estate for a defect in form, nor is the merit of the "cause made to depend on the niceties of clerkship. By a law of the country, no writ
 "may be abated for a circumstantial error, such as a slight misnomer, or any informa"lity. And by another law, it is enacted, that every attorney taking out a writ from "the clerk's office, shall indorse his surname upon it, and be liable to pay the adverse
 "party his costs and charges in case of non-prosecution or discontinuance, or that the "plaintiff be non-suited, or judgment pass against him. And it is provided in the same
 b "act, That if the plaintiff shall suffer a non-suit by the attorney's mislaying the action,
 "he shall be obliged to draw a new writ without a fee, in case the party shall see fit to "receive the suit: for the quicker dispatch of causes, declarations are made parts of "the writ, in which the case is particularly set forth. If it be matter of accompt, the "accompt is annexed to the writ, and copies of both left with the defendant, which
 "being done fourteen days before the sitting of the court, he is obliged to plead di"rectly, and the issue is then tried. Nor are the people of New England oppressed with "the infinite delays and expence that attend proceedings in chancery. But as in all "other countries, England only excepted, jus & equum are held the same, and never "divided; so it is here, a power of chancery being vested in the judges of the courts c "of common law, as to some particular cases, and they make equitable constructions in "others. The fees of officers of all sorts are settled by acts of assembly at moderate "prices."

THE reader may easily conceive that the New England people originally were more than commonly strict in their morals and religion. The same strictness continues to this day; and renders their laws in some cases very rigorous, but in others most equitable. Adultery, blasphemy, striking or cursing a parent, is by them punished with death; as is perjury, where life may be affected. No person can be arrested if he has the means of making any satisfaction. Quakers, Jesuits, and Popish priests are to be banished, but if they return they are to suffer death. Great care is taken by their laws of the mod rals of the Indians, and to prevent drunkenness, swearing and cursing; and one of their laws ought to be mentioned to their everlasting honour, which is, that Christian strangers flying from tyranny are to be maintained by the public, or otherwise provided for.

EVERY town, if it contains thirty burgeses, can send two representatives to parliament; Government:
 if twenty, one; but Boston nominates four. There is in the assembly the peculiar privilege of selecting the members of the council, or what we may call their house of lords, who act as assistants to the governor; but he must approve of the election. The prudence of the colonies of Connecticut and Rhode Island served them in great stead when their charters were called in by Charles II. for they surrendered only that which had been e granted them by the crown; but, when the revolution took place, they produced that which they held from the Massachusetts company, which never had been revoked, and which entitled them annually to elect their own governor, and to command their own militia:
 They went so far in asserting this last privilege, that when king William appointed Benja- min Fletcher, Esq; who was governor of New York and Pensylvania, to command the Con- necticut forces, the province refused to obey him. Boston itself is well fortified. The ap- Boston de- proach to it by shipping is narrow, but its basin is said to be large enough to contain five scribed.
 hundred sail. Few cities in Europe enjoy more public conveniencies than it does. It is populous and well built, beyond any in England, London excepted; and two gazettes are regularly printed here every week; the town containing no fewer than five printingf presses. The progress the inhabitants are daily making in the arts, sciences, and polite literature of every kind, is amazing, and the measures taken by the government for the advancement of learning in New England, will put the colleges there on a footing with any in Europe. With regard to their commerce, the people of New England are the greatest traders on the continent of America. They acquire vast profits by ship-building.
 Their soil produces every fruit that is to be found in Europe; apples particularly, from which they export excellent cyder to the Antilles. They have a race of little horses peculiar to themselves, whose hardiness and swiftness are almost incredible. Their inland trade, besides masts, yards, and provisions of all kinds, consists chiefly of furs, and the skins of beavers and martins. The furs are brought in by the Indians, who find their account in g hunting, which they would not do were it not for the English markets. The greatest part of the skins are furnished by the Indians upon the rivers Penobscot and St. John; the former bring in bear and elk skins, and the latter beaver and otter skins. Those of St. John tend

send in, one year with another, three thousand martins skins, and those of Penobscot double that number.

Trade.

THE foreign trade of New England consists of various articles. At the mouth of the river Penobscot there is a mackarel fishery; from which the inhabitants supply Barbadoes, and other British islands in America. They likewise fish in winter for cod, which they dry in the frost. Their salt works are upon the improving hand; and it is said they will soon have salt sufficient to serve themselves. Rich mines of iron of a most excellent kind and temper have been discovered in New England, and if improved, in a short time they may supply Great Britain, without having recourse to the northern nations for that commodity. Besides mackarel and cod, they send to Barbadoes and the other British islands, biscuit, meal, salt, provisions, sometimes cattle and horses, planks, hoops, shingles, pipe-staves, butter, cheese, grain, oil, tallow, turpentine, bark, calf-skins, tobacco, apples, and onions; and of these merchandizes Barbadoes takes annually to the value of 100,000 l. sterling. From Barbadoes and those islands they bring in return, sugar, cotton, ginger, and various other commodities. From Europe they import wine, silks, woollen cloth, toys, hard-ware, linen, ribbons, stuffs, laces, paper, house-furniture, husbandry tools of all kinds, cordage, hats, stockings, shoes, and India goods, to the value of above 400,000 l. a year. In short, there is no British manufacture that serves the purposes of use, luxury or ornament, which the people of New England do not import. Their money, till lately, was all paper, struck into what they call province-bills, which occasioned many inconveniences, and the manufactures are but few; nor are they much encouraged by their mother-country, for obvious reasons. They are however daily improving, and the two last wars with France and Spain have introduced abundance of hard money.

Religion.

WITH regard to religion, before the year 1740, the province of Massachusetts Bay contained above one hundred English congregations, besides thirty assemblies of Indian Christians. But of all those congregations not above three or four of them followed the forms of the church of England. Every particular society amongst them is independent of all other ecclesiastical jurisdiction; nor does there lie any appeal from their punishments or censures. Their church-government admits of synods, but those synods have no power to enforce their own acts, or to establish any thing coercive: all they can do is, to deliberate on general matters, which are to be laid before the several churches, who have power to reject or approve of them as they see proper. The magistrates have power to call a synod upon any particular exigency, and even to give their opinion in it. The ministers of Boston depend entirely on the generosity of their hearers for their support; a voluntary contribution being made for them by the congregation every time divine service is celebrated. The police of the inhabitants of New England, with regard to their morals, is preferable perhaps to that of any in the world. Every town of fifty families is obliged to maintain a school for reading and writing, and of 100 families a grammar-school for the instruction of youth. Thus vices that are common in all other parts of the world, are unknown in New England, if their great increase of power and riches has not introduced them. Their children being early habituated to industry of every kind, have no ideas of expensive pleasure or enervating debauches. Their constitution in church and state confirms them in this sobriety of habit. They have no holidays but that of the annual election of the magistrates of Boston, and the commencement at Cambridge. Thus an uninterrupted course of industry and application to business prevails all the year round. New England is divided into 12 counties, each county-town containing a guildhall, and the whole consists of 61 market-towns, 27 fortified places upon eleven navigable rivers, and 2 colleges. Before the year 1743, their shipping was said to have consisted of at least 1000 sail, exclusive of their fishing barks; but since that time their shipping has been so greatly increased, that it is on a moderate calculation thought, that, during the late war, the privateers of New England were equal to all the royal navy of England in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Dutch inhabitants of New York.

IT is difficult, and indeed immaterial, to settle the claims of prior possession amongst the colonists of America. Capt. Hudson an Englishman is said to have been the first who discovered this country; and about the year 1608 he sold it to the Dutch. This transaction was certainly very questionable, as it had not the sanction of James the First, without which it was thought it was not in the power of a private subject to dispose of so important and so fine a track of country. The Dutch however proceeded to settle it: the court of England complained of this settlement, and of the Dutch placing a governor over it. The Dutch however kept possession, though James I. protested against the settlement.

Sir

- a Sir Samuel Argal, in his way from Virginia to New Scotland, attacked and destroyed their plantations, by order, it is to be presumed, from the court of England, while he was governor of Virginia. Upon this, the Dutch applied to king James for a confirmation of Hudson's conveyance; but all they could obtain was, leave to build some cottages for the convenience of their ships, touching for fresh water, in their way to Brazil. This permission afforded them pretexts for enlarging their settlements, till at last, New Netherlands, as the province was then called, became a flourishing colony, and carried on a very considerable trade with the neighbouring Indians, and even with those of Canada. In process of time they built the town of Amsterdam in Manabattan island, at the mouth of Hudson's, or as they called it, the Great river, Nassau bay lying towards the east. About 150 miles up the river they built Orange-fort, which was their great staple for their commerce with the Indians, as will be seen in the history of Canada.

THE extent of the province-government or jurisdiction of New York is as follows; from N. to S. that is, from Sandy Hook, in lat. 40 d. 30 m. to the supposed Canada line in the parallel of 45 d. lat. are 313 English miles; the extent from west to east is various: 1. From the E. southerly termination of the boundary line, between the Jerseys and New York, in lat. 41 d. upon Hudson's river, to Byram river, where the colony of Connecticut begins, are 100 miles. 2. From the W. northerly termination of the said boundary line between Jersey and New York, on the north branch of Delaware river, in lat. 41 d. 40 m. to Connecticut W. line, including the oblong, are 82 miles, whereof about 60 miles from Delaware river to Hudson's river, and 22 miles from Hudson's river to the present Connecticut W. line, oblong included. 3. From 41 d. 40 m. on Delaware river, New York runs 20 miles higher on Delaware river to the parallel of 41 d. lat. which by Pennsylvania royal grant divides New York from the province of Pennsylvania. Upon this parallel New York is supposed to extend west to Lake Erie; and from thence along Lake Erie, and along along Lake Cataraqui, and its discharge Cataraqui river, to the aforesaid Canada supposed line with the British colonies. We shall instance the breadth of New York province from Oswego; as being a medium in this line. Oswego fort and trading place, with many nations of Indians upon the Lake Ontario, Cataraqui or Oswego, in lat. 43 d. m. lies W. northerly from Albany about 200 miles, and 20 miles from Albany to the west line of the province of Massachusetts's Bay, in all about 200 miles. Montreal lies N. by E. of Albany above 220 miles.

summary.

- SEVERAL islands belong to the province of New York, such as Long Island, which the Dutch call Nassau, and is about 120 miles long from east to west, but no more at a medium than 10 broad. The eastern part of this island was settled from New England, but two thirds of the island is a barren sandy soil. Staten island is about 12 miles in length N. and 6 in breadth, and is inhabited by Dutch and French, as well as English. Tantucket, Martha's vineyard, and Elizabeth islands; formerly belonged likewise to New York, but were by the new charter of Massachusetts's Bay granted at the revolution, annexed to that colony. New York contains four incorporated towns, which have several exclusive privileges, and send representatives to the general assembly. The names of the towns are as follow: 1. New York and its territory, which was established by colonel Dungan, and sends four representatives to the general assembly. 2. The city of Albany, which sends two representatives. 3. The town of West-Chester; and 4. that of Schenectady, each of which sends one. The climate and soil of New York are greatly superior even to those of New England, which made it an object greatly desirable by the English. The history of New York, during the time the Dutch held it, affords little or nothing material, but what will be found in that of Canada. Its first Dutch governor was Henry Christien, who discovered Martha's vineyard, and he was succeeded by Jacob Elkir, who was appointed to that government by the Dutch West India company, to whom the country belonged. When the Dutch war became inevitable in the year 1664, King Charles II. made a present of vast tracks of land in those countries to his brother the duke of York; in which New York was included, and the duke let it out in other subdivisions to other proprietors. To render those gifts effectual, Sir Robert Car., an English commander of great courage and spirit, before the declaration of the first Dutch war, was sent with a strong squadron, and three thousand land troops, the greatest armament that had been ever sent from Europe to America, with orders to dispossess the Dutch of this fine country, and to put the duke of York in possession of it. He was attended, as we have already seen in the history of New England, by colonel Richard Nicholls, Esq; George Carteret, Esq; and Samuel Maverick, Esq; and he landed his land-forces on Manabattan island, towards the end of the year 1664, and he and Nicholls marched directly against the town of New Amsterdam. The Dutch governor, though a brave man, being unprovided to receive them, was obliged to capitulate, and to deliver up the place. The capitulation was wise and honourable; for all all the Dutch subjects who were willing to submit to the English government were at liberty to reside in the place, and protected in their persons and effects. The town, at that time, was one of the handsomest in all North America; and above half of the Dutch inhabitants chose to submit to the English government, while others were at liberty to carry off their effects; and were succeeded by the English, who gave the colony the name of New York. The first English governor of New York was colonel Nicholls, who 13 days after the surrender of New Amsterdam, marched to Orange fort, which was likewise surrendered to him; and all the straggling plantations in that country fell under the power of the English. The correspondence, in point of religion and morals, between the Dutch, the New England men, and the chief English planters of New York, render the subjection of the former very easy, and even desirable to themselves. Nicholls acted as governor under the duke of York to the year 1683, and seems to have been a wise provident person. It was he who concluded the useful treaty between the Indians of the five nations and the English inhabitants, which subsists to this day. The Dutch however recovered New York in 1672, but restored it a few months after by the treaty of peace. Nicholls was succeeded in this government in 1683 by Sir Edmund Andros, whom we have had occasion to mention in the history of New England, and Andros by colonel Dungan, afterwards earl of Limerick.

Dungan
governor.

DUNGAN, though a papist, and devoted to king James, had a just sense of the interests of England, and was an irreconcilable enemy to the French in America. While king James was on the throne, an order came to him from England, to admit French missionaries from Quebec, to make converts to popery in New York. The colonel could not dispute the order; but he kept so strict an eye upon the missionaries, that he soon perceived their main intention was to debauch the five Indian nations from their friendship with England; upon which he turned them out of the colony, telling them that they came there not to serve the religion, but the trade, of France. The French king complained to the court of England of Dungan's honest proceeding, and it was thought he must have lost his government had king James continued much longer upon the throne. When the revolution took place, his religion disqualified him from continuing in the government of New York; but king William had so just a sense of his merit, that he offered to procure him a considerable command in the Spanish army, which Dungan refused to accept of, on account of his obligations to king James. After the revolution the French found means to spirit up the Hurons against the inhabitants of New York; and colonel Benjamin Fletcher, the next governor, was ordered to carry over from England thither some land-troops for the protection of the colony. In the mean while, viz. 1690, colonel Peter Schuyler, an inhabitant of New York, raised 300 English and 300 friendly Indians, with whom he marched against Quebec. This seems to have been an ill-digested expedition, as it was easy to foresee that the English force, which was destitute of heavy artillery, was insufficient for mastering any strong place. It appears, however, from the French historians themselves, that it was necessary, because a formal plan had been laid by the French of Canada for conquering New York. Schuyler advanced into Canada with great intrepidity, and was opposed by a superior army of French, which, according to the English accounts, he defeated, and after killing 300 of them, perceiving his strength to be too small to attempt any thing of great consequence, he returned home. Soon after this, the French invaded the province of New York, took and burnt the town of Schenectady, and murdered the inhabitants. It was thought with some appearance of truth, that this invasion was favoured by certain creatures of Andros, all of them papists, who had, under his government, been introduced into this province. The truth is, Fletcher not arriving, the government of New York was at this time in a state of anarchy, when one colonel Lesley put himself at the head of the affairs of the province, in conjunction with one Mr. Jacob Milbourn. This was a wise, and, perhaps, necessary step, had not the two associates been wrong-headed enough to imagine, that they would be continued from England in their government, and that they were even strong enough to hold out against the governor named by king William. In the mean while, Fletcher arrived with his troops, and summoned Lesley and Milbourn to give up the fort of New York; which they not only refused to do, but killed one of Fletcher's soldiers. Fletcher however soon got possession of the fort, and ordered Lesley and Milbourn to be tried for high treason, which they accordingly were, and condemned, and executed. This was thought to be a cruel and arbitrary proceeding in Fletcher, and it was believed, that, had he not died at New York, he would have been sent prisoner to England.

proceedings.

AFTER this, the fort of New York was provided with a regular garrison, to prevent surprizes from the French or their Indians. During Fletcher's government, Frontenac, the

- a French governor of Canada, invaded Albany, the English barrier of New York, with 3000 French and Canadians. He advanced by Hudson's river, and, after a march of 300 miles, he fell into the country of the Orandague, one of the five nations in friendship with the English, where the count destroyed their habitations, corn, and provision. Fletcher hearing of this invasion, advanced against the count, and was joined by several of the friendly Indians, who were highly exasperated against the French and the Hurons. Upon this the count retreated, but with considerable loss, the English and the Iroquois falling upon his rear, and killing a great many of his men. Colonel Slaughter succeeded Fletcher in this government, as Joseph Dudley, Esq; did him. In the year 1697 the earl of Bellamont, as we have already seen, was named to the joint governments of New York and New England, and Mr. Nanfan acted as his deputy for the former. In 1700 Mr. Nanfan refused admittance, by orders from England, to the Scotch ships from Darien; a proceeding which was thought to be inhuman. The lord Cornbury, eldest son to the earl of Clarendon, upon lord Bellamont's death, was appointed governor of New York, and carried over thither his wife and family. His lordship is said to have carried matters with a very high hand; but the affairs of the colony were under him in excellent order. In 1710 five of the friendly Indian kings were sent to England, where they were kindly received at court; and they addressed queen Anne in the following terms:

Five Indian chiefs in England.

"Great Queen,

"We have undertaken a long voyage, which none of our predecessors could be prevailed with to undertake, to see our great queen, and relate to her those things which we thought absolutely necessary for the good of her and us her allies, on the other side of the water.

"We doubt not but our great queen has been acquainted with our long and tedious war, in conjunction with her children, against her enemies the French; and that we have been as a strong wall for their security, even to the loss of our best men. We were mightily rejoiced when we heard our great queen had resolved to send an army to reduce Canada; and immediately, in token of friendship, we hung up the kettle, and took up the hatchet, and, with one consent, assisted colonel Nicholson in making preparations on this side the lake: but at length we were told, our great queen, by some important affairs, was prevented in her design at present, which made us sorrowful, lest the French, who had hitherto dreaded us, should now think us unable to make war against them. The reduction of Canada is of great weight to our free hunting; so that if our great queen should not be mindful of us, we must, with our families, forsake our country, and seek other habitations, or stand neuter, either of which will be much against our inclinations.

"In token of the sincerity of these nations, we do, in their names, present our great queen with the belts of wampum, and, in hopes of our great queen's favour, leave it to her most gracious consideration."

In consequence of this address, the expedition under colonel Hill and Sir Hovenden Walker against Canada, which we have mentioned in the history of New England, was undertaken. General Nicholson was to command in chief the New York forces; of which, besides Indians, three regiments were raised, under the command of the colonels Ingoldsby, Schuyler, and Whiting. They accordingly marched towards Quebec; but, upon Walker's miscarriage, they returned to New York. After this, great numbers of Palatines and German protestants arrived, and were settled in the colony, which brought an additional strength to it. This was generally reckoned a Whig measure, and therefore a vote of the house of commons passed against it, as being an extravagant and unreasonable charge to the kingdom, tending to the increase and oppression of the English poor, and of dangerous consequence to the church. Nothing could be more false or ridiculous than (especially the last) those exceptions. But the new colonists were settled on both sides Hudson's river, between 80 or 100 miles above the city of New York. Lord Cornbury, at the same time he was governor of New York, was appointed governor of the Jerseys; and, when recalled from his government, he was succeeded by lord Lovellace, who arrived at New York, November 13, 1708, but died in May following. He was succeeded by colonel Ingoldsby, a captain of one of the independent companies, as lieutenant-governor; from which post he was removed by a letter from the queen to the council of New York. In 1710 colonel Hunter was appointed to the government of New York, where he arrived on the 14th of June that year, carrying with him 2700 Palatines to settle in that province. The Whig interest being then low in England, no more than ten acres were allowed to one family; upon which they were obliged to go to Pennsylvania, where they settled, and became part of that flourishing colony. As to Mr. Hunter, it is generally allowed that his abilities and integrity were equal to those of any governor that ever went from England to America. Having a true sense of the interest of the colony, he renewed the treaty, or, as it is called, the covenant-chain, with the five friendly nations of the Indians. Having lost his lady at New York, he returned in the year 1719 to England; and so well was he beloved by his government, that the assembly took leave of him in the most moving terms of gratitude and respect, as if he had been the common father of the province. This gentleman was afterwards governor of Jamaica.

Mr. Burnet
governor.

Mr. Hunter was succeeded in his government by William Burnet, Esq; son to the famous bishop of Salisbury. This gentleman has been already mentioned in the history of New England. The fatal South Sea year had affected his fortune; so that he found it expedient to change his place of comptroller-general of the customs at London, which was given to Mr. Hunter, for the government of New York and New Jersey. Before his arrival, advice came to New York, that the friendly Indians were meditating an expedition against some distant savages, and that they entertained amongst them one Caur, a Frenchman. The government of New York thought that such an expedition would be detrimental to the interests of the colony; and Peter Schuyler, Esq; then president of the council, and commander in chief of the province, appointed the following gentlemen, viz. John Riggs, Hend. Hanson, John Schuyler, Robert Lexington junior, and Peter Van Brugh, Esqs; to repair to Albany, as plenipotentiaries of the province, to treat with the Indians, and to dissuade them from their purpose, especially from entertaining Caur. The Indians accordingly met these gentlemen at Albany; and it appears, from the minutes of the conference, that the gentlemen of New York were very desirous that the savages to the southward should trade with their province; while the deputies of the five nations endeavoured to evade the question, as excluding themselves from that commerce; they offered, however, to treat with their southern brethren, if the latter would come to Albany, but not else. As to the affair of Caur, they fairly told the gentlemen, that they could not take it upon themselves, but that the English might do it if they pleased, or complain of him to the governor of Canada. As to the expedition they were about to undertake, they owned that they had such an intention, but that they could say nothing further concerning it, till they consulted at home with their young men and their sachems that were to head them; and thus the conference broke off. The state of affairs between the English and the five nations occasioned another conference with the latter; at which, besides the governor of New York, were present the governors of Pennsylvania and Virginia. This conference ended to the mutual satisfaction of all parties. It is allowed on all hands, that governor Burnet understood extremely well the interests of his government. The building of Oswego, a fortified warehouse for the convenience of trading with the Indians, was owing to him; and he, at last, succeeded in making the people of New York fully sensible, that it was not for their interest, to encourage the great trade carried on between them and the French in Canada. The latter indeed supplied the English with furs; but Mr. Burnet proved, that it was very practicable for the people of New York, by improving the superior advantages of situation they possessed, to secure to themselves all the skin-trade of the Indians to the south of St. Lawrence river, and all the north trade to Hudson's Bay; there being a much easier conveyance from Albany to Oswego, than from Montreal to Frontenac on the Lake Ontario; which last was likewise called Oswego, and was the French warehouse. In the year 1720, the governor obtained from the assembly, an act, prohibiting, for three years, all trade betwixt New York and Canada. Upon the expiration of this act, the London merchants who supplied the New York men with the commodities that they used to send to Canada (nine hundred pieces of woollen cloth having been carried from Albany to Montreal in one year) finding themselves deprived of this beneficial commerce, applied to the king and council against the continuance of the law; chiefly, on pretence, that the French could be supplied otherwise; and that if they were deprived of the English commodities, the French Canadians would apply themselves to woollen and other manufactures. This petition was by the council referred to a committee of the board of trade and plantations, who transmitted a copy of it, with the reasons on which it was founded, to governor Burnet; but his reply proved so satisfactory, that the act was continued, and in 1727 it was, by the assembly, made perpetual, and afterwards confirmed by the king and council in England. The good effects of this measure were soon seen.

Advantages of Oswego.

THE distant Indians, who came to traffic, instead of pursuing a long fatiguing journey to Montreal, stopt at Oswego, which had been built at the governor's private expence, on Lake Ontario, and was always garrisoned by twenty soldiers and a lieutenant. There the savages furnished themselves from the English at half the price they used to pay the French, with all the commodities they wanted. This naturally increased the trade of New York, and brought great numbers of British subjects into that province; so that it was no longer monopolized by a few overgrown merchants, but divided into many channels, to the immense profit of the colony. The consequence of this was, that the Indians became more familiar a familiar with the English, and entertained much higher ideas of their power than before: so that at the end of the war in 1748, the trade of New York was five times greater than it was under Mr. Burnet's government, and is likely, in a short time, to rival that of any of our colonies in America.

In 1727, on the accession of his majesty George II. to the crown of Great Britain, Mr. Burnet being promoted to the government of New England, was succeeded in that of New York by colonel Montgomery. Under this gentleman some doubts arose concerning the validity of their charters, obtained from former governors, in whose names they ran, and not in those of the kings and queens of England. They therefore petitioned their governor to procure them a royal charter, which he accordingly did, not only confirming their privileges, but enlarging their bounds. This charter, dated January 5, 1730, is in substance as follows: "They are incorporated by the name of the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York.—The city to be divided into seven wards, viz. West ward, South ward, Dock ward, East ward, North ward, Montgomery ward, and the Out ward, divided into the Bowery division and Harlem division.—The corporation to consist of one mayor, one recorder, and seven aldermen, seven assistants, one sheriff, one coroner, one common clerk, one chamberlain or treasurer, one high constable, sixteen assessors, seven collectors, sixteen constables, and one marshal. The mayor, with consent of the governor, may appoint one of the aldermen his deputy. The governor yearly to appoint the mayor, sheriff, and coroner, and the freeholders and freemen in their respective wards to chuse the other officers, excepting the chamberlain, who is to be appointed in council by the mayor, four or more aldermen, and four or more assistants. The mayor to appoint the high constable; all officers to take the proper oaths, and to continue in office till others have been chosen in their rooms. When any officer dies, the ward is to chuse another; upon refusal to serve in office, the common council may impose a fine not exceeding 15*l.* for the use of the corporation. The mayor, or recorder, and four or more aldermen, with four or more assistants, to be a common-council to make bye-laws, to regulate the freemen, to lease lands and tenements, &c. but to do nothing inconsistent with the laws of Great Britain, or of this province; such laws and orders not to continue in force exceeding twelve months, unless confirmed by the governor and council. May punish by disfranchising, or fines for the use of the corporation. The common council shall decide in all controverted elections of officers. The common council may be called by the mayor, or, in his absence, by the recorder; fine of a member for non-attendance not exceeding 20*s.* for the use of the corporation. The corporation may establish as many ferries as they may see fit, and let the same. To hold a market at five or more different places, every day of the week, excepting Sunday; to fix the assize of bread, wine, &c. The mayor, with four or more aldermen, may make freemen, fees not to exceed 5*l.*; none but freemen shall retail goods or exercise any trade, penalty 5*l.*; no aliens to be made free. To commit common vagabonds, direct workhouses, gaols, and alms-houses. The mayor to appoint the clerk of the market and water-bailiff; to license carmen, porters, criers, scavengers, and the like; to give licence to taverns and retailers of strong drink for one year, not exceeding 30*s.* per licence; selling without licence 5*l.* current money toties quoties. The mayor, deputy mayor, recorder, and aldermen, for the time being, to be justices of the peace. The mayor, deputy mayor, and recorder, or any one of them, with three or more of the aldermen, to be named in all commissions of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery. The mayor, deputy mayor, recorder, or any one of them, with three or more of the aldermen, shall and may hold every Tuesday a court of record, to try all civil causes, real, personal, or mixed, within the city and county. May adjourn the mayor's court to any time, not exceeding twenty-eight days. The corporation to have a common clerk, who shall be also clerk of the court of record, and sessions of the peace, to be appointed during his good behaviour, by the governor; eight attorneys in the beginning, but as they drop only six to be allowed, during their good behaviour, for the mayor's court; the mayor's court to have the direction and cognizance of the attorney, who, upon a vacancy, shall recommend one to the governor for his approbation. The mayor, recorder, or any alderman, may, with or without a jury, determine in cases not exceeding 40*s.* value. No freeman inhabitant shall be obliged to serve in any office out of the city. A grant and confirmation to all the inhabitants of their hereditaments, &c. paying the quit-rents reserved by their grants. The corporation may purchase and hold any hereditaments, &c. so as the clear yearly value exceed not 3000*l.* sterl. and the same to dispose of at pleasure. To pay a quit-rent of 30*s.* proclamation money per ann. besides the beaver skin, and 5*s.* current money in former charters required. No action to be allowed against the corporation, for any matters or cause whatsoever prior to this charter. A pardon of all prosecutions, forfeitures, &c. prior to this charter. This grant, or the inrollment thereof (record) shall be valid in law, notwithstanding of imperfections;

We have been the more particular upon this charter, as it is by far the most complete of any of our North American colonies; and its good effects are daily seen in the progressive flourishing state of that province. Colonel Montgomery, during the short time he acted as governor there, was charged with making judges without the advice of the council; but he died in July 1731, and his government in general has been greatly applauded. He is particularly mentioned, as having been a great promoter of mathematical knowledge in the colony. At the time Mr. Montgomery died, Rip Van Dam, Esq; being president of the council, acted in the capacity of governor and commander in chief of New York. It unfortunately happened for our American provinces at the time we now treat of, that a government in any of our colonies in those parts, was scarcely looked upon in any other light than that of an hospital, where the favourites of the ministry might lie till they had recovered their broken fortunes, and oftentimes they served as asylums from their creditors. Upon the death of colonel Montgomery, the French and their Indians became extremely troublesome to the people of New York, and the president gave notice accordingly to Mr. Belcher at Boston, who took the proper methods for obviating the danger. It was in the year 1732, when colonel Cosby arrived at his government at New York; and in the mean while, the president Van Dam had, at the colonel's request, advanced several sums on his account^a, which, on the governor's arrival, he not only refused to pay, but commenced actions for arrears of perquisites and fees belonging to him, which he alledged had been received by Van Dam. These altercations were attended with very bad consequences to the civil and commercial state of the colony; for the governor availed himself of his superior authority in the colony to oppress Van Dam; but the chief justice Morrice gave his opinion flatly in contradiction to the governor, whose daughter was married to lord Augustus Fitzroy, then captain of a man of war upon that station. It was during the government of that gentleman, that the French and their Indian allies grew extremely troublesome to the people of New England, which drew from the pen of the very intelligent Mr. Dummer, the New England agent, the following reproaches against the government of New York: "New York has always kept itself in a state of neutrality, contributing nothing to the common safety of the British colonies, while the Canada Indians, joined by parties of the French, used to make their route by the borders of New York, without any molestation from the English of that province, and fall upon the out-towns of New England. This behaviour was the more unpardonable in that government; because they have 400 regular troops maintained them at the king's charge, and have five nations of the Iroquois on their confines, who are entirely dependent on them, and might easily, had they been engaged in the common cause, have intercepted the French in their marches, and thereby have prevented the depredations on his majesty's subjects of New England. Solemn and repeated applications were made to the government of New York by the governors of the Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island, in joint letters on this subject, but in vain. The answer was, They could not think it proper to engage their Indians in actual war, lest they should endanger their own frontiers, and bring upon themselves an expence which they were in no condition to provide for. And thus the poor colonies, whose constitution was charter-government, were left to bear the whole burthen, without any help from those provinces, whose governors held their commissions from the crown."

By this change it appears, that the people of New York in general thought they were by no means obliged to involve themselves in inconveniences on account of their neighbours; and to lay the truth, the prosperity of their colony was, in a great measure, owing to their cultivating a good understanding with the native Indians of all nations, not to mention, that, by the situation of their country, their frontier was more exposed than that of any other colony to the inroads of those barbarians. This appeared in the year 1734, when the motions of the Indians, under the French influence, made them apprehensive of an invasion. Upon this occasion, the assembly, without entering upon any offensive measures, came to several resolutions for their own defence. Six thousand pounds were voted for fortifying the city of New York; 4000 for erecting a stone fort, and other conveniences for soldiers and artillery at Albany; 800 for a fort and block-houses at Schenectady, and 500 for managing the Senecas and Indian nation, and, if practicable, for building fortifications in their country.

In the mean while, the conduct of the governor, Cosby, became every day more obnoxious to the independent and spirited part of the inhabitants. He had altered the chief justice Morrice out of his place, for opposing him in his dispute with Van Dam, and he

a had turned the courts of law into a court of chancery; against which the best lawyers of the province had flatly given their opinions; because the constitution of the courts in that colony were originally the same with those in England. Those proceedings rendered the governor and his administration so unpopular, that one John Peter Zenger, a printer, was privately encouraged by the inhabitants to publish a weekly journal, wherein the political affairs of the colony, and the governor and his council, were very freely treated, particularly on account of their arbitrary innovations in the courts of law; their depriving the subjects of the privilege of trials by jury, and, in short, of all kinds of oppressive proceedings; so that the colonists were leaving the province, where they could call nothing their own. About two months after the first publication of this paper, De Lancey, the new chief justice, charged the grand jury to find a bill against Zenger, which they refused to do. Upon this, a committee of the council and the assembly conferred together, and the former required the latter to join with them in a vote for burning, by the hands of the common hangman, three numbers of the said journal. But when the committee of assembly reported the conference, it was resolved to take no concern in the matter, and they returned the papers left with them by the committee of the council. The latter, upon this, ordered, by their own authority, the papers in question to be burnt, which was executed by the hands of the sheriff; for so unpopular was the government, that none of the inferior people could be prevailed on to act on the occasion as common hangman. At last Zenger was imprisoned by a warrant from the governor, and the council assembled on a Sunday; and after thirty-five weeks severe imprisonment, he was ordered to be tried the 4th of August 1735. His council had prepared objections to the commission of the judges, but they were over-ruled, and forbidden to practice in the New York courts. A council, however, was allowed for Zenger; and a lawyer, Andrew Hamilton, Esq; of Philadelphia, though aged and infirm, hearing of the distresses of the prisoner, and the importance of the trial, came to New York on purpose to plead Zenger's cause.

Trial and acquittal of Zenger the printer.

It is on account of Hamilton's spirited and sensible behaviour, as well as to give our readers an idea of the oppressions the colony lay under at this time, that we are so particular as to this trial. A jury was struck out of the freeholders book; and, upon the trial, Hamilton offered to prove the contents of the journal to be true, which obliged the attorney-general to have recourse to that ridiculous doctrine of the law, that truth, far from justifying a libel, aggravates it. This argument was combated with such learning as well as vivacity by Hamilton, whose pleading on this occasion was very fine, that the jury, as did that of the seven bishops in James II's time, looked upon themselves to be judges of the law as well as the fact, and brought in the prisoner not guilty. This acquittal was so much the more mortifying to the governor, as the common council of the city of New York, to the great satisfaction of their fellow-citizens, presented Mr. Hamilton his freedom of their corporation in a gold box, with many classical inscriptions upon it, greatly to his honour. Mr. Cosby, after a most unpopular and iniquitous government, was succeeded in the administration in 1736, by George Clarke, Esq; and in May 1741, the honourable George Clinton, Esq; uncle to the earl of Lincoln, and afterwards admiral of the white, was nominated to the government of New York. Nothing remarkable happened with regard to this colony during the two last administrations, till the breaking out of the late war with France, of which we shall treat in its proper place, that we may avoid repetitions as much as possible, as the history of all the British empire in America will then come under our view.

Pleading of Hamilton.

THIS is a crown-government, administered by a governor, who has his commission under the broad seal of England. The legislative power and authority is lodged in the governor; the council, who are twelve in number, appointed by the king, but are filled up by the governor when vacancies happen, and twenty-seven representatives elected by the people. In other respects the government is as conformable to the laws of England as that of a colony can be. The exercise of the government is in the governor and council; of whom five is a quorum; and upon the death or absence of the governor, the first in nomination in the council is to preside. The people chuse their representatives, the numbers of whom are fixed by the crown; and those representatives have much the same privileges with the members of the British parliament. All modes of the christian religion not detrimental to society are tolerated in this colony, the Roman Catholic excepted.

As to the trade of New York, it consists in wheat, flower, skins, furs, oil of whales, and sea-calves, iron and copper, of both which very rich mines have been discovered there. We have already mentioned the great intercourse between this colony and the Indians. The industry of the inhabitants is equal to that of any people on the face of the globe. They trade not only with England, but with Spain, Portugal, Africa, and all the West-India islands, not excepting the French and Dutch, and even with the Spanish continent in America, by which they are enabled to pay in gold and silver for the manufactures they bring bring from their mother-country. The soil of the province is fertile almost beyond belief. All kind of black cattle are more numerous here than in any European country, and they have a breed of excellent horses. Eight years ago the horses of New York city were computed to be about 5000; but they are since that time greatly encreased; and few cities in Europe can vie with it in regularity and neatness. The trade of the inhabitants is chiefly carried on by water-carriage, and ships of 500 tons may come up to the wharfs of the city, and be always afloat. Hudson's river, where it runs by New York, is above three miles broad, and proves a noble conveyance for the goods of the counties of Albany, Ulster, Dutchess, Orange, and Winchester, to that city. It contains six markets, said to be better supplied with all kinds of provision than any in Europe. The facility of the voyage from New York to England and the West Indies, has been of infinite service to this colony; for by the lowness of the freight, they purchase furs at a very cheap rate for strouds (a woollen manufacture established at Stroud in England) and other woollen goods; all which are sure of a ready vent with the Indians. Bristol is the chief place in England, which the colonists of New York trade with, and they generally perform at least two voyages in a year with so much safety, that the insurance upon shipping in time of peace is no more than two per cent. As to the amount of their trade with their mother-country, it was seven years ago computed that their imports from it were annually about 150,000 l; but they are since so much increased with the trade of the colony, that we cannot venture to assign them a value.

Discovery of
New Jersey.

THIS province naturally comes to be treated of after New York, as both were formerly under the same governor, and it formed part of New Holland when conquered from the Dutch. The Senecas and the Maquas were amongst the native Indians, who originally inhabited this territory, which is said to have been discovered first by Capt. Hudson. It is certain, however, that it was not inhabited by the English long after the discovery, and the first Europeans we find settled here were the Swedes, who chiefly seated on the south-side of the river Raritan, now called Delaware river, towards the frontiers of Pennsylvania. Here they had three towns, Christina, Gottembourg, and Elfsimborg, which last retains its name to this day. Notwithstanding this, it was afterwards found, or pretended (when Charles II. perceived it convenient for his purpose), that Sebastian Cabot had formerly taken possession of all this coast in the name of Henry VII. of England. Be this as it will, it is certain that the Swedes in general, having no great turn for commercial affairs or territorial improvements, suffered their settlement here to languish; so that the Dutch almost entirely planted the north parts of New Jersey by the name of Nova Belgia, and, about the year 1665, Rizing the Swedish general sold to them all the Swedish possessions. After this, New Jersey, with the three lower counties of Pennsylvania upon Delaware river, became part of the New Netherlands or Nova Belgia. When the reduction of this province was resolved upon by Charles II. he made a previous grant of both the property and government of it to his brother the duke of York, by a deed, dated March 12, 1663-4; and that duke assigned the government of that part, which is called New Jersey, to the lord Berkley and Sir George Carteret. This last grant was posterior to the duke of York's commission granted to governor Nichols. The first lieutenant-governor of New Jersey, so called from the great property Sir George Carteret had in the island of Jersey, was Philip Carteret, Esq; who entered on his government in August 1665. The duke of York's grant was from the Noorde Rivier, now called Hudson's river, to the Zuyde Rivier, now called Delaware river; and up Hudson's river to 41 d. N. lat. and up Delaware river to 41 d. 40 m. and from these two stations headed by a strait line across. It does not appear, that, when this grant was made, the Dutch opposed it, or the settlement that was made by the proprietors under the duke of York. When the New Netherlands, in the manner we have seen in the history of New York, was conquered from the Dutch, it was thought proper, that king Charles should renew his grant to his brother, who by lease and release, July 28 and 29, 1674, conveyed to Sir George Carteret the eastern division of New Jerseys, divided from the western division of the Jerses by a strait line from the S. E. point of Little Egg Harbour on Barnegate Creek, being about the middle between Sandy Hook and Cape May, to a kill or creek a little below Rencokus Kill on Delaware river, and thence (about thirty-five miles) by a strait course along Delaware river up to 41 d. 40 m. N. lat. the north divisional line between New York and the Jerses.

Douglas's
Summary.

WHEN Mr. Carteret entered upon his government, which comprehended the joint concern of both the proprietors, the people of Elizabeth-Town were extremely unmanageable, and upon the commencement of the quit-rents, March 25, 1670, they refused to pay them, under pretence that they held their possessions by Indian grants, and not from the proprietors.

a proprietors. This mutiny went so far, that they in fact displaced their governor, and chose a new one, a dissolute son of Sir George Carteret, so that the governor was obliged to go to England with his complaints. In the mean time, the conquest of the New Netherlands happening, every thing grew more quiet, and governor Carteret returned in November 1674, with new concessions, as they were called, which confirmed the public tranquillity. Sir George Carteret, as we have seen, having obtained East Jersey, the West Jersey, which borders upon Pennsylvania, remained to Lord Berkeley; and he, in 1676, resigned his right therein to William Pen, Esq; Mr. Gawen Laurie, of London, merchant; Mr. Nicholas Lucas, of London, merchant; and Mr. Edward Bylling; who agreed upon a new partition with Sir George Carteret, which was confirmed by the duke of York, and afterwards by a general assembly of the Jerseys. On December the 25th, 1678, Sir George Carteret made over East Jersey to certain trustees, who were to sell it at his death; and accordingly, February 2, 1681-2, they assigned it to the following twelve persons, William Penn, Robert West, Thomas Rudyard, Samuel Groom, Thomas Hart, Richard Mew, Thomas Wilcox, Ambrose Riggs, John Haward, Hugh Hartshorn, Clemens Plumsted, and Thomas Cooper. These twelve proprietors conveyed one half of their interest to twelve other persons separately, viz. Robert Berkley, Edward Bylling, Robert Turner, James Brien, Arent Soumans, William Gibson, Gawen Laurie, Thomas Barker, Thomas Everner, James earl of Perth, Robert Gordon, and John Drummond. This conveyance was afterwards confirmed by the duke of York. Soon after this, the proprietors sold shares of East New Jersey to James Drummond earl of Perth, John Drummond, Esq; Sir George Mackenzie, Robert Barclay, and David Barclay of Ury, Esqrs. Robert Gordon, Esq; Mr. Robert Burnet, Mr. Gawen Laurie, Mr. Thomas Nairn, Mr. James Braine, Mr. William Dockwra, Mr. Peter Soumans, Mr. William Gibson, Thomas Cox, Esq; Mr. Walter Benthal, Mr. Robert Turner, Mr. Thomas Barker, and Mr. Edward Bylling. The conveyances to those gentlemen were likewise confirmed by the duke of York in 1682. A governor and lieutenant-governor was then provided, the nomination of the former falling upon Robert Barclay, the famous quaker, and of the latter upon Gawen Laurie. Subgranted.
Barclay, the
vernor.

It must be confessed that the mixture of proprietors in this settlement was very extraordinary. They consisted of very high prerogative men, especially those from Scotland, of dissenters, papists, and quakers. It perhaps is not too bold a conjecture to say, that this heterogeneous mixture of religions was privately encouraged by the duke of York, that he might make an experiment of that favourite toleration which he afterwards, so fatally for himself, attempted to introduce into England. It is remarkable, that though all the patentees of lord Berkley's division of West New Jersey, excepting one, were proprietors of East New Jersey, yet their governments still continued to be distinct. The Scots, however, who were the principal settlers, were ill fitted for such an undertaking; and the settlement of East New Jersey languished most miserably. The proprietors chose Mr. William Dockwra for their register and secretary, and one Lockhart for their marshal; they then proceeded to schemes of partition, and laid out counties, parishes, and towns, reserving to themselves one seventh. The terms of purchase were, that every master of a family was to have fifty acres set out, and twenty-five for his wife; and each of his children and servants, paying 12 d. a-head to the register; servants, when their times expired, were to have thirty acres. All persons to pay 2 d. an acre quit-rent, or purchase their freeholds at 50 s. for every twenty-five acres taken up. Mr. Laurie, who had a considerable interest in West New Jersey, was thought to be partial to that division; for while he held the government before Berkley's arrival, he refused to obey the proprietors in removing the courts from Elizabeth-Town to Perth Amboy, the situation of which pointed it out as the capital of the province; but had every thing else succeeded with our new settlers, they were under one capital defect, that must have overthrown all their schemes; we mean, the want of industry and inhabitants. Berkley, after his arrival, did not continue long in New Jersey, and was succeeded in his government by lord Neil Campbell, of the Argyle family. After the revolution, in 1696, colonel Andrew Hamilton was appointed governor, and was succeeded next year by Jeremiah Basse, Esq; who being recalled, colonel Hamilton was reinstated in the government, which a few months after was given to Basse. The latter was succeeded by colonel Andrew Brown, who held it at the time that the proprietors surrendered the sovereignty of it to queen Anne in 1701.

Such in general is the history of this insignificant province, while it continued a separate government; nor can it admit of a more particular detail. As to West Jersey, or lord Berkley's division, the history of it is equally unimportant. From the year 1674, Sir Edmund Andros, whom we have spoken of in the history of New England, under colour of a commission from the duke of York, wrested the government from lord Berkley's assignees; but they recovered it, and having obtained a new grant in 1680, they chose Edward Bylling, Esq; for their governor. In 1690, Dr. Daniel Cox, of the college of physicians in London, Andros go-don, having purchased the greatest part of the property of West Jersey, appointed himself a governor, but never went over thither, and at last sold all his interest there for good to Sir Thomas Lane. All this while, the contentions amongst the sharers of both the Jerseys, both about matters of property and the right of appointing a governor, had reduced the two provinces to a most lamentable condition; and the proprietors wisely resolved to resign its government to the crown, reserving all their other rights. Accordingly, 'on the 22d of April 1702, Sir Thomas Lane, in the name of the proprietors of West New Jersey, and Mr. William Dockwra, in the name of those of East New Jersey, having resigned the governments of these respective provinces to queen Anne, her majesty immediately appointed the lord Cornbury for their governor, and his secretary was Mr. Basse the late governor. At the same time, the proprietors obtained of the crown, in favour of themselves and the people, a set of standing instructions, which were to serve as rules for the conduct of future governors. The heads of those instructions were well calculated for the good of the colony. The first was, that the governor should consent to no tax upon lands that were vacant or unprofitable. The second, that no lands should be purchased of the Indians, but by the general proprietors; and the third, which was a most excellent provision, was, that all lands purchased should be improved by the possessors. The government of the two Jerseys was then held by a governor, council, and assembly. The council was to be chosen by the governor, who had power to appoint his lieutenant-governor; and though the price of lands was still very low, yet after the two provinces came into one government, the affairs of the colony took a very favourable turn. It then appeared that the two provinces of the East and West New Jerseys, had in fact been made jobs of by different proprietors, who had bought them without the least regard to the good of the colonies, but that they might sell them again. For many years the governors of the province of New Jersey (for so it was called) was vested in the governor of New York; and before the peace of Utrecht, it was thought to contain above sixteen thousand inhabitants; but at present three times that number. Upon the death of colonel Cosby, whom we have already mentioned, the government of the Jerseys was detached from that of New York, and was given to Lewis Morrice, Esq; who had been chief justice of New York, and died May 14, 1744. He was succeeded by Jonathan Belcher, Esq; whose first meeting with the provincial assembly was on the 22d of August the same year. The history of New Jersey now falling in with that of the other British colonies of America, during the two last wars with France, we shall therefore proceed to its civil history.

Constitution,

IN the civil constitution of New Jersey, we find there are three negatives. 1. That of the governor, who is likewise vice admiral and chancellor of the province. 2. That of the council, which, with the governor, forms a court of error and chancery. 3. Of the house of representatives, twenty of whom serve for counties, and the remaining four for the two towns, or cities, as they are called, of Perth Amboy and Burlington. This house, though no court of judicature, has the privilege of enquiring into the mal-administration of the courts of justice. Upon the duke of York's granting the two Jerseys to lord Berkley and Sir George Carteret, Nicholls, who was then governor of New Jersey for that duke, apprehending that he might be superseded in his government, took advantage of the instructions of his patent, and gave leave to certain persons to purchase lands from the Indians, subject to certain quit-rents; and the like was done by Carteret, the first governor under the assignees. Such purchases being expressly against the spirit of the duke of York's grant, and yet good in law, created inexpressible disturbances and confusion in this government; but the Indian purchasers seem to have had the better in the dispute, which we apprehend is not yet quite decided.

New Jersey.*

NEW JERSEY, according the common maps, is bounded on the south-east by Delaware Bay, and by that river on the south and west; and on the north by New York and unknown countries; and by the Atlantic Ocean on the east. It lies betwixt north lat. 39 m. 10 d. and 41 m. 35 d. and betwixt west long. 73 m. 46 d. and 75 m. 15 d. It is in length on the sea-coast, and along Hudson's river, that is, from south to north, about 140 miles, and about 80 where broadest; but this mensuration is all conjecture. East Jersey is divided into four counties, viz. those of Monmouth, Middlesex, Essex, and Bergen. It contains a town called Middleton, which is 26 miles south of Piscataque; but its principal town is Shrewsbury, which is the most southern town in the province, and contains about 30,000 out-plantation acres. Between Shrewsbury and Middleton is an iron-work. The chief town of Essex county, and indeed in both the Jerseys, is Elizabeth-Town, which lies opposite to the westward of Staten island. The greatest part of the trade of the province is here carried on. Newark is another town in Essex county, and has annexed to it about 50,000 acres; but great part of them remains still to be cultivated. Middlesex county has for its chief town Perth Amboy, which, in reality, ought to be the provincial town of East Jersey. It stands near the mouth of Delaware river, as it runs into the mouth of Sandy Hook Bay, which a which is never frozen, and is capacious enough to contain 500 ships. It is generally allowed that this might have been rendered one of the finest towns in all North America, had it not been for the mismanagement of the Scotch planters, and the practices of Gavin Lurie, the deputy governor before mentioned. Bergen county lies upon Hudson's river, and is extremely well watered; but in general it is but thinly inhabited. Brunswick is another town in this province, where a college for the instruction of youth was established October 22, 1746, by governor Belcher. The trustees of this college are generally presbyterians, and it is governed by a president.

As to West Jersey, it was intended by Dr. Cox to be laid out into seven counties; but this project never took effect. It is not now so well planted as East Jersey, though it lies equally commodious for trade. The only spot of ground that retains the name of a county is that of Cape May, which lies at the mouth of Delaware Bay, dividing the two Jersseys. Burlington, which lies in an island in the middle of Delaware river, opposite to Philadelphia, is the capital of the province, the courts and the assemblies of West Jersey being held here. It is well situated for trade, the town is well built, with town-houses, and two bridges. West New Jersey has an easy communication by the river Æsopus with New York, and with Maryland by another river, which comes within four miles of Chesapeake Bay. A project was once on foot for joining this river and the bay by an artificial canal; but it met with such opposition from the inhabitants of Virginia and Maryland, that it came to nothing.

NOTWITHSTANDING the inexpressible disadvantages under which New Jersey so long laboured from the nature of its constitution, the multiplicity of its owners, and the uncertainty of their tenures; yet the inhabitants have made a most surprising progress, both in trade and agriculture, since they were under the government of the crown. This is owing to their commodious situation, which in a manner invites commerce to reside amongst them, and from their being less exposed than many of their neighbours are to the insults of the savages. The people of New Jersey had their share of the trouble and expence of the Canada expedition in 1710; but since that time they have recovered their credit so great, that their paper-currency, to the amount of 60,000*l.* has more credit than that of either Pensylvania or New York, for the Pensylvania bills are not received at New York, nor those of New York at Pensylvania; but the New Jersey bills circulate through both those provinces. Before the peace of Utrecht the inhabitants of the New Jerseys were computed at 10,000, and at present they amount to above 60,000. During the war before the last, they contributed very considerably towards carrying it on; and in the year 1746, when there was a scheme for invading Canada, they raised and victualled five companies of an hundred men each. As to the trade of New Jersey, it is an excellent corn country; and it is said to raise more wheat than any of our other colonies; they likewise raise some flax and hemp. They chiefly trade with New York and Pensylvania, where they dispose of their grain; but of late they have come into a considerable trade for provision with the Antilles; and they send to Portugal, Spain, and the Canaries, tobacco, oil, fish, grain, and other provisions. By means of employing negroes, as their neighbours do, in cultivating their lands, they have of late more than double their value; and they now work a copper ore mine, and manufacture iron ore into pigs and bars. To give the reader some idea of the present value of this country, the property of half of which some years ago was thought dear at 5,000*l.* and, indeed, was deemed not worth holding, we shall here insert some articles of their imports and exports from the 24th of June, to the same day next year. Exported. Flower, 6424 bar.; bread, 168,500; weight, beef, and pork, 314 bar.; grain, 17,941 bush.; hemp, 14,000 wt.; some firkins of butter, some hams, beer, flax-seed, bar iron, some lumber. Imported. Rum, 39,670 gall.; molasses, 31,600 gall.; sugar, 2,089 cwt.; pitch, tar, and turpentine, 437 bar.; wines, 123 pipes; salt, 12,759 bush. We shall conclude the history of New Jersey by observing, that the inhabitants of New Jersey are so industrious as to manufacture those articles of life which they cannot procure to themselves by commerce.

C A N A D A

AS Canada is now both by conquest and cession become part of the English empire in America, an account of it from the best authorities is a work not only of entertainment, but of importance to an English reader. But in this part of our history, he is not to expect the amazing exploits that fill those of Mexico and Peru, they being reserved to the final conquest of it by the British arms. Great part of our information consists in the natural history of the country, the adventures of those who discovered and settled it, and its last amazing catastrophe, when its capital surrendered to the British forces.

The boundaries of Canada are, perhaps, yet undiscovered; but the great bank of Newfoundland is said to begin on the south in the 41st degree of north latitude, and to terminate nate towards the north in 49 deg. 25 minutes; its breadth from east to west being about 90 leagues. As to the bank itself, it is no other than a prodigious mountain under water, and, being unequal in its extremities, many mariners have supposed it to consist of separate banks. The numbers of cod-fish upon this bank are incredible; and, notwithstanding the prodigious quantities taken and sent to Europe, they are not sensibly diminished. We are told^a that not only cod, but shell and other fishes of all kinds and sizes, abound on this bank, and that their number seems to equal that of the grains of sand. The same author adds, that the gulph of St. Laurence, and the river for more than sixty leagues, with the coast of Acadia and Cape Breton, are equally well replenished as that bank is with cod. Voyagers know when they approach the bank, which may be called the empire of the cod-fish, by the air being impregnated with a cold thick fog, and the sun scarcely ever shining; though the island of Newfoundland enjoys a pure air and a serene sky in all other places, but on the side where the great bank is; a phænomenon which puzzles naturalists to account for. This bank is likewise subject to most violent storms of thunder and lightning, which however do not last very long.

THE fishing for and preparing of cod is a matter of the utmost importance both to the English and the French. The cod itself, when fresh, is said to be a most exquisite repast; but this, perhaps, may be owing to the tediousness and discomforts of the preceding voyage. The head, the tongue, and the liver, which are the most delicious parts of the fish, can be enjoyed in perfection only on the spot. The largest of the cod is seldom three feet in length, but its throat is prodigiously wide, and is so voracious, that pieces of earthen ware, iron, and glass, have been found in its belly. This gives occasion for believing that its stomach is of the nature of a pocket, and turns outside in, by which it disburdens itself of whatever offends it. That kind of cod which in Holland is called the cabelou, is smaller than the American cod; and that of the great bank, which is commonly called white or green cod, is salted only; but the dry cod, which the French call la Merluche, are taken on the coasts only, and requires great care and art to repair it, and it is carried on only from the beginning of May to the end of August. It is therefore chiefly profitable for those who reside in the country only.

Continuation of the history
of Canada,

BESIDES the great bank there are several lesser ones in those seas, abounding with other species of fish, particularly whales, blowers, sword-fish, porpusses, and threshers, not to mention others of less note. The sword-fish and the whale are declared enemies to each other; and the former takes its name from a kind of sword, that projects about three feet from his snout, which he endeavours to bury in the body of the whale, whose only defence is his tail. The battle between them is extremely curious, and lasts for some time. It is not uncommon for two sword-fishes to attack the whale, in which case he is demolished; but one stroke of his tail proves mortal to his antagonist, who is as thick as a cow, and in length between seven and eight feet, his body tapering towards the tail. When killed, he is said to be excellent food, especially his head, which is larger than that of a calf, but much finer eating. The fléttau, otherwise called the thresher, is a large plaice, his length being generally from four to five feet, his breadth above two, and his thickness one. Voyagers and travellers into that country highly extol the deliciousness of this fish's head and gills, but his body is commonly thrown into the sea, to fatten the cod, to which he is so great an enemy, that he is said to devour three or four of them at one meal; a juice is extracted from his bones, which is said to be preferable to the finest marrow. The navigation upon all that coast is extremely difficult and dangerous, it being almost impossible to keep a reckoning on account of the fogs, and sometimes mariners meet with shoals of ice bigger than the largest cathedral.

FROM the isle of Miquelon, on the south of Newfoundland, Cape Ray next presents itself. The mariner passes between the island of St. Paul and cape St. Laurence, which is the most northerly point of the isle of Cape Breton. St. Paul's island is so small, that it is hardly discernible through the fog, and the passage being very narrow, it never is attempted but in clear weather, though there is another broader between that island and Cape Ray. The gulph of St. Laurence is fourscore leagues in length, and, with a good south-east wind, may be passed through in twenty-four hours. About half way lie the bird islands, or rather two rocks, so called from the prodigious quantity of sea-fowls which haunt them; so that the soil is entirely covered with their dung. The rocks themselves rise to a sharp point about sixty feet from the surface of the water, but the largest of them is only between two and three hundred feet in circumference. The number of nests upon those islands are incredible, and are built by birds of various kinds, insomuch that when they are alarmed by a cannon shot they rise so as to obscure the air with a thick cloud two or three leagues in circumference. The mariner then doubles Cape Rose or Rosieres, that he may a enter the river St. Laurence, which runs north-east and south-west. At the mouth of the river the cold is intense, and the sea boisterous. The river itself at its opening is about thirty leagues in breadth; and towards the southward lie the bay and point of Gaspé or Gachepé. Below this bay is a steep rock, which has obtained the name of the Bored Island, from an aperture in its middle, through which a chaloup may pass with her sails up. At a league's distance from this Bored-Island lies the island Bonaventure; and at a like distance from that the island Miscon, which has an excellent harbour, and is eight leagues in circumference. A spring of fresh water spouts up to a considerable height in the offing, not far from this island. Perhaps it was the happiness of Great Britain, that when the French were possessed of the Newfoundland fishery and Canada, they were so intent upon their fur-trade, that they neglected those important posts, which are every-where surrounded with good anchoring ground, and, if improved, must have been excellent magazines, and, as they are capable of being fortified, they might even have shut the English out of that river.

and the river
St. Laurence.

THE next object that presents in the river St. Laurence, is the island of Anticosti, and the current setting strongly in upon it, renders the navigation here in case of a calm extremely dangerous, as the island is lined with breakers. This island is narrow, but lies in the middle of the river, and extends about forty leagues from north-east to south-west. The French have represented it as being absolutely good for nothing, so that no care has been taken to improve it. The English, however, may be of a different opinion, as the coasts of the island are well stored with fish. After passing this island the navigation becomes more tolerable, but still great precaution must be used. The mounts Notre Dame and Lewis, which lie on the larboard side, are formed by a chain of hills, where the vallies between them have been formerly inhabited by Indians, and some French plantations are now to be found near Mount Lewis. A very noble settlement might be made in this neighbourhood for the relief of ships, which, as is commonly the case, are in want of provisions after a tedious, uncertain navigation. It is likewise said to be proper for the whale-fishery. The next point is called Trinity-Point, and must be avoided with great care, and then the ship comes to an anchor a little above the paps of Mantane, so called from the appearance of the mountain, which is situated about two leagues from the river. d The land in the neighbourhood is said to be not only unprofitable but frightful, being covered with rocks, sands, and impenetrable thickets. It contains, however, great plenty of excellent game. On the other side of the river, and advancing two leagues into its bed, lies the shoal of Manicouagua, which is the most dangerous in the river for shipwrecks. It is named from a river that falls from the mountains of Labrador, and forms a considerable lake, which empties itself across the shore. Some call this river that of St. Barnabas, and others the Black River. From this to the Green-Island, the navigation is flow and uncertain. On the last-mentioned island is plenty of provisions, and about five miles farther, at a place called Maulin Baude, from a small rill which is sufficient to make a mill go. The country in this neighbourhood is entirely uninhabited, and as uncomfortable as can be well conceived. The river of Saguenay, which lies somewhat higher, carries ships twenty-five leagues above its mouth; and, on the right hand of the entrance, lies the port of Tadoussac. Some geographers have here fixed a city; but Charlevoix says, e that it consisted only of one French house, and a few moveable huts of Indians, who came to trade there at certain seasons. It appears, however, that Tadoussac is provided with an excellent harbour, where twenty five ships of war may be sheltered from all winds; that its anchorage is sure, and its entry very practicable. Charlevoix affirms, that it is excellently well situated for a whale-fishery, and that it stands upon marble. Those conveniencies made it for many years the rendezvous both of the French and Indian traders, and the missionaries never failed to repair to the same market for the purchase of souls. In f sailing from Tadoussac, great care must be taken to avoid the Red-Island, which is a dangerous rock of that colour, whose surface is equal to the water, and often proves fatal to shipping. About fifteen leagues distance, that is, mid-way between Quebec and Tadoussac, lies the isle of Coudres, where the passage of the river is dangerous without a fair wind. This is said to have been occasioned by a dreadful earthquake in 1663, which plucked up a mountain by its roots, and whirled it upon the isle of Coudres, by which it became as large again as before; and in the place where the mountain stood appears now a dangerous whirlpool. Next appears the bay of St. Paul, where the plantations on the north shore begin. They consist of valuable woods of pine-trees, amongst which are red pines, that are g esteemed very beautiful; here likewise is a fine lead-mine. About six leagues above this is a very high promontory, which terminates a chain of mountains, that reach above four hundred leagues to the westward, and is called Cape Torment. Round the anchoring-place here, which is good, lie a number of islands, the chief of them is that of Orleans, forming a most beautiful prospect. It is about fourteen leagues in circumference, and populous.

populous. It forms two channels, of which the south is the most navigable; here the water becomes drinkable; for it is brackish at Cape Torment, though it is a hundred and ten leagues from the sea. The higher up the river the flux of the tide diminishes, and the reflux encreases, and twenty leagues above Quebec the tide is not sensible; but indeed the tides in this river, as well as the currents, vary greatly, according to different seasons and different positions of lands. When the island of Orleans was first discovered by James Cartier, it was covered with vines, on which account he called it The Isle of Bacchus; but some Normans who succeeded him turned those vine-grounds into corn-lands and orchards; so that they now produce excellent wheat and fine fruits; and upon the whole the island itself is a most desirable spot.

Quebec.

WE are now arrived at Quebec, the capital of Canada, and, while it was in possession of the French, an episcopal see. Though the river of St. Laurence, as high as the isle of Orleans, which is above one hundred and thirteen leagues from the sea, is not less than four or five leagues in breadth, yet at Quebec it narrows so suddenly, that it is not above a mile broad; and this, is said, to have given that city its name, which, in the Algonquin language, signifies a streight or narrowing. The first object in the road of Quebec to be viewed from the westernmost point of the isle of Orleans, is a piece of water, which falls from a height of forty feet, and is about thirty in breadth, called the falls of Montmorenci. This, however, is to be understood of the lower fall; for the whole of the falls are said to be sent from the height of three hundred feet, and proceed from a kind of rivulet which has a constant supply of water from a fine lake at twelve miles distant. Between the isle of Orleans and Quebec is a basin, which is a full league in breadth, and receives the river St. Charles, which flows from the north-west, and between the mouth of this river and cape Diamond, stands the city of Quebec, with a fine anchoring place opposite to it. The great alterations, which time has produced in this river, appears from the following circumstance. In 1608, when Champlain founded Quebec, the tide rose to the foot of the rock on which that city is built, but has ever since gradually diminished; so that it has left dry a large piece of ground, on which a lower town has been built, the back part of which leans against the original rock, and with a large square between the houses and the water. The square is bounded by a church on the left, and a row of houses on the right, and between the church and the harbour is another row; the whole serving, in a manner, as the suburb of the city; and when the English made their last descent, very strongly fortified. An ascent cut out of the rock into steps leads to the upper town; but towards the right, going from the square, there is a communication by a gentle declivity. On entering the city, the bishop's palace lies on the right hand, and about 20 paces farther, two squares present themselves. That on the left contains a place of arms with the fort or citadel, which was the residence of the governor general, and a convent of recolects, with other handsome buildings; the other square contains the cathedral, opposite to which is the college of jesuits, and on the other sides of the square are handsome houses; and indeed before the bombardment of the English all the houses of this city are said to have made a very fine appearance. To describe all the streets in this capital of New France, would exceed our design, and we shall only add, that it is built on a rock, partly of marble, and partly of slate.

Its building, fortifications,

and churches.

THE church of the lower town was built in 1690, in consequence of a vow which was made while the city was besieged. The episcopal palace is formed upon a very grand design, and stands upon one of the most magnificent situations in the world, for indeed nothing can exceed the idea that Charlevoix has given of it for the grandeur and beauty of its prospects. According to the same author, who was a jesuit, and possibly thought nothing could be too fine or sumptuous that related to the clergy, the cathedral is but a very ordinary building, and highly unworthy of the sole bishopric in all the French empire in America; an empire which he says was more extensive than that of the Romans ever was. It has been several times burnt down and rebuilt; but according to modern travellers it is far from being a contemptible edifice, and it commands a very extensive prospect over the road and the river. The fort or citadel is built on the brink of the rock, and is a fine work, being surrounded by a beautiful gallery or balcony, from whence a speaking trumpet may be heard to the middle of the road, which it commands. A pretty large esplanade, and a gentle declivity, the whole making a very fine platform, lies between the fort and the summit of Cape Diamond, which takes its name from a number of stones resembling diamonds, found formerly there; but now they are very scarce. The church of the fathers recolects is greatly praised, by father Charlevoix, who informs us, that it is large and beautiful, and would do them honour even at Versailles, which is saying as much as a Frenchman can say in the praise of any building. The house of the same fathers is answerable to their church, being large and commodious, and adorned with a spacious well cultivated garden. The ursuline nuns, from a poor establishment, have, by their industry

a industry and good economy, raised to themselves a handsome church with very commodious neat lodgings; and here is erected the tomb of the late Monf. Montcalm, who was killed at the battle of Quebec, where he commanded the French troops when the English conquered that city. The good nuns are particularly celebrated for their needle works in gold and embroidery.

According to Charlevoix, the college of the jesuits is a paltry ruinous building, and the fine prospect it originally had is intercepted by the cathedral and the seminary; but since Charlevoix wrote, those fathers have found means to erect a most sumptuous college from the very foundation, with a large well kept garden. The church has a handsome steeple, being entirely roofed with slate; all the rest of the buildings here in the time of Charlevoix being covered with shingles. It is very much ornamented in the inside: the gallery is very fine, and the iron balustrade, which surrounds it, is of excellent workmanship, painted, and gilt, as is the pulpit. All the other furniture and ornaments of the church are likewise in an admirable taste; and particularly it contains some good pictures. The hospital has two wards, the one for men, the other for women. It is served by nuns hospitallers of St. Augustine of the congregation of the mercy of Jesus, who originally came from Dieppe in Normandy. The house itself is pleasantly situated, and though it makes no great appearance, yet the substantial parts of charity are performed here by a due attendance upon the patients, and by keeping them in a neat, wholesome, manner. The intendant's house is, by way of distinction, called the palace, because the superior council meets in it. It is composed of a large pavilion ascended by a double flight of steps, and the garden front, which is the finest, facing the river. The king's magazines front the court on the right side, and behind them is the prison. About half a quarter of a league towards the country lies the hospital general, which is the finest house in all Canada, and would grace the best city in France. It was built by the fathers recollects, who owned the ground on which it stands; but it was purchased from them by St. Vallier, bishop of Quebec, who removed the fathers into that city, and who laid out upon the building 100,000 crowns. Charlevoix, however, finds fault with its marshy situation. This hospital is the residence of the bishop himself. It is filled with trades people, and those who are past their days of labour, who are served by thirty nuns, each of whom wears a silver cross on her breast, and they are all of them subject to particular regulations. A fine college. Hospitals. Grandeur of them.

The court of France from the time that Quebec was founded, till it fell into the hands of the English, spared no cost nor pains to render it a strong fortification, which it certainly is, though it does not admit of being regularly fortified. The harbour is flanked by two bastions, that are raised twenty five feet from the ground, which is about the height of the tides at the time of the equinox, so that, at such times, the bastions are level with the surface of the water. Above the bastion on the right, a half bastion is cut out of the rock, and on the side towards the gallery of the rock, is a battery of twenty-five pieces of cannon. Above that lies the citadel, and to the left of the harbour, quite along the road, as far as the river St. Charles, were erected strong fortifications, a bomb being drawn across the mouth of that river; and higher up, was a bridge of boats, the head of which was defended by a place of arms. In short, the fortifications of Quebec, at the time it was taken by the English, were as complete and as strong as the best engineers in the world could render them; and had it not been for the amazing good fortune, and the more amazing intrepidity of the British troops, they might have bid defiance to all the power of Europe. Its strength.

When Charlevoix was at Quebec he reckoned the inhabitants not to exceed 7000, but they certainly were above double that number when it was conquered by the English. Tho' the nature of the French government is not very favourable to commercial colonies, yet there surely never was a people who lived more agreeably than the Canadians did. Their little community at Quebec formed an epitome of a court; it contained a governor general, an etat-major, a body of nobility, officers and troops, an intendant, tribunals and jurisdictions of all kinds, a commissary of the marine, a grand provost, a surveyor of the highways, and a grand-master of the waters and forests, whose jurisdiction, says Charlevoix, is certainly the most extensive of any in the world. Besides those civil governors, here were found merchants who made a grand appearance, a bishop, a numerous seminary, and three communities of well educated women, besides recollects and jesuits. The houses of the lady governess, and the lady intendant were the rendezvous of all their polite company, who there held brilliant assemblies. To have seen the Canadians one could not have thought that they ever entertained the least idea of business, or that any thing ever troubled them. In summer, they had their parties of pleasure in calashes and canoes, in winter on sledges, and scates on the ice, while card-playing went on all the year round. Even the politer arts are not excluded from their conversation, though, we may easily suppose, without any great depth of study; but above all, the Canadians were great great politicians, as is generally the case with those who have much leisure, and very little information. The diversion of hunting is extremely well adapted to a Canadian, both as it is an agreeable amusement, and attended with profit: for furs and skins are the chief commodities of this country, and the tails of the inhabitants owe their principal delicacies to this manly exercise. A certain cast of politeness, superior even to any thing to be met with in France, distinguished the Canadians. Nothing rustic or illiberal was to be found in their behaviour, and they spoke with as much purity as the people of Paris or Orleans themselves. Fine cloaths are their favourite passion, and their belly often suffers, that their back may be apparell'd, though, to do them justice, they eat and drink to the full as well as their circumstances can admit of. Charlevoix concludes his account of the Canadians, which seems to be a very candid one, with the following observations, "The case is very different, as I am informed, with respect to our English neighbours, and to judge of the two colonies by the way of life, behaviour, and speech of the inhabitants, no body would hesitate to say that ours were the most flourishing. In New England, and the other provinces of the continent of America, subject to the British empire, they prevail an opulence, which they are utterly at a loss how to use; and in New France, a poverty hid by an air of being in easy circumstances, which seems not at all studied. Trade, and the cultivation of their plantations strengthen the first, whereas the second is supported by the industry of its inhabitants, and the taste of the nation diffuses over it something infinitely pleasing. The English planter amasses wealth, and never makes any superfluous expence; the French inhabitant again enjoys what he has acquired, and often makes a parade of what he is not possessed of. That labours for his posterity; this again leaves his offspring involved in the same necessities he was in himself at his first setting out, and to extricate themselves as they can. The English Americans are averse to war, because they have a great deal to lose; they take no care to manage the Indians, from a belief that they stand in no need of them. The French youth, for very different reasons, abominate the thoughts of peace, and live well with the natives, whose esteem they easily gain in time of war, and their friendship at all times."

different from the English planters.

Description of the Huron colony of Loretto.

ABOUT three leagues from Quebec lies a most awful place of retirement, which excites in all who approach it sentiments of reverence and sacred horror; and which are increased by the company of its inhabitants, who are Hurons, or wild Indians, converted to christianity, simple in their manners, and fervid in their devotions. They have a chapel built upon the same model with that of the famous holy house of Loretto in Italy, and therefore it is called the Huron village of Loretto, and nothing can be more affecting than their worship, especially the singing of the men on one side, and that of the women on the other. They are governed by a French missionary; but what makes this colony a greater rarity, is, that the Hurons were the most untamed and untractable of all the American savages; and yet the whole village seems to constitute but one family. Strong liquors, so pernicious to the manners of all those savages, are here prohibited under the severest penalties, and vows of abstinence from them. They therefore have no drinking songs, though music is their favourite diversion, as well as employment; but, though they are extremely solicitous to please their hearers, and, for that purpose, both men and women exert themselves to the utmost by exhibitions of music and dancing; yet both are very insipid on such occasions, which is the more extraordinary, as the women, in singing the christian hymns at church, shew some delicacy both of execution and ear. One observation, however, is to be made, that the accounts we have of this and all the other christian societies of Indians come from jesuits or missionaries, whose interest, zeal, or vanity may prompt them to speak favourably of their own converts. The account we have given of this Huron society is taken from father Charlevoix, the most candid as well as most judicious of all those priests; but he owns that a great deal of interest is some times mingled with their conversions: that they are very apt to relapse into their former customs, and that strong liquors often prove too powerful for the most sincere convert amongst them. It was in the year 1721, that Charlevoix was at Quebec: but, by the most undisputed accounts we have from the English, the morals of the natives were far from being improved by those fathers; for our countrymen found the christian savages, in every respect, as treacherous and barbarous as the unconverted. The reason is plain: those missionaries were chiefly sent, at least in latter times, not so much with a view to convert the natives to christianity, as to inspire them with an irreconcilable aversion to the English.

Quadrupeds of Canada.

The beavers;

THE greatest animal curiosity which this part of the world affords is the beaver, which produces one of its most valuable commodities. The beaver of Canada is an amphibious quadruped, which could live without water, if it had recourse to convenient bathing-places. They are generally not quite four feet in length, and about fourteen or fifteen inches in breadth over the haunches. Their colours are different, black, brown, white, yellow, and straw colour; but it is observed that the lighter their colour is, they are clothed with the

- a the less quantity of furr; which philosophers attribute to a particular distribution of providence, because the lightest coloured beavers are found in the warmest climates. We shall not take up the time of our readers in describing the figure of the beavers, for it may be much better known by the prints of them, which are very common. We must not, however, forget that the flesh of the beaver is a most delicious food, when it is parboiled to take away a disagreeable relish, which it has naturally. Their tail is pronounced to be altogether piscine, and therefore the faculty of theology at Paris has put the whole of the beaver in the same class of fish as a mackarel, and have declared, that it may be lawfully eaten on meagre days. A most judicious decision for those good fathers, who travel so often into wilds, and woods, where no other food but beavers can be found. But, besides the fur, the beaver produces the true castoreum, which is contained in bags in the lower part of the belly, and are different from the testicles; the vast properties of this drug is well known in physic. The furs of the beaver are of two kinds, the dry and the green; the dry fur is the skin before it is applied to any use; the green are the furs, which are worn after being sewed one to another by the Indians, who besmear them with unctuous substances, which not only render them more pliable, but give the fine down, that is manufactured into hats, that oily quality, which renders it proper to be worked up with the dry fur. The Indians wear those furs day and night, and then they are fit for manufacturing. Both the Dutch and English, however, since Charlevoix wrote, have found the secret of making excellent cloths, gloves and stockings, as well as hats, from the beaver fur.

THE œconomy both public and private of this animal is so wonderful, that it would be incredible were it not unquestionably well attested. As the situation of their dwellings is a capital concern of the beaver, the states of the province are, as Charlevoix justly calls them, assembled to the number of three or four hundred, to deliberate about the spot where they are to build, and in this consideration they are determined by the same circumstances that human beings are, that is, according to the plenty of provisions, water especially, and materials for building. When no spot proper for that purpose is to be found near a lake or pool, they stop the course of some stream, higher up than the place on which they resolved to build, by felling down trees, which always fall towards the water; and with which they make a dyke for damming up the course of the rivulet. Three or four beavers find means to cut down with their teeth the largest tree, which they afterwards cut into proper lengths, and drag them to the water, into which they are lanced, and navigated by the beavers to the places, where they are to be employed. These pieces are exactly adapted to the situation of the ground, and the purposes they are to serve. Sometimes they are trunks placed upon their bases; sometimes they are piles as big as a man's thigh, supported by strong stakes, and interlaced with a kind of wicker-work of small branches; but all the interstices or void places are so artfully filled with a fat earth, that or water passes through them. The manner in which they prepare this plaister is very amazing; for they work it with their feet, they carry it to their work upon their tails, which likewise serves them for trowels with which they smooth it over, after applying it with their feet. Those dykes towards their foundations are generally ten or twelve feet thick; but they diminish, in a certain proportion, to the thickness of two or three feet at the top; though this slope is only on the side of the water, the wall on the land side being perpendicular. Some of those banks are said to be four or five hundred yards long, and twenty feet high; but perhaps the length is exaggerated by travellers, though all agree that those works of the beavers can scarcely be exceeded in strength and regularity by the best European workmen. Such is the outward fortification of their city; we are now to attend their domestic conveniences or cabins.

THEIR figure is round or oval, and the roofs arched like the bottom of a basket. They are built either upon piles, in the middle of the lakes, which are formed by the dykes, or upon tongues of land advancing into the river. Their materials are not so strong, though of the same kind with those of the dykes, and their partitions are about two feet thick, but the whole so well wainscotted on the inside with clay, that no air can enter them. Two thirds of the edifice stand above water; and every beaver takes care to floor the apartment assigned him with leaves or twigs of trees. Those creatures are so cleanly, that they have several openings towards the water, (besides those which they have for the convenience of bathing, and for free ingress and egress) for the purposes of cleanliness, so that no nastiness is ever seen in their cabins, though each contains above eight or ten beavers. These form a family, and they have a common storehouse for the winter, which they begin to fill about the end of September, when their works are finished. In the summer-time, they live upon the fruit, bark, and leaves of trees; and fish for craw fish and the like kinds. In winter-time, their stores consist of wood of soft textures, which, before they lay up, they cut into small pieces; and the quantity of their stores are always observed to be be proportioned to the length of the winter. They are driven out of their cabins by the melting of the snows, and then, every beaver shifts for himself; but the females return to the cabins, where they lay their young. About July, their states re-assemble and deliberate upon repairing their former habitations, which they sometimes find impracticable; in which case, they fall to planning and building new ones. The great enemies of the beaver are the hunters carnivorous animals, and travellers, who break down their banks for conveniency of encreasing their water-carriage. This is the substance of what is remarkable concerning the wonderful œconomy of the beavers, whom some writers have exaggerated into rational creatures, and formed them into regular governments both civil and military. But, after all that has been said, it is certain, that their sagacity in providing against danger is far inferior to what they show in providing for subsistence. When their cities are discovered by the hunters, the beaver is easily destroyed or taken by opening the ice, and by employing nets and gins, and various other methods; so that in the time of Charlevoix they were very scarce, though found in great abundance when the French first settled in Canada.

Account of the
musk-rat,

THE musk rat is a diminutive kind of beaver, which it resembles in every thing but its tail, which is like that of a common European rat, and its testicles afford a very strong musk. Their living and food does not greatly differ from those of the beaver, but they seem to vary in some particulars; for, at the approach of winter, some lodge in holes and hollows of trees, where the Indians say, they continue without any subsistence; while others lodge in cabins like those of the beavers, but not so well built, and always standing by water sides, so as not to require any dykes. Their furs are very useful along with those of the beaver in manufactures, and their weight is generally about four pounds each. It greatly resembles the description, which Mr. Ray, and other naturalists give us of the Mus Alpinus, found upon the Alps and Pyrenees, and in many places of his Sardinian majesty's dominions. Before we leave this subject, it may be proper to give an

and the elk;

Britain in North America. One of the most remarkable is the elk, or original, which, Charlevoix says, would be as advantageous to the inhabitants for hunting, as the beaver; but that the first settlers of Canada had almost exterminated the species, at least in the more civilized parts of the country. This animal is known in the northern parts of Europe, and is of the size of a horse or mule. Its crupper is broad, its tail but a finger's breadth, and its feet and legs resemble those of a stag's. The hough, or joint of the hinder leg, is very high, its neck and withers are covered with long hair; but the creature would make a good appearance, were it not for the enormous length of its head, which he stretches out, and is above two feet long, with a thick muzzle, and very wide nostrils. Though his antlers resemble those of a doe, yet they spread much longer than a stag's horns. Many extraordinary medicinal qualities, particularly for curing the falling sickness, are ascribed to the hoof of the left hind foot of this animal. Its flesh is very agreeable and nourishing; the skin is strong, comfortable, warm, yet light for wear; and its colour a mixture of light-grey and dark-red; and mattresses and hair bottoms are made of its hair. They love the cold countries, and when the winter affords them no grass, they gnaw the bark of trees; and then is the season for hunting them, they being apt to founder in the incrustations of the snow. When wounded, if not intangled in the snow, he becomes furious, and attacks the huntsman, who commonly throws him his coat, which the elk treads upon, while the huntsman dispatches him from behind a tree. Many other particularities are told by travellers of this simple useful creature, but we forbear to mention them here. The elks, as well as other game, are most successfully hunted by the Indians in a body, whereby they drive a great number at a time, which they surround, either into the water or into nets, where they dispatch them by arrows, and other weapons.

their huntings.

The carcajou
described.

THE carcajou is a carnivorous animal, and of the feline or cat kind, and with a tail so long, that Charlevoix says he can twist it several times round his body; but others say it is only eight inches long. It commonly weighs from twenty-five to thirty-five pounds, and is about two feet in length, from the end of the snout to the tail. Its eyes are small; its head short and thick; and its jaws, which are very strong, are furnished with thirty-two sharp teeth. The carcajou is strong and furious, but its motion is so slow, that it rather crawls than walks. It sometimes destroys the beaver, especially when the latter ventures to the woods to seek for fresh food. But the elk is the carcajou's favourite prey; for when the former seeks his food in the woods, the latter, discovering his tracks in the snow, is said to twist himself round a tree, from whence he darts upon the elk, and twisting his strong tail round his body, he cuts his throat in a moment (F). Father Charlevoix relates

(F) The elk has no means of shunning this disaster, this dangerous enemy. The carcajou, who cannot endure the water, quits his hold immediately; but, if the water a relates something of this creature, which is still more wonderful, which the reader will find in the note.

THE Canadian stag is the same with the European, but is not hunted with such avidity by the Indians as the game already described. The caribou is a species of the stag, and the best description we find of it is as follows. It is very light, and runs upon the snow almost as fast as upon the ground, because his nails, which are very broad and furnished with rough hairs in their intervals, hinder him from sinking, and serve him instead of the broad shoe or raquette of the savages. When it inhabits the thick woods, it make roads in winter like the elk, and is, in the same manner, attacked there by the carcajou; but when it is in open places, where it has not need of making roads, and where it goes indifferently on all sides, the carcajou, which might wait too long without success, is not accustomed to lose his time, and therefore does not chase the caribou but in thick places, so ingenious is his ardor for prey. Prodigious numbers of those creatures are found between Danish river and Port Nelson, towards the northernmost parts of America.

THE buffaloe of Canada are larger than that of Europe, but their appearance are pretty much alike. His body is covered with a black wool, which is highly esteemed. They are naturally so timid that a dog will drive numerous herds of them before him. The buffaloe is very shy, and if wounded, without being killed, will turn upon a single hunter; the general way of hunting them, therefore, is for the hunters to assemble in a great body to force the buffaloes, by means of fire, which they dread, to draw up so close together, that they are perfectly hedged in, so that every shot either from the guns or the arrows does execution. It is common upon such occasions to kill 1500 or 2000 buffaloes. The flesh of the female is very good; and the buffaloe hides are as soft and pliable as chamois leather; but so very strong, that the bucklers, which the Indians make of them, are hardly penetrable by a musket-ball. The buffaloes in the neighbourhood of Hudson's Bay differ in some respects from those mentioned here, though equally valuable; but they have such a favour of musk, that at certain seasons of the year, their flesh is not eatable. The wool that grows upon them is longer than that of Barbary sheep, and, according to Jeremie, one of the French missionaries, when manufactured into stockings, is finer than silk. Charlevoix says, that their horns reach down by their eyes, almost as low as the throat, and that the ends afterwards bend upwards and form a kind of crescent, so that he has seen some of those horns, when separated from the skull, that weighed sixty pounds.

THE Canadian roe-buck differs little or nothing from the European, and is said to shed tears when hard pressed by the huntsmen. He is a domestic animal, and the female when in rut retires to the woods, and then returns home, but goes again into the woods, when her bringing-forth time approaches; and, having brought forth her young ones, returns home, but constantly visits them, and, when they are able to follow her, she brings them to her master's house. Wolves are scarce in Canada, but they afford the finest furs in all the country. Their flesh is white, and good to eat; and they pursue their prey to the top of the tallest trees, they having no other subsistence than the creatures they devour. The French missionaries, however, are of opinion they are rather cats than wolves, whom they resemble only in their howling. The black foxes are greatly esteemed, and very scarce, in Canada, but those of other colours are more common; and some in the Upper Mississippi are of a silver colour, and very beautiful. They live upon water-fowls, such as ducks, bustards, and the like, which they decoy within their clutches by a thousand antic tricks, and then spring upon them and devour them. The Canadian pole-cat has a most beautiful fur, and is of the size of a small cat; but, when pursued, he lets fly his urine, which according to Charlevoix, infects the air for a quarter of a league round, and is, therefore, called by the inhabitants the devil's brat, or the stinkard. The ermine is not so long as a squirrel, but its fur is of a beautiful white, and the tip of its tail, which is long, is as black as jet. The Canadian martins keep in the middle of the woods, from which they never stir, but once in two or three years, and then in large flocks. When they emigrate, the Indians prognosticate a large fall of snow, and consequently good hunting will follow. Charlevoix says, that a common martin's skin is worth a crown, and the brown ones worth seven shillings. A creature, called a pitoi, which is a pole-cat, is like it, a devourer of birds, especially hens and pigeons. The Canadian wood-rat is as big again as the European; and some of them are of a beautiful silver colour; but all of them have bushy water happens to be at too great a distance, he will destroy the elk before he reaches it. This hunter too, as he does not possess the faculty of smelling with the greatest acuteness, carries three foxes a hunting with him, which he sends on the discovery. The moment they have got scent of an elk, two of them place themselves by his side, and the third takes post behind him; and all three manage matters so well, by harrassing the prey, that they compel him to go to the place where they have left the carcajou, with whom they afterwards settle about dividing the prey. Charlevoix.

tails. The female has a most extraordinary property ; for she carries under her belly a bag, which she opens and shuts at pleasure, and in that she places her young when she is pursued, and thereby saves them. Canada abounds with squirrels, of which there are three kinds ; the red, which is of the size of the European ones ; the swisses, which is of a smaller kind, and have long stripes of red, white, and black ; and the flying-squirrel, which has a dark grey fur, and takes its names from leaping from tree to tree, to the incredible distance of forty paces, and more, by a very particular construction of two membranes ; “ one on each side, says Charlevoix, reaching between their fore and hind legs, and which, when stretched, are two inches broad ; they are very thin, and covered over with a sort of cat’s hair or down. This little animal is easily tamed, and is very lively except when asleep, which is often the case, and he puts up wherever he can find a place, in one’s sleeves, pockets, and muffs. He first pitches upon his master, whom he will distinguish amongst twenty persons.” The porcupine of Canada is shorter, though not so tall as a middling dog, and is a most dreadful creature. Its hair is of the thickness of a small stalk of corn, and about four inches long, but very strong, and he darts them with wonderful efficacy against any creature that attacks him ; when roasted he eats full as well as a sucking pig. The Canadian hares and rabbits differ little from those of Europe. In winter they are grey, and live in their warrens or holes upon the tenderest branches of birchen trees. We can add little more to our account of the animals of Canada, which we have been the more full upon, because the subject is now interesting to Great Britain ; we shall therefore proceed to other particulars.

Porcupine.

BETWEEN Quebec and Montreal, in sailing up the river St. Laurence, the eye is entertained with beautiful landscapes ; and, after passing the Richlieu Islands, as they are called, the air becomes so mild and temperate, that the traveller thinks himself transported into another climate. The island of Montreal, in the river St. Laurence, is ten leagues in length, and almost four in breadth ; and the city is built at the foot of the mountain, which gives it its name, about half a league from the south shore. While the French were in possession of it, both the city and island of Montreal belonged to private proprietors, who improved them so well, that the whole island became a most gainful spot, and produced every thing that could administer to the conveniencies of life. Nothing can be more beautiful than the neighbourhood of the city. The streets are laid out, and the houses built, in a very handsome manner. The fortifications of it, till of late, could be no defence against a regular force, but they were sufficient to protect it from the Iroquois. Such is the account Charlevoix gives us of this city and island ; but as we are now better acquainted with it, we are enabled to give our readers a more full description of both.

Account of Montreal,

WHEN it was reduced by general Amherst, it was well peopled, and of an oblong form, being surrounded by a wall, flanked with eleven redoubts, which served instead of bastions. The ditch is about eight feet deep, and of a proportionable breadth, but dry. It has also a fort or citadel, the batteries of which command the streets of the town from one end to the other. The town itself is divided into two parts, the upper and the lower, in which last the merchants and men of business generally reside. Here likewise is the place of arms, the royal magazines, and the nunnery-hospital. The upper town, however, contains the principal buildings, such as the palace of the governor, the houses of the chief officers of the place, the convent of recolects, the jesuit’s church and seminary, the free-school, and the parish church. The recolects are here numerous, and their convent is spacious, as is the parish church, which is built of hewn stone. The house of the jesuits is magnificent, and their church well built, though their seminary is but small. Several private houses in Montreal make a noble appearance, and the governor’s palace is a large fine building. The nunnery hospital has a grand well-finished saloon, its church is neat, and well built, and the sisters who serve the hospital come from la Fleche, a town of Anjou in France. In the neighbourhood of this town, a private gentleman, one Charron, formed a noble design of a general hospital, and associated with him several persons of piety and learning. This hospital was, at the same time, to be a seminary for furnishing the neighbouring country parishes with schoolmasters for instructing the Indian children. He persevered in this design with so much steadiness, that, though his fellow-labourers in the same good work either died or forsook him, he saw his hospital completed before his death, which happened in 1719. Besides this hospital, the neighbourhood of this city contains many elegant villas, and all the vegetables of Europe grow there. In short, when this island and city fell into the hands of the English, all the banks of the river from Quebec to Montreal were but one continued village, full of fine plantations, with gentlemen’s seats at proper distances.

NOTWITHSTANDING all those natural advantages, such is the volatile nature of the French Canadians, such is their passion for shew, pleasure, and amusement, that they were rather a burden than a benefit to their mother-country, and never could establish a staple commodity

- a commodity to answer their demands upon her. All their inland trade was with the Indian natives; and they sent to the West-Indies racoon, fox, and beaver furs, skins of deer, and other branches of the peltry trade, India corn, with what they call lumber, or wood. Their wine, brandy, cloth, linnen, and wrought iron come from Europe; and the native Indians take from them toys and trinkets of all kinds, duffil blankets, guns, powder, ball, kettles, hatchets, tomohawks, brandy, and tobacco. The French, while possessed of Montreal, had a species of traders, called Coueurs des bois, who from levity, rather than industry, carry on trade with nations unknown to all the world besides. In June, a fair was always held at Montreal, while it was in possession of the French; and Indians resorted to it, from the distance of 1000 miles, with peltry, and other Indian commodities, as did the French likewise from all parts of Canada. This fair sometimes lasts three months, but great disorders often happen during it, chiefly occasioned by drunkenness. The Indian natives are not proof against brandy, and, for a dram many of them will give to the Coueurs de bois all that they possess in the world. This ebriety sometimes fills the place with tumults; so that the governor himself is obliged to be present in person at the fair, which is opened with many solemnities, and to place guards at proper distances for the preservation of the peace. The resort of savage nations to this fair was incredible; and so thoroughly did the French Canadians possess the art of pleasing the Indians, that the natives, especially the Euron savages, will carry their commodities two hundred miles, rather than dispose of them to the English, even to equal, if not better, advantage. The English, however, receive some benefit from this humour; for they find it cheaper to take their commodities from the French planters, than to bring them from their native country.

- The isle of Jesus lies between the island of Montreal and the continent on the north side, and is about eight leagues in length and two in breadth. It belonged to the superiors of the seminary of Quebec, and the soil of it is excellent. One of the arms of the river here is called St. John's River, or The River with a thousand Islands, on account of the great number it contains, some of them very fertile; and most of them, under the French, being the property of private gentlemen. The opening of the Riviere des Outaouais, or the Great River, into that of St. Laurence, forms the lake of the two mountains, which is two leagues long, and almost as many broad. That of St. Louis is somewhat larger, and the French themselves are but little acquainted with all to the westward. Montreal must have often been destroyed by the Indians, had it not been for two villages of Iroquois christians, and the fort of Chambly. One of those villages, called Sault St. Louis, lies on the continent three leagues above Montreal, on the south side of the river. This village proved a strong bulwark to Montreal, not only against the heathen Iroquois, but against the English of New York, and the church and missionary's house there, both which are delightfully situated, are two of the finest edifices in all Canada. The second village is called la Montaigne, which stands on the Terra Firma opposite to the western extremity of the island of Montreal. This village was remarkable for the christian heroes it produced, till the French dealers furnished them with brandy and strong liquors, which rendered the inhabitants a race of fiends. The missionaries in vain had recourse to the secular as well as spiritual power to suppress this evil; but, says father Charlevoix, "even in the very streets of Montreal, are seen the most shocking spectacles, the never-failing effects of the drunkenness of these barbarians; husbands, wives, fathers, mothers, children, brothers, and sisters, seizing one another by the throats, tearing of one another by the ears, and worrying one another with their teeth like so many enraged wolves. The air resounded during the night with their cries and howlings, much more horrible than those with which wild beasts affright the woods." This degeneracy gave courage to the idolatrous Iroquois, and greatly diminished the number of Indians trading to Montreal. At last, it was found necessary to erect store-houses; those store-houses improved into forts, each with a governor and a garrison; and those forts were multiplied so as to cut off all communication between the back-settlements of the English, and the native Indians towards the west; which, in fact, gave rise to the late war between Great Britain and France.

- FATHER Charlevoix is of opinion that the Canadian fishery is more likely to enrich that country than the fur-trade; and this brings us to treat of the marine productions of Canada. The sea-wolf is so called from his howling, and is an amphibious creature. His head resembles that of a dog. He has four very short legs; the fore ones have nails, the hind terminate in fins. His skin is hard, covered with a short variegated hair, and in all other circumstances he is a fish. The largest are said to weigh about 2000 pound, and are of different colours; the young ones being very lively, but so tractable, that the Indians have been known to train them up to follow them like so many dogs. The instances of sagacity in those animals are wonderful; and they are so numerous, that a French author says eight hundred of the young ones have been taken in one day. Their flesh is good eating; but the great profit of it lies in its oil, which is proper for burning and currying of

The isle of Jesus.

Fishery of Canada.

of leather. Their skins make excellent coverings for trunks, and though not so fine as morocco-leather, they preserve their freshness better, and are less liable to cracks. The shoes and boots made of those skins let in no water, and, when properly tanned, make excellent and lasting covers for seats. The Canadian sea-cow is larger than the sea-wolf, but resembling it in figure. It has two teeth of the thickness and length of a man's arm, that, when grown, look like horns, and are very fine ivory, as well as its other teeth, each of which is four fingers long. The porpoises of the river St. Laurence gives as much oil as the sea-wolf does; the white porpoise being said to yield a hoghead. According to father Charlevoix, the skin of this animal is naturally an inch thick; and, at first, as tender as fat or lard; but the Canadians have a way of shaving it down till it becomes transparent, and then it may be manufactured into waistcoats, which, he says, are excessively strong, and musket-proof. While the French held Canada, some attempts were made to establish porpoise, as well as whale, fisheries; but the genius of the people could not accommodate itself to such laborious undertakings, and they fell to nothing. It is probable, however, that the English, a more hardy and persevering people, will cultivate those fisheries to the full, and save to their country all that it expends upon the dangerous, and at present unprofitable, trade to Greenland.

Fort Chambly.

HAVING already mentioned Fort Chambly, as being one of the principal bulwarks to Montreal, it is here proper to give some account of it, as we can hardly be too particular in treating of a country, that is so late and so valuable an acquisition to Great Britain. Fort Chambly lies upon the river Sorel, which takes its name from a French officer, and is built about seventeen leagues up the river. It first was built of wood, by Mr. de Chambly, who likewise was a French officer; but the situation being excellent, and the soil fertile, plantations were multiplied all around it; the wooden fort was converted into one of stone fortified by four bastions, and defended by a strong garrison. About eight leagues from Fort Chambly, to the southward, lies Lake Champlain, through which the river Sorel runs. No place in all North America is more proper for a populous settlement, than the banks of this lake, where the air is mild, and the soil fertile. Charlevoix enumerates many resources, which the inhabitants of such a colony might have for living, particularly by their fisheries. Amongst other fishes, he mentions the Lencornet, which is a kind of a cuttle-fish. "It is, says he, quite round, or rather oval; it has above the tail a sort of border, which serves it instead of a target, and its head is surrounded with prickles half a foot long, which he uses to catch other fishes; there are two sorts of them, which differ only in size, some are as large as a hoghead, and others but a foot long; they catch only these last, and that with a torch; they are very fond of light, they hold it out to them from the shore at high-water, and they come to it, and so are left a-ground. The lencornet roasted, boiled, or fricased, is excellent eating; but it makes the sauce quite black." The gobergue has the taste and form of a small cod. The sea-plaice is excellent eating, and they, as well as the lobster, are taken with long poles armed with iron hooks. The pools in the neighbourhood abound with salmon-trouts, and turtles, about two feet diameter. The chaourasou, with which Lake Champlain, and the river that fall into it abound, is an armed fish, resembling a pike, but is covered with scales that are proof against a dagger. Some of them are said by the Indians to be eight or ten feet broad; but the largest that Charlevoix saw was not above five, and about the thickness of a man's thigh. Its colour is of a silver grey, "and, says he, from under its throat proceeds a bone, which is flat, indented, hollow, and pierced or open at the end, from which it is probable the animal breathes through. The skin, which covers this bone, is tender, and its length is in proportion to that of the fish, of which it is one third part. Its breadth is two fingers in those of the smallest size. We may well imagine, continues he, this to be a real pirate amongst the inhabitants of the waters; but no body could ever dream that he is full as dangerous an enemy to the citizens of the air; this is, however, one of his trades, in which he acts like an humble huntsman: the way he does it is as follows. He conceals himself amongst the canes or reeds in such a manner, that nothing is to be seen besides his weapon, which he holds raised perpendicularly above the surface of the water. The fowls which come to take rest imagining the weapon to be only a withered reed, make no scruple of perching upon it. They are no sooner alighted, than the fish opens his throat, and so suddenly makes at his prey that it rarely escapes him. The teeth, which are placed on the sides of the bone which he uses so dextrously, are pretty long and very sharp. The Indians pretend they are a sovereign remedy against the tooth-ach, and that, by pricking the part most affected with one of these teeth, the pain vanishes that instant.

The animals in its neighbourhood.

The surgeon.

MANY people imagine that the Canadian seas and lakes contain the true dolphin of the ancients, in the sturgeon, which is both a fresh and salt water fish, and which is there from eight to twelve feet long, and of a proportionable thickness. The Indians catch them by darting them, and when wounded the sturgeon dies. The smallest sturgeons caught a caught there have a flesh of a most delicate grain, and are excellent eating. The achi-gau and the gilt head are fishes peculiar to the river St. Laurence. The missionaries and others have given out, but with what degree of credibility, we must leave to our readers, that there have been seen in the seas and rivers of Canada fishes that have a human appearance. We should not have mentioned this assertion, had not many writers of great authority spoken of the like monsters appearing in the European, and other, seas; though, after all, if the matter was closely examined by, one of those monsters being produced, there would be found very little correspondence between it and the human species.

THE forests of Canada are not so well stocked with birds as its rivets are with fishes. b They contain two kinds of eagles, one, which is the largest, has a white head and neck, and chase hares and rabbits, which they carry up in their talons to their nests and airies. The other eagles are grey, and prey on birds or fishes. The falcon, the goshawk, and the tercel, are the same as in Europe, and they often live upon fish. The Canadian partridges are grey, red, and black; they have all long tails, which they spread out as a fan, like a turkey-cock, and make a very beautiful appearance. Woodcocks in Canada are very scarce; but snipes, and other water game, plentiful. A Canadian raven is, by some writers, said to eat as well as a pullet; and an owl better. Blackbirds and swallows are birds of passage there, as well as in Europe; and three kinds of larks are found there, one species little different from European ones. No fewer than two and twenty different species is enumerated in this coun- c try, of them the bough species is best for the spit, and, when alive, is finely variegated. Great numbers of swans, turkeys, geese, bustards, teal, water-hens, cranes, and other large water-fowl; are to be here found, but always at a distance from houses. The cranes, of which some are white, and others light-grey, are said to make excellent soup; and the Canadian wood-pecker is a beautiful bird. The thrushes and gold-finches of Canada differ little from those of Europe; but the chief Canadian bird of melody, that is mentioned, is the whitebird, which is a kind of ortolan, very shewy, and remarkable for announcing the return of spring. The fly-bird; which is found in Canada, is thought by some to be the most beautiful of any in nature; with all its plumage, it is no larger than an ordinary cock-chaffer, and he makes a noise with his wings, like the humming of a large fly. Its d legs, which are about an inch long, are like two needles, and from its bill, which is of the same thickness, a small sting proceeds, with which he pierces the flowers, and thereby nourishes himself with the sap. "The female, says Charlevoix, has nothing striking in her appearance, is of a tolerable agreeable white under the belly, and of a bright grey all over the rest of the body; but the male is a perfect jewel, he has on the crown of his head, a small tuft of the most beautiful black, the breast red, the belly white, the back, wings, and tail of a green, like that of a rose-bush; specks of gold, scattered all over the plu- mage, add a prodigious eclat to it, and an imperceptible down produces on it the most delightful shadings that can possibly be seen." "This bird, continues he, has an ex- tremely strong and an amazingly rapid flight; you behold him on some flower, and in a moment he will dart upwards into the air almost perpendicularly: it is an enemy to the e raven, and a dangerous one too. I have heard a man, worthy of credit, affirm, that he has seen one boldly quit a flower he was sucking, launch upwards into the air like light- ning, get under the wing of the raven, that lay motionless on his extended wings, at a vast height, pierce it with his sting, and make him tumble down dead, either of his fall or the wound he had received." The same writer recounts several other curious particu- lars of this remarkable bird, which he thinks to be a bird of passage, and that they go in the winter time to Carolina.

The birds of Canada.

RATTLE-SNAKES are found in Canada; some of them as thick or thicker than a man's f leg with a small head, and a flat broad neck. Their tail is covered with rows of scales, and their age may be known by the number of those rows, of which one grows every year. When he moves, his tail rattles, from whence he has his name. Its bite is mor- tal, but an herb grows wherever this reptile is found in this country, called the rattle snake plant, which is an infallible antidote to the poison of his bite, by chewing it and apply- ing it, in the nature of a plaister to the wound. "This plant is beautiful and easily known. Its stem is round, and somewhat thicker than a goose-quill, rises to the height of three or four feet, and terminates in a yellow flower of the figure and size of a single daisy; this flower has a very sweet scent, the leaves of the plant are oval, narrow, sus- tained, five and five, in form of a turkey-cock's foot, by a pedicle, or foot-stalk, an inch long." This reptile seldom bites passengers, unless he is provoked or trod upon. The g Indians, however, pursue them, and greatly prize their flesh, which they eat.

Rattle-snakes.

THE forests of Canada present a most beautiful and awful appearance, and contain a vast variety of trees. The pines are of two sorts, the white and the red, but both of them are resinous, and fit for making pitch and tar. A kind of a mushroom, called guarigua, shoots out at the upper upper end of some of the white pines, and is held by the Indians to be medicinal, in a dysenteries and pectoral disorders. The Canadian fir trees are of four sorts: the first is like the European; the second and third are called the white and red prickly firs; and the fourth is called the perusse, which, with the white prickly fir, grows to a vast height, and are fit for masts and carpenter's work. Upon the white prickly fir, there grows in small blisters of the size of kidney-beans, a kind of turpentine called the white balsam, which is reckoned a specific for wounds, fevers, and pains in the breast and stomach, by the patient taking two drops of it, in some kind of broth. All those firs require different soils to thrive in, and each has its peculiar properties. The Canadian cedar is of two sorts, the white and the red. The most sensible difference between them is, that the fragrance of the former lies in its leaf, and of the latter in its wood. The oaks here are b likewise distinguished into the white and the red; but the white is most esteemed. The maple is distinguished into male and female; it grows on high grounds, and is very serviceable for household furniture; the female maple is streaked and clouded. The cherry-tree, which grows along with the maple, is likewise fit for household furniture, and the Indians use its bark as a medicine. Their ash-trees are of three sorts, the free, the mungrel, and the bastard; the first is most useful, both for carpenter's work, and dry cask staves: they require low and good soils to thrive in. The Canadian walnut-trees are of three kinds likewise, the hard, the soft, and the smooth; the first bears a small nut, but very costly, and the wood is only good for fuel; the soft produces an excellent walnut, with a very hard shell, the wood of this tree is not to be affected by water; the smooth, c or thin-rinded walnut tree, yields a small bitter-kernel'd walnut, of which excellent oil is made; and all of them grow upon the best soil. The Canadian woods produce vast quantities of beech trees, which grow on all kinds of soil, and yield nuts which serve as nourishment both for beasts and birds; the wood is tender, and fit for oars, the white wood, which grows here to a great thickness and very strait, is likewise very common, and may be manufactured into planks and staves for dry-ware casks; the Indians cover their cabins with the bark, which they peel off. The elms of this country are white and red, and the wood very lasting. The Iroquois hollow the red elms into canoes; some of which made out of one piece, will contain twenty persons. About November, the bears and wild cats take up their habitations in the hollow elms, and remain there till April. The d poplar tree is found in Canada, on the banks of rivers, and on the sea-shore.

Shrubs.

PLUMB trees, bearing a very sour fruit, are found in their thickest woods; and the vinage tree, which is a kind of shrub, produces a red clustering fruit, which, when infused in water, becomes vinegar. The Canadian goose-berry trees differ little or nothing from those of Europe. The atoca is an aquatic plant, which creeps along the ground, and produces its fruit, which is of the size of a cherry, in water: this fruit is sharp, and may be made into a confection. The fruit of the white thorn is the food of several wild beasts. The cotton tree, which grows here like asparagus, to the height of three feet, is a most curious plant; upon its top grow several tufts of flowers, which, when shaken in the morning, before the dew falls off, produce honey, that may be boiled up into sugar; e the seed of this plant is a pod containing a very fine kind of cotton. The sun-plant resembles the marigold, and grows to the height of seven or eight feet; the Indians anoint their hair with an oily extract from it. Canada produces great quantities of turkey-corn, french-beans, gourds, and melons; their common melons are excellent. Capillaire and the hop-plant are natives of Canada, the former excels that of Europe, and grows to a much greater height. Having thus given a concise account of the animals and vegetables of Canada, we shall now proceed to the history of the human native, which is very proper at this time for the study of every British subject.

Esquimaux Indians;*

WE have already mentioned the Esquimaux, which is an Indian word signifying an eater of raw-flesh; they are, of all Indians, the fiercest, the most mischievous, and untameable. f By their beards they are thought originally to proceed from Greenland, and they have something excessively shocking in their air and mien; their stature is advantageous and their skin is white, because they never go naked; they wear a kind of shirt made of bladders, or the intestines of fish, neatly sewed together; above this, they wear a surtout made of a bear or some other skin. To the shirt is fixed a cowl or hood which covers the head, and terminates in a tuft of hair that hangs down over their fore heads; their shirt falls no lower than their loins, and their surtout hangs lower behind, but that of the woman descends to her mid-leg; the men wear breeches made of skins with the hair inwards, and faced on the outside with furs or ermine. They likewise wear pumps or shoes made of skins, and boots of the same above them, and, over those, other pumps g and boots, with the hair side always inwards, and they are sometimes shod three or four times in that manner. Their weapons are arrows, pointed with the teeth of a sea-cow, or, when they can procure it, iron; they are very active, and all the summer live in the open

- a open air, and in winter they lie promiscuously in caverns. On the south of Hudson's Bay, being the western part of Canada, lies a vast tract of unknown countries, inhabited by nations to which we are strangers. Charlevoix mentions the Mataffins, the Monsonis, the Christinaux, and Affiniboils. The latter have a dialect of their own, and are thought to inhabit a very distant country; the other three speak the Algonquin language. The Christinaux live to the northward of Lake Superior. The Indians in the neighbourhood of the river Bourbon, and those on the river St. Teresa, differ entirely in their language; but it is said, that a hundred leagues from the mouth of this river, it is unnavigable for fifty more; but that a passage is found by means of rivers and lakes which fall into it, and that afterwards it runs through the middle of a very fine country, which continues as far as the lake of the Affiniboils, from whence the river takes its rise. Those Indians are extremely superstitious, and, like the other Indians of Canada, they have notions of a good and an evil genius; and believe the sun to be the great divinity of the world. They have even a species of sacrifices, and when they deliberate upon any matter of importance, their councils are attended with several solemnities. They assemble at the house or cabin of some of their chiefs by break of day, and the master of it, after lighting his pipe, presents it three times to the rising sun; he then turns it with both his hands from the east to the west, and invokes the favour of the deity. After this, all the assembly smokes in the same pipe. Those nations, though various and distinct from each other, go under the common name of Savannois, because of the savannahs, or low lying grounds, which they inhabit. The most curious and most probable account, however, that we have of those unknown regions is given us by M. le Page du Pratz, in a memoir laid before the French academy.

- THIS learned man is of opinion, that America in general is not peopled from any one single nation, but from sundry nations remote from each other. According to him, the Mexicans, and the inhabitants of the western coasts of South America, are originally Chinese or Japanese; and that those of the country we are now treating of, come from the north-east parts of Asia. Mention is even made of a Chinese book in the French king's library, asserting that America was peopled by the inhabitants of Corea. The famous passage of Diodorus Siculus, which mentions a great western island discovered by the Phenicians, confirms the same opinion; even the Canadians themselves seem to have a tradition that their ancestors came from the north-east part of Asia: for when they are asked concerning their origin, they constantly point to the regions which lie between the north and west; and by what can be gathered from them, it seems that the country they mean should lie in fifty-five degrees north latitude. Besides this, some time ago, the skeletons of two large and two small elephants were found in a morass upon the banks of the river of the Oubaches: now there are no elephants in America, they are not natives of the country, and consequently these four must have come there at the time when the continents of Asia and America were joined, and it is probable not many years ago since they were separated by an earthquake; as Sicily is supposed to have been from Italy, Asia Minor from Europe, and England from France. M. le Page du Pratz confirms this opinion by the travels of Moncachtape, a civilized Indian of Canada, to the north-west parts of America, which tend to shew that the north-east part of Asia, and the north-west part of America, are only separated by a narrow strait, or arm of the sea, and give the most authentic and satisfactory account of these unknown regions, yet published. This account is so great an American curiosity, and so important to our history, that we shall make no apology for giving to our readers a translation of the whole of it in a note (E).

The population of Canada.

(E) M. Le Page du Pratz, extremely desirous to inform himself of the origin of the American nations, was continually enquiring of the old Indians concerning it, and was at last so fortunate as to meet with an old man, belonging to the nation of the Jaxous, called Moncachtape, who was a man of sense and genius, and having been possessed with the same curiosity as himself, had spared no pains nor fatigue to get information of the country from whence the North American nations came. With this view he travelled from nation to nation, expecting to discover the country from whence their fathers had come, or to approach so near it, as to get some surer intelligence and more particular traditions concerning their origin. In this expedition he spent eight years, and M. Le Page du Pratz, having insinuated himself into his good graces, by all sorts of kindness, had from him the following account.

Having lost my wife and children, I resolved to travel in order to discover our original country, notwithstanding all the persuasions of my parents and relations to the contrary.

I took my way by the high grounds that are on the eastern bank of the river St. Louis, that I might only have the river Oubache to cross, in order to join the Illinois, at the village of Tamaroua, a considerable settlement of the Canadian French. As the grass was short, I arrived there in a little time. I stayed there eight days to rest myself, and then continued my route along the eastern bank of the same river St. Louis, till I was a little above the place where the river Missouri falls into it.

I then made a raft of canes or reeds, and crossed the river St. Louis; and when I was near the opposite side, I suffered my raft to be carried down the stream, till I came to the conflux of the two rivers. Here I had the pleasure of seeing the rivers mix, and of observing how clear the waters of the river St. Louis are, before they receive the muddy streams of the Missouri. I landed here, and travelled along the north side of the Missouri, for

THE Savannais are often at war with a kind of Indians inhabiting the banks of the Danish river and the sea-wolf river to the north of Hudson's bay, which go by the name of flat-sided for a great many days, till at last I came to the nation of the Missouris; with them I stayed a considerable time, not only to repose myself after my fatigue, but also to learn their language, which is spoken or understood by a great many nations. In this country one scarce sees any thing but large meads, above a day's journey, and covered with large cattle. The Missouris seldom eat any thing but flesh; they only cultivate as much maiz as may serve for a change, and prevent their being cloyed with beef and game, with which their country abounds. During the winter, which I spent with them, the snow fell to the depth of six feet.

As soon as the winter was over, I resumed my journey along the banks of the Missouri, and travelled till I came to the nation of the west. There I was told, that it was a long journey to the country, from whence both they and we came; that I must yet travel during the space of a moon [a month] towards the source of the Missouri, that then I should turn to the right, and go directly north, and, at the end of a few days, I should meet with another river, which ran from east to west, quite contrary to the course of the Missouri; then I might fall down this river at my ease upon rafts, until I came to the nation of the Loutres, or Otters, where I might rest, and receive more ample and particular instructions.

In pursuance of these directions, I travelled up the Missouri above a month, being afraid of turning off to the right too soon; when one night after I had lighted my fire, and was going to rest, I perceived some smoke at a distance, towards the place where the sun set; I immediately concluded, that this was a party of hunters, who proposed to pass the night there, and that probably they might be of the nation of the Loutres. I immediately made towards them, and found about thirty men and some women. They seemed to be surprized, but received me civilly enough. We could only understand each other by signs. After I had been with them three days, one of the women being near her delivery, she and her husband left the company, in order to return home by the easiest road, and took me along with them.

We travelled yet up the Missouri seven easy days journey, and then went directly north for five days, at the end of which time we came to a river of very fine clear water. When we came to the place where the hunters had left their canoes, we all three embarked in one of them, and fell down the river till we came to their village. I was very well received by them, and soon found that this was indeed the nation of the Loutres, which I was in quest of. I spent the winter with them, and employed myself in learning their language, which they told me was understood by all the nations, which lay between them and the great water [the sea].

The winter was scarce ended, when I embarked in a canoe with some provisions, a pot to cook them, and something to lie on, and descended the river. In a little time, I came to a very small nation, whose chief happening to be upon the banks, bluntly demanded, who art thou? what business hast thou here with thy short hairs? I told him my name was Moncacht-ape; that I came from the nation of the Loutres; that, though my hair was short, my heart was good; and then hinted the design of my journey: he replied, that though I might come from the nation of the Loutres, he saw plainly I was not one of that nation, and wondered at my speaking the language. I told him that I had learned it of an old man, whose name was Salt-tear. He no sooner heard the name of Salt-tear, who was one of his friends, than he invited me to stay in his village as long as I would. Upon this I landed, and told him, that Salt-tear had ordered me to see an old man, whose name was the Great Roebuck. This happened to be the father of the chief: he ordered him to be called, and the old man received me as if I had been his own son; and led me to his cottage.

The next day he informed me of every thing I wanted to know, and told me that I should be very hospitably received by all the nations between them and the great water, on telling them I was the friend of the Great Roebuck. I only staid two days longer; I then put on board my canoe a stock of provision, prepared from certain small grains, less than French pease, which afforded an excellent food, and immediately embarked, and continued to sail down the river, not staying above a day with each nation I met with in my way.

The last of these nations is settled about a day's journey from the sea, and about the race of a man [near a league] from the river. They live concealed in the woods for fear of the bearded men. I was received by them, as if I had been one of their own countrymen. They are continually upon their guard, on account of the bearded men, who do all they can to carry off young people, without doubt, to make them slaves. They told me these bearded men were whites; that they had a long black beard, which fell down upon their breast; that their bodies were thick and short; that their heads were large, and covered with stuffs; that they were always cloathed, even in the hottest seasons; and that their cloaths reached to the middle of their legs, which, as well as their feet, were also covered with red or yellow stuffs; that their weapons made a great noise, and a great fire, and that when they saw the red men [the natives] were more numerous than themselves, they retired to a great canoe [a small ship without doubt] which contained about thirty of them. They added, that these strangers came from the place where the sun sets [the west] in quest of a soft yellow wood, which yields a yellow liquor of a fine smell, and which dyes a fine yellow colour; and that observing they came every year as soon as the winter was over to fetch this wood, they had, according to the advice of one of their old men, cut down and destroyed all the trees, since which time they had not been so often troubled with the visits of these bearded men: but that they still visited every year two adjacent nations, who could not imitate their policy, because the yellow wood was the only wood their country produced, and that all the neighbouring nations had agreed to arm and join together the approaching summer, in order to destroy these bearded men, at their next coming, and rid their country of them.

As I had seen fire-arms, and was not afraid of them, and as the route they purposed to take was the way to the nation I was in quest of, they proposed my going along with them: I readily agreed, and as soon as the summer came, I marched with the warriors of this nation to the general rendezvous. The bearded men came later than usual this year: whilst we waited for them the natives shewed me the place where the bearded men laid their great canoe [the ship]. It was between two high and long rocks, which formed the mouth of a shallow river, the banks whereof were covered with yellow wood. It was agreed to lie in ambush for the bearded men, and that when they had landed, and were busy cutting the yellow wood, we should rise, surround them, and cut them off. At the end of seventeen days two great canoes [ships] appeared; they came to their usual place between the rocks; the first thing the bearded men did after their arrival (for there were two men privately placed upon the rocks to observe them) was to fill certain wooden vessels with water. At the end of the fourth day they armed and landed, and went to cut wood. They had no sooner begun to cut than they were attacked on all sides; but notwithstanding our utmost efforts, we killed but eleven; all the rest gained their little canoes [boats], and fled to their great ones [ships], which soon launched into the great water and disappeared.

Upon examining the dead, I found them to be less than we are, and very white; their bodies were thick, and their heads large: about the middle of their head

- a sided dogs; but it is observed that such wars are not attended with those circumstances of horror and cruelty as amongst the other Canadians, for they are contented with keeping one another's captives in prison. The Savanois have a notion of a future state; they think that a man who dies old is born again in the other world at the age of a sucking child; and that if a man goes young out of the world, when he arrives at the country of souls he becomes old. Either their natural indolence, or the barrenness of their country, renders the life of the Savanois so miserable, that when their hunting season is over, being destitute of all kind of provisions, they often eat one another, on which occasions they always begin with the weakest. Their doctrine of transmigration has a very singular effect; for when a man grows to be a burden to himself and his family, he fixes a rope about his neck, and presents the two extremities of it to the son he loves best, who instantly strangles him with the utmost alacrity. The son-in law is obliged to live with the father-in law in a kind of servitude till he has children; and their marriages are always made with the consent of their parents. They burn their dead bodies, and, after wrapping the ashes in the bark of a tree, they bury them in the ground, and raise a monument to the deceased, to which they affix tobacco, and if he was a hunter, his bow and arrows; for, with all the barbarians in almost every part of the globe, they believe that the deceased are fond of the same enjoyments in the next world, that gave them delight in this. The character of a hunter is higher with them than that of a warrior, and the candidates take a degree in it much in the nature of that of the ancient knights-errant. To qualify themselves for this degree, the candidate's face must be painted with black, and for three days he must taste nothing; a feast is then prepared, and a morsel of each of the animals, commonly the tongue and muzzle, which on other occasions is the perquisite of the hunter himself, is offered up as a sacrifice to the great spirit. As to the character of those Indians, they are held to be a faithful, disinterested, kind of people, and hate nothing so much as a lie.

In all the vast extent of Canada, there are but three radical or modern tongues, the Sioux, Algonquin, and Huron. As to the first, it is impossible to say how far it extends; and neither French nor English are much acquainted with those who speak it. In their manner of life, all we know, is, that they greatly resemble the Tartars; for they wander from place to place, but generally dwell in meadows, under large tents of well wrought skins. Their food is wild oats, and the flesh of the buffalo. It is thought by their situation, and their roving disposition, as well as the commerce they carry on, that the Sioux, which by the bye is only a contraction of the word Nadocceffieux, know more than any other people do of the western parts of North America, to which the Europeans are as yet so much strangers. They cut off the tips of their noses, and part of the skin upon the top of their heads, and some imagine that they greatly resemble the Chinese in their accent and language. Before the Iroquois forced the Hurons and Outawais to take refuge amongst the Sioux, the latter were a harmless people; and though the most populous of all the Indian nations, till they became warlike by their intercourse with those two people, they knew little of the use of arms.

The three Indian languages.

- e THE Astiniboils inhabit the borders of a lake of that name, of which Europeans know very little. This perhaps is the reason why so many wonders are reported of it. It probably is the reservoir or source of the greatest rivers and lakes in North America; but it is certain that their hair was long. They wore no hats as you do, but had their heads bound about with a great deal of some sort of stuff; their cloaths were neither of wool nor bark, but of something like your old shirts, very soft and fine, and of different colours. [silk without doubt]. The covers of their legs and feet were all of a piece: I endeavoured to put on one of them, but my feet were too large. Of the eleven that were killed, only two had fire-arms, powder, and ball. I tried these pieces, and found they did not carry so far as yours: their powder was mixed of three sorts of grain, large, middle, and fine, but the large made the greatest part.

These were the remarks I made upon the bearded men, after which, leaving the warriors with whom I came to return home, I joined those nations who were settled upon the coast further towards the west; we followed the course of the coast, which is directly between the north and the west. When we came to their settlements, I observed that the days were a great deal longer than with us, and the nights very short. I asked them the reason of it, but they could give me none. I rested with them a considerable time. Their old men told me, that it was in vain for me to proceed any further; they said that the coast extended itself yet a great way between the north and west; that it afterwards turned short to the west, and having run for a considerable distance in that direction, it was cut by the sea directly from north to south. One of them added, that when he was young he knew a very old man, who had seen this tract of land before the sea broke through it, and that to this day at low water one might see rocks and shallows in the channel, which had formerly been dry land. They all joined to dissuade me from travelling any farther, assuring me, that the country was cold and desert, destitute of animals and inhabitants, and advised me to return to my own country. I accordingly took their advice, and returned by the way that I came.

Such is the account Montachat-ape gave of his travels. M. le Page du Pratz observes, that the conformity of this account with the late discoveries of the Russians, and the good sense and probity of the man, left him no room to doubt of the truth of it. He thinks it probable that the bearded men are the inhabitants of some isles in the neighbourhood of Japan. The distance in a straight line from the Yazous to the farthest nation Montachat-ape visited, upon the shores of the north western ocean, according to the best estimate M. du Pratz could make, from the number of his days journies, and rate of travelling, seems to be about eight hundred leagues.

it is next to inaccessible by the mountains and woods which surround it; though its circumference is said to be six hundred leagues. Though it lies to the north-west of lake Superior, the climate is said to be mild. The natives say that men are settled in their neighbourhood resembling Europeans, and in a country where gold and silver is put to the most common uses; but all those reports are very uncertain. As to the Astiniboils themselves, they are remarkably phlegmatic, and in this they differ from their neighbours the Christinaux, the most volatile and talkative nation of all the Indians, being perpetually dancing and singing. The Astiniboils are great travellers, formed for fatigue, tall and robust in their persons.

A MAN by an acquaintance with the Algonquin and Huron languages can travel 1500 leagues in this country without an interpreter; for though he may visit above one hundred different nations, each of which has a particular idiom, yet he can make himself understood by all; and even amongst the Indians of New England and Virginia. It is not our intention to trace out all those different tribes or nations; many of them are hardly known, even by name, to Europeans. Some of them mentioned in the most early accounts are now not to be found; for those barbarians often carry on wars to the extermination of one another. Towards the north of the island of Montreal the country is thinly peopled; but a few villages belonging to the old inhabitants are still to be met with. Mention is made, particularly, of the Nipissings, so called from a lake of that name, who are the true descendants of the Algonquins, and still preserve the purity of that language. As to the Outawais, tho' formerly a numerous nation, few of them are now to be met with. The French established some posts on the banks of lake Superior, where they carried on trade with the Christinaux and Astiniboils. In short, a traveller can know very little more of this country than any man may learn by an inspection of the map. He may wander over thousands of miles on the banks of the finest lakes and rivers in the world, without meeting with a human creature; and those he does meet with, are generally so stupid, so cruel, so barbarous, or shy, that they scarcely deserve that denomination. The few Algonquin nations still to be seen, appear to be void of all notions of agriculture, and subsist upon fishing and hunting; and they daily decrease in populousness, though they allow themselves a plurality of wives. Few or none of their nations contain above 6000 souls, and many of them not 2000.

Conjecture about the Huron language.

THE Indians to the southward of the river St. Laurence, as far as Virginia, speak the Huron language, or, as some call it, the Iroquois, though a different dialect is used in every village; even the five nations or cantons, which form the Iroquois commonwealth, have, each, a different pronounciation. Charlevoix observes, that the three radical languages we have mentioned have annexed to them three different original properties. The Sioux, so far as the Europeans are acquainted with it, is rather a hissing than an articulation of words. The Huron language has great energy, pathos, and elevation. The missionaries do not even scruple to compare it with the finest language that is known. Many have imagined, that it has a common origin with the Greek tongue, and many words of a similar sound and signification occur in both. This, if true, bids fair to derive the Iroquois and the Hurons from the ancient Celts, whose language was the mother of the Greek. The Algonquin tongue excels that of the Hurons in smoothness and elegance; but the nature of this undertaking does not admit of any criticism upon language. It is agreed by all, that not only the sound of their voice is elevated and expressive, but every part of their body is thrown into the noblest and most graceful attitudes, when they speak in public. As to the great precision, the purity, the correctness, equal to those of the Greek and Latin, of those Indian languages, we must take them upon the credit of the missionaries, who are unanimous in reporting them. There is, however, an evident partiality in the French missionaries in favour of the Huron nation. According to them the true Hurons, who are called Tionnontatez, and who appear to have been a prerogative tribe amongst those Indians, have an hereditary chieftainship answering to the European royalty, and their police and form of government is more rational and regular than those of the other Indian nations, who likewise fall short of them in fortifying and improving their land, and in their buildings. They did not admit of polygamy; and yet they were more populous than any of their neighbouring sects, and they are in every respect more social and better polished than their neighbours. But in vain have all European authors searched for the maxims, and even the forms by which the Hurons govern themselves. According to Charlevoix, the true Hurons are now reduced to two middling villages at a great distance from each other, and yet they govern the councils of all the Indian nations round them; but, notwithstanding all that the good fathers say of this favourite race, they seem to have been inferior in war to the Iroquois; and this makes it necessary to give some account of those two nations immediately before the French settlement at Quebec; for, as they have no historical monuments, the reader cannot expect any particulars of them farther back.

Rise of the war between the Hurons and the Iroquois,

SOME years before the time I speak of, the Iroquois had made a league with the Algonquins, who possessed great tracts of land between Quebec, possibly from Tadoussac to the lake Nipissing, and all along the north shore of the river St. Laurence. The Algonquins had no rivals in all North America, as hunters and warriors, the only two manly characters that those barbarians have any idea of. In the alliance between those two people, the Algonquins were obliged to protect the Iroquois from all invaders, and to let them have a share of their venison. The Iroquois, on the other hand, were to pay a tribute out of the culture of the earth to their allies, and to perform for them all the labours of agriculture and the menial duties, such as slaying the game, curing the flesh, and dressing the skins. By this compromise it is plain, that the Algonquin nation had the post of honour, but the Iroquois at last came to be piqued at the small esteem in which they thought their neighbours held them. By degrees they associated in the hunting matches and warlike expeditions of the Algonquins, who, at first, were far from having any jealousy of them; but in process of time the Iroquois began to fancy themselves as well qualified as the Algonquins were, both for war and hunting. One winter, a large detachment of both nations went out a-hunting, and when they thought they had secured a vast quantity of game, six young Algonquins, and as many Iroquois, were sent out to begin the slaughter. The Algonquins by this time probably had become a little jealous of their associates, and upon seeing a few elks wanted them to go back, on pretence that the Iroquois would have employment sufficient in slaying the game they should kill. The six Algonquins, however, after three days hunting, killed none, on which the Iroquois exulted, and in a day or two they privately set out to hunt by themselves, being provoked by the reproaches of the Algonquins for their inferiority. The Algonquins finding the Iroquois gone, and seeing them at night return laden with game, conceived against them so violent a hatred, that, before morning, they butchered all the Iroquois who were in the expedition. This bloody massacre was the effect of that capricious jealousy, of which those barbarians in general are so susceptible. In vain did the Iroquois demand satisfaction, for they received nothing but insults; so great was the contempt the Algonquins had for them. Exasperated by this treatment, and yet afraid to try their strength with the Algonquins, they stifled their resentment; and to ensure themselves to war, they fell upon other less powerful nations. In a short time, they became so well practised in the art of blood (for war it ought not to be called) that they thought themselves a match for the Algonquins, and fell upon them with a fury, which shewed that they could be satiated with nothing less than the extermination of the Algonquin race.

THE Hurons could not be neutral, for their country was environed by those of the two belligerent powers; they, therefore, took part with the Algonquins, and the war was carried on, on the part of the exasperated Iroquois, with diabolical fury. The Iroquois, it is true, were generally victorious: but no quarter being given on either side, the war threatened an utter extinction of all the three nations. Amongst those barbarians no victory can be decisive: for the numbers in which they fight are seldom above three or four hundred of a side, and every thing being done by surprise, the inhabitants of a whole village, even of the conquering party, may be cut off all at once. Bloodshed and losses serve only to exasperate them, and the victors seek death and danger at such distances from their own homes, that conquest itself is sure to diminish their numbers. It is at this period, however, that we are properly to take up the history of Canada, which begins with its first discovery, while those wars between the Iroquois, the Algonquins, and Hurons, were raging.

their enemies.

It is past dispute, that Cabot, the famous Italian adventurer, who sailed under a commission from Henry the seventh of England, discovered the vast extent of country, that now goes under the name of Canada; but the frugal maxims of that prince probably hindered his making any regular settlement there. The discovery however took air, and we find the French fishing for cod on the banks of Newfoundland, and along the sea-coast of Canada in the beginning of the sixteenth century. Nay, about the year 1506, one Denys, a Frenchman, drew a map of the gulph of St. Laurence, and two years after, one Aubert, a ship-master of Dieppe, carried over to France some of the natives of Canada. A few years after, the Spanish conquests in South America began to make a vast noise all over Europe; but the discovery of this new country not promising the same amazing mines of gold and silver that Peru and Mexico contained, the French, for some years, seem to have neglected the discovery. Francis I. of France, a sensible and enterprising prince, at last in the year 1523, sent four ships under the command of Verazani, a Florentine, to prosecute discoveries in that country. We are in the dark as to the particulars of Verazani's first expedition. All we know, is, that he returned to France, and next year he undertook a second, in which he touched at the island of Madeira, from whence he directed his course to the American coast. In approaching it he met with a violent storm; but came so near the coast, that he saw natives on the shore, and could discern them making friendly signs inviting him to land. This being found impracticable by reason of the surf upon the coast, one of the sailors threw himself into the sea; but, endeavouring to swim back to the ship, a surge threw him on shore without signs of life. He was, however, treated by the natives with such care and humanity, that he recovered his strength, and was suffered to swim back to the ship, which immediately returned to France; and this is all we know of Verazani's second expedition. Verazani, after this, embarked on the third expedition, but was no more heard of, and it is thought that he, and all his company, perished before he could form any colony.

THOUGH Canada gave the French no assurance of gold, silver, or diamond mines, yet they knew enough of the country to be sensible of the vast importance to which it might arrive. Not discouraged, therefore, by Verazani's want of success, one Jaques Cartier, a native of St. Malo, in April, 1534, set sail under a commission from the French king; and on the 10th of May thereafter, he arrived at Cape Bonavista in Newfoundland. He had with him two small ships, containing one hundred and twenty-two men, and he cruized along the coast of Newfoundland, on which he discerned inhabitants, probably the Esquimaux in the dress we have described. But tho' he found many commodious harbours, yet the land was so uninviting, and the climate so cold, that he set sail for the gulph, and entered the bay of Chaleurs, or Heats, as he called it, on account of the sultry weather he then met with. This bay is, by some called, Spanish bay. Leaving this bay, Cartier landed at several places along the coast of the gulph, and took possession of the country in the name of his most Christian majesty; a cheap method of obtaining dominion. Returning to France, that monarch, upon his report in 1535, gave him a commission, and sent him out with a large force. After meeting with various storms and separations, the three ships he had with him rendezvoused in the gulph; but he was compelled by a fresh storm to take refuge in the port of St. Nicholas. From thence he sailed on the 10th of August, and gave the gulph the name of St. Laurence from his entering it on the day of that festival; and the river now retains the same name. Passing by the isle of Anticosti, to which he gave the name of Assumption, he sailed up the river Saguenay, and anchored by a small island to which he gave the name of Coudres, or Hazels, from the numbers of those trees growing upon it. Returning from thence, and proceeding up the river St. Laurence, he came to an island so full of vines, that he called it the isle of Bacchus; but it now goes by the name of Orleans. He had, the last time he was in Canada, the precaution to carry two Americans with him to France, where they learned as much of the language as enabled them to serve as interpreters between him and their countrymen. Sailing up a small river he had an interview with an Indian chief called Donnacona, and he then heard of an Indian town, called Hochelaga, which was as it were the metropolis of the whole country, lying on an island, now known by the name of Montreal, provided with some kind of palisadoes, and other works sufficient to defend it against a sudden attack. The inhabitants probably were the Hurons, whom we have already mentioned to have been the most tractable of all the Indian nations, and who treated Cartier and his attendants with an equal degree of hospitality and astonishment at their persons, dress, and accoutrements. He had at this time with him only one ship, and two long boats, having left the rest at St. Croix, to which he returned, and there spent the winter, which proved so severe, that he and his people must have perished of the scurvy, had they not, by the advice of the natives, made use of a decoction of the bark and tops of the white pine already described. Cartier was ungenerous enough to kidnap his Indian friend Donnacona, and to carry him in the spring to France. But not being able to produce gold and silver, all he said about the utility of the settlement, and the fruitfulness of the country, was despised by the public; so that in the year 1540, he was obliged to serve as pilot to mons. de Roberval, who was by the French king appointed viceroy of Canada, and who sailed from France with five vessels. Arriving in the gulph of St. Laurence, they built a fort, and Roberval left Cartier to command a garrison in it, and went back in person to France, from whence he returned with additional recruits to his new settlement. He afterwards sailed up the river St. Laurence, as far as that of Saguenay, where, by means of a Portuguese, he endeavoured, but in vain, to find out the north-west passage to the East Indies. The expeditions and captivity of Francis I. for some time, diverted the attention of the French from improving this settlement; but in 1549, Roberval and his brother, of whom we have a great character, with a numerous train of adventurers, embarked for the river St. Laurence, and never were heard of more.

La Roche made lieutenant-general
of Canada.

THIS fatal accident discouraged the public, and government of France so greatly, that for fifty years no measures were taken for supplying the few French settlers that still remained in Canada. At last Henry IV. appointed the marquis de la Roche, a Breton gentleman, lieutenant-general of Canada, Hochelaga, Newfoundland, Labrador, and the bay and river of St. Laurence. This gentleman set sail in a ship from France, in the year 1598, and landed on the isle of Sable, which lies about fifty leagues to the south-east of Cape Breton, and thirty-five east of Canso. The marquis absurdly thought this to be a proper place for erecting a settlement, and left there about forty malefactors, the refuse of the French jails; but no place a place was ever more unfit for a settlement than this, being small, and without any port, or product but briars. It is narrow, and has the shape of a bow. In the middle of it is a lake about five leagues in compass, and the isle itself is about ten. It has a sand-bank at each end, one of which runs north-east and by east, and the other south-east. It has sand-hills which may be seen seven or eight leagues off. The history of those poor wretches contains the history of this expedition. The marquis, after cruising for some time on the coast of Nova Scotia, returned to France, without being able to carry them off the miserable island, and there he died of grief for having lost all his interest at that court. As for his wretched colony, they must have perished had not a French ship been wrecked upon the island, and a few sheep driven upon it at the same time. With the boards of the wreck they erected huts, with the sheep they supported nature, and when they had eat them up they lived on fish; but their clothes wearing out, they made coats of seals skins, and in this miserable condition they spent seven years, when Henry IV. ordered Chedotel, who had been pilot to la Roche, to bring them to France. Chedotel found only twelve of them alive, and when he returned, Henry had the curiosity to see them in their seal skin dresses; and their appearance moved him so much, that he ordered them a general pardon for their offences, and gave each of them fifty crowns to begin the world with anew.

His injudicious settlement.

THOUGH la Roche's patent had been very ample and exclusive, yet private adventurers had still traded to the river St. Laurence, without any notice being taken of them by the government. Amongst others was one Pontgravé, a merchant of St. Malo, who had made several trading voyages for furs to Tadoussac. Upon the death of la Roche, his patent was renewed in favour of Chauvin, a commander in the French navy, and he put himself under the direction of Pontgravé. In the year 1600, Chauvin, attended by Pontgravé, made a voyage to Tadoussac, where he left some of his people and returned with a very gainful quantity of furs to France. Next year he renewed the same voyage with the like good fortune, but he died when he was preparing for the third. The many specimens of profit to be made by the Canadian trade led the public to think favourably of it: and de Chatte, the governor of Dieppe, succeeded Chauvin, as governor of Canada. De Chatte's scheme seems to have been to have carried on that trade with France by a company of Rouen merchants and adventurers. An armament for this purpose was accordingly equipped, and the command of it given to Pontgravé, with powers to extend his discoveries up the river St. Laurence. Pontgravé with his squadron sailed in 1603, having in his company Samuel Champlain, afterwards the famous founder of Quebec, who had been a captain in the navy, and was a man of parts and spirit. Arriving at Tadoussac, they left their ships there, and in a long boat they proceeded up the river as far as the falls of St. Louis, and then returned to France. By this time de Chatte was dead, and was succeeded in his patent by the sieur de Monts, whose commission for an exclusive fur trade extended from forty to fifty-five degrees of north latitude, that is, from Virginia to almost the top of Hudson's Bay. He had likewise the power of granting lands as far as forty-six; and being lieutenant-general of that whole extensive province, it may be said that it was at his disposal. The French merchants were now so well reconciled to the Canadian trade, that de Monts was soon enabled to form a company, more considerable than any that had yet undertaken it, and who resolved to avail themselves of their exclusive patent.

De Chatte governor of Canada.

WITH this view they fitted out four ships; de Monts in person took the command of two of them, and was attended by Champlain, and a gentleman called Pontrincourt, with a number of volunteer adventurers. Another of the ships was destined to carry on the fur trade at Tadoussac, and the fourth was given to Pontgravé, who, after touching at Canso in Nova Scotia, was ordered to scour the sea between Cape Breton and St. John's island; and to clear it of all interlopers. It was the 7th of March, 1614, when de Monts sailed from Havre de Grace, and touching at Acadia, he there confiscated the Nightingale, an interloping vessel in the harbour, where he found her, to which he gave the French name of the ship, the Nightingale. He then steered for another haven, which he called Mutton-haven, on account of a sheep, which tumbled over board there, and where he remained for a month. Champlain was, all this while, in search, in a long boat, of a proper situation for a settlement, and at last he pitched upon a little island to which he gave the name of L'isle de St. Croix, about twenty leagues to the westward of St. John's river, and about half a league in circumference. He was followed to this island by Monf. de Monts; but it soon appeared that they had made a very injudicious choice of a situation for a settlement. For though the corn they sowed there produced very fine crops, and though they had been very successful in clearing the ground, they found themselves, when winter came on, without fresh water, without wood for firing, and, to crown their misfortunes, without fresh provisions. To save themselves the trouble of bringing fresh water from the continent, many of the new settlers drank melted snow, which filled the little colony with diseases, particularly the scurvy, and swept many of them off. Those inconveniencies determined de Monts to remove his settlement to Port Royal, which has since been called Annapolis Royal, and which, during the winter, had been discovered by Champlain. By this time, Pontgravé was returned to St. Croix from France; and found that colony almost ruined, but agreed with de Monts in settling at Port Royal. Pontrincourt was so much enamoured with this new situation, that de Monts, in virtue of his commission, made it over to him, and appointed him at the same time to be his lieutenant-general, upon Pontrincourt proposing to send for all his family to settle at Port Royal. De Monts then returned to France, where matters had taken a turn not at all in his favour; for the French court began to think they had gone upon very mistaken maxims in the exclusive privilege that had been granted him. The masters of the fishing vessels, the best trade which France then had, made the ministry sensible that de Monts, on pretence of preventing the trade with the natives, kept them from the necessities fit for fishing, and that they were upon the point of abandoning the fisheries; upon which de Monts's patent was revoked, though ten years of it were still to run. This did not damp de Monts; he entered into new engagements with Pontrincourt, who was then likewise in France; and the latter again sailed for America in an armed vessel from Rockelle in 1606. By the time they had arrived at Canso, the settlement at Port Royal, which had been left to the care of Pontgravé, was reduced to such difficulties, that he was obliged to reembark all the inhabitants but two, whom he left to take care of the effects he could not carry off. Before he left the bay of Fundy, he heard of Pontrincourt's arrival at Canso; upon which he returned to Port Royal, where Pontrincourt arrived about the same time. The relief which Pontrincourt brought to his infant colony, came so seasonably, that it again held up its head; but its prosperity was, in a great measure, owing to the spirit and abilities of Le Carbot, a French lawyer, who partly from friendship to Pontrincourt, and partly thro' curiosity, had made this voyage. At this time, Pontgravé, the ablest man by far of any concerned in the project, had resigned his command, and all concerns with Pontrincourt; and de Monts, who had somewhat retrieved his affairs, abandoned all connexion with Acadia, and was applying himself to the fur trade at Tadoussac. His company, who never had forsaken him, fitted out two ships, which sailed for the river St. Laurence in the spring of the year 1608. The fur trade was now become very considerable, and the company, which was mostly composed of St. Malo merchants, thrived exceedingly; but de Monts finding their interests were hurt by his remaining at their head, entirely withdrew from the association; upon which the company was re-instated in their privileges, all the use of which they made, was for their private emolument.

Settlement of

Champlain
founds Quebec.

VERY different were the views of Champlain, who, after examining all the most promising places in Acadia, and on the river St. Laurence, at last chose Quebec to settle in. He arrived there on the third of July, 1608, and after building some barracks for lodgings for his people, he began to clear the ground, where they sowed wheat and rye, which produced vast returns. Champlain then returned to France, but revisited his colony in 1610, and found them in a healthful, prosperous condition. It was at this time that the Iroquois had fair to exterminate the Algonquins, and the Hurons, in whose country Quebec was situated, and who, in hopes of the French assistance, were extremely complaisant to the new settlers. Champlain, on the other hand, did not fail to give them all the encouragement they could desire, and supplied them with provisions when the hunting season was over, and when they were reduced to the greatest distress. The Hurons in the spring of the year 1610, with their associates, prepared to take the field; and Champlain, ignorant of the great power and fierceness of their enemies, was persuaded to join the Hurons. This step was impolitic in Champlain, who did not foresee, that instead of humbling the Iroquois, and uniting all the Indians of that continent with France, he was forcing the Iroquois to throw themselves under the protection of the English and Dutch. He embarked on the river Sorel, then called the river of the Iroquois, with his allies; but after advancing up the river about fifteen leagues, he was stopped by the fall of Chambly, and forced to send back his chaloup to Quebec. Though he had been assured that this fall would stop his chaloup, he continued to march, attended only by two Frenchmen, who refused to leave him. Having carried their canoes over the bearing places, as they are called, they launched them again above the fall, and they pursued their voyage through a lake to which he gave his own name, which it still retains, and where the river Sorel ends. They then found a second fall at the farther end at the communication with lake Sacrament.

His expedition
and victory.

DURING this voyage, Champlain received great pleasure from the promising appearance of the islands by which he had passed, but was shocked by the superstitions of his new allies, and the impositions of their spiritual jugglers. One of those always attends upon their armies, and covering himself up with skins, from thence he emits various sounds, but such as do not resemble human, and which he pretends comes from the god of war. The same jugglers pretend to the spirit of divination, and when Champlain used to reproach them for their

a their repeated failures, in what they had foretold, they had always some ready excuse. The tricks of those mountebanks, however, were attended with one very bad effect, that they inspired their votaries with a spirit of rashness and carelessness, by always predicting to them good success.

UPON the borders of the lake Sacrament stood the Iroquois in battle array, though the Hurons thought to have surprized them in their village. It being then late, it was agreed, on both sides, to defer the battle till next morning. Champlain in the mean while, attended by a party of his savages, and his two Frenchmen, withdrew to a neighbouring wood; so that the Iroquois, who were in number about two hundred, seeing but a handful of their enemies, made themselves sure of victory. They were commanded by three chiefs, who were distinguished by larger plumes of feathers on their heads, than those the others wore, and were pointed out by the Hurons to Champlain, who, as soon as the battle began, issued with his party out of his retreat, and, with the first discharge of his firelock, killed two of their chiefs, and dangerously wounded the third. The consternation and astonishment of the Iroquois at the appearance of Champlain, with his two companions, as well as at the report and execution of his fire-arms, was inexpressible; and while he was recharging his musket, his two companions having killed some more of the Iroquois with theirs, the enemy fell into a total rout, and fled as fast as they could before the victorious allies, who killed some, and took others prisoners. The allies then, having none killed, and only fourteen or fifteen wounded, fell upon the spoils of the field, consisting of some maize, which they devoured, and it proved a very seasonable relief to them, their own provisions being now entirely exhausted.

over the Iro- quois.

AMONGST those barbarians, the conquerors, as well as the conquered, make their retreat with all the dispatch they can; and the victor Hurons, after travelling about eight leagues, stopt and intimated to one of their captives, that he must die by the same cruel torments, that his nation had so often inflicted upon their brethren, who had fallen into their hands. Champlain strongly remonstrated against this inhumanity; but all he could gain, either by his authority, or his entreaties, was, that he should be master of the captive's fate, upon which he immediately shot him dead. The victors then opened the body, threw the bowels into the lake, cut off the head, the arms, and the legs, but without touching the trunk, though before they generally had used to feed upon it. They, however, preserved the scalp, and cut the heart in pieces, which they forced the prisoners to eat in small gobbets, but the brother of the deceased, who was amongst the captives, spit out his part after it had been crammed into his mouth. The nations of the allies in this expedition were the Algonquins, the Hurons, and the Montagnez. The first remained at Quebec; the second retreated to their own country; and the last to Tadoussac, where they were joined by Champlain. As they approached that village they tied the scalps to long poles, as the signals of their triumph. Their women no sooner saw them than they threw themselves into the river, swam to their canoes, and seizing upon the scalps, hung them round their necks by way of ornament. They offered one to Champlain, but he refused it; and they made him a present of some bows and arrows, which they had taken from the enemy, and which they begged him to present to the French king, he being now upon his return to France.

expedition.

CHAMPLAIN, not meeting with a ship at Tadoussac, returned to Quebec, from whence he and Pontgravé once more embarked for France, leaving the command of their promising colony to Peter Chauvin. They waited upon his most Christian majesty at Fontainebleau; and then it was that Canada received the name of New France, by which the French, afterwards, affected to distinguish it. Two merchants, le Gendre and Collier, chiefs of the company, soon procured two new ships for Champlain and Pontgravé, and embarking on the 7th of March, 1610, they arrived on the 26th of April at Tadoussac. There they put themselves at the head of the Montagnez, and proceeding to Quebec, the allies again marched to the river Sorel, which was the place of rendezvous: but when Champlain arrived there, he was not joined by near so many Indians as he expected; and he was there obliged to abandon his chaloup. No sooner was he landed than all his Indians dispersed, and he was left alone with four Frenchmen, the rest of the crew remaining to guard his chaloup. He began now to be distressed by the swampiness of the ground over which he was obliged to march, and the continual bitings of the gnats and vermin that infested the air, when one of his savages came running to tell him that his allies were engaged with their enemies. Upon this he quickened his pace, and found that his allies the Hurons and Algonquins, having attacked their enemies in their intrenchments, had met with a repulse; but at the sight of Champlain and his French companions, they renewed the charge. The Iroquois, however, made a gallant resistance, Champlain and another Frenchman were wounded, but they plied their muskets so vigorously, that they killed many of the Iroquois, who at last took shelter against the shot. All the ammunition, that is, the arrows, of the Hurons, was, by this time, exhausted, and they were preparing, by Champlain's advice, to storm the intrenchment,

ment, when they were reinforced by six or seven Frenchmen, who made so furious an attack, ^a that almost all the Iroquois were killed or taken prisoners. The French stripped the vanquished of their beaver-skin coats, and the Hurons began to devour their prisoners. The Hurons despised the French for their avarice. The French abhorred the Hurons for their inhumanity, and each people considered the other as barbarians. While the victors were exercising their cruelties upon the vanquished, Champlain requested his allies to give him one of the Iroquois captives, which they did. He likewise prevailed upon them to receive a Frenchman into their society, that he might learn their language, and to send a young Huron to France to see that kingdom, and the glory thereof, that he might make a favourable report of the same to his countrymen upon his return.

State of Canada under Lewis XIII.

HENRY IV. was dead by this time, and de Monts's interest being thereby entirely ruined, ^b Champlain was obliged to abandon, for that time, a settlement he had planned out at Montreal, and to go to France, which he did in 1611. By de Monts's advice, Champlain applied to Charles of Bourbon, count of Soissons, to be the father of New France, an honour which that prince readily accepted of; and, having got a proper commission from the queen-regent, nominated Champlain to be his lieutenant with unlimited powers. The count dying soon after, the government of Canada or New France devolved upon the prince of Conde, who continued Champlain in his government. Some commercial differences that happened amongst the company detained Champlain in France all the year 1612, and on the 6th of March 1613, he embarked on board a vessel commanded by Pontgravé for Quebec, before which place he landed on the 7th of May. They found the Quebec colony in so thriving a state, that they ^c immediately proceeded up to Montreal, and soon after Champlain returned to France with Pontgravé. The reason of those frequent voyages to, and from, Old and New France, seem to have been occasioned by disputes that still subsisted among the company; but Champlain, in 1615, formed new engagements with the merchants of Paris, Rouen, and Rochelle; which were confirmed by the prince of Conde, who had now assumed the title of viceroy of New France.

Character of Champlain,

CHAMPLAIN, whose character seems to have been a mixture of valour, vanity, perseverance, enthusiasm, and integrity, having thus established the temporal interests of his new colony, began now to think upon its spiritual ones, and procured four father recollects, who were fitted out at the charge of the company, to attend him to Canada; and they ^d accordingly arrived at Tadoussac the 25th of March, 1615. It would perhaps be difficult to reconcile Champlain's making himself a party against the Iroquois, who never had offended him, and slaughtering them as he did, to the principles, either of humanity, religion, or policy. It were to be wished, that the same observation did not occur upon the conduct of other European nations, which is so much the more unjust, as no people in the world, perhaps, has so strong an affection for their native soil, as those North American savages. Be this as it will, Champlain leaving the recollects at Quebec, went up to Montreal, where he had another interview with his savage allies, and undertook to head them in a third expedition against the Iroquois. By this conduct, he made himself cheap in the eyes of the savages; but so strong was his propensity to action, that he left Caron, one of the recollect ^e fathers, who had attended him, with the Hurons, and took their promise, that they would not set out on their expeditions, till his return from Quebec, whither he was called by some business.

and of Caron, a missionary.

THIS Caron was a thorough enthusiast, and aspired to the crown of martyrdom. The savages disregarded Champlain so much, that they set out for Montreal before he returned from Quebec, and carried Caron with them, and some other Frenchmen. Champlain dispatching his business at Quebec, he returned to Montreal with two Frenchmen, and was there joined by ten other Frenchmen, that had been brought by Caron from Quebec, but found no Hurons. Tho' the disregard shewed him by the savages might have excused Champlain from fulfilling his engagements, yet, pretending to be greatly concerned about Caron, he ^f proceeded to the Huron village, where he met with his allies. Champlain being now at the head of twelve Frenchmen, besides father Caron, who thirsted to shed the blood of unbelievers, thought himself invincible, and setting out at the head of his allies, found his enemies intrenched in a fort, of no mean construction for defence, with trees cut down to block up the passages to it: Champlain immediately led his party to the assault, but was repulsed with loss. He endeavoured to set fire to the fort; but the Iroquois foreseeing that, had provided plenty of water, which extinguished the flames. He then constructed a kind of a wooden stage to overlook the building, so as that his musketeers being placed on it might fire down upon the enemy. Before this expedient had any effect, he was wounded in the leg and knee, which struck the savages with so much dejection, that they refused to follow him; ^g and he was obliged to abandon the attack with loss and shame, but without being pursued or losing a man in the retreat, which continued for five and twenty leagues, the savages carrying their wounded all that way upon hurdles.

a AFTER Champlain was cured of his wounds, he demanded the guides that had been promised him to reconduct him to Quebec; but they were denied him in the harshest manner, and he was therefore obliged to spend the winter among the savages. He made the best use of his time he could. He visited all the Huron villages, and penetrated into those of the Algonquins as far as the lake Nepissing; and as soon as the river became navigable, having engaged some Hurons to be faithful to him, he secretly embarked with them, and arrived at Quebec, with father Caron, on the 11th of July, 1616. Both of them were there received as risen from the dead. Having staid at Quebec for a month, Champlain, the superior of the mission, and Caron, took shipping for France, leaving only two of the recollects, D'Olbeau, and Duplessys, in New France. Conspiracy against the French.

b DURING his absence, his Indian allies giving vent to the suspicions they entertained of the French intentions, formed a design of cutting the throats of all the French amongst them. Champlain had settled at Trois Rivières, a small French colony; and two of them were murdered by the natives, who assembled to the number of 800 near that place, to carry their bloody intentions into execution. The French, however, had made some friends amongst the barbarians, and father Duplessys being secretly informed of their intention, not only diverted it, but found means to bring the barbarians to make advances for a reconciliation. By this time, Champlain had returned from France, and demanded to have the two murderers of the two Frenchmen delivered up to him. One of them was sent; and along with him a quantity of furs to cover the dead, which is an Indian expression for making satisfaction for murder; and Champlain was obliged to put up with that kind of atonement.

c By this time, the civil dissensions of France entirely employed the attention of the prince of Conde, and the public concerns of Canada were neglected. The merchants who enjoyed the benefit of the patent, neither minded the civil nor religious interests of the new colonists; all they attended to was their own profit, and Champlain, in vain, made several trips backwards and forwards between France and Canada, to arouse a public spirit both in the government and the company. At last, in 1620, the prince of Conde sold the viceroyalty of New France to his brother-in-law, the marshal Montmorenci, who continued Champlain in his lieutenancy, but intrusted all the other affairs of Canada to M. Dolu. Champlain then carried his family over to New France, where they arrived in the month of May; and so greatly was the company abused, that at Tadoussac, he found traders from Rochelle, not only trafficking with the savages, but bargaining with them for fire-arms, the most pernicious commerce that could be introduced for the colony. Canada neglected.

d In the year 1621, the Iroquois assembled in three bodies, being determined, if possible, to exterminate the French from amongst them; not so much from any resentment against them, as to gratify that vindictive spirit which they entertained against the Algonquins and the Hurons. One of those bodies attacked the pass at the fall of St. Louis, but were repulsed; some of them were killed, and others fled, carrying with them Poulain, a French recollect. The French, in vain, endeavoured to rescue him; but they gave one of their captives liberty to repair to his countrymen, and to propose to exchange the recollect for one of the Iroquois chiefs, who had been made prisoner. The captive arrived at the Iroquois village, just as the fire was prepared, for putting the recollect to a miserable death; but the terms he proposed were accepted of, and the exchange was made. The second body of the Iroquois went down in 30 canoes to attack the convent of the recollects near Quebec; but finding the enterprize too hazardous, they fell upon a body of the Hurons in the neighbourhood, and, making some prisoners, they burnt them. We have no account of what became of the third body. Champlain attributed all those attacks to the attachment of the company to its own interest; and made such effectual representations on that head, that it was suppressed, its powers and privileges being vested in William and Emeric de Caen, uncle and nephew. Champlain, at the same time, received a letter from his most Christian majesty, highly approving of his conduct, and confirming him in his command; while the viceroy, by another letter, exhorted him to do all the service he could to the new patentees. The war renewed.

e LEST the reader should be misled in his ideas, we are to inform him that all the colony at Quebec at this time did not exceed 50 persons, men, women, and children; but an establishment had been formed at Trois Rivières, and a brisk trade continued to be carried on at Tadoussac. William de Caen, a Calvinist, and one of the new patentees, visited Canada in person, and was well received by the new colonists. Here we cannot help observing, that had it not been for the impolitic introduction of the ecclesiastics into the new colony, they might have been in a flourishing condition. But, to bigotry and enthusiasm, they joined craft and avarice, and above all, an unbounded desire to enlarge the power and riches of their several orders. For this purpose, they formed parties amongst the natives, instructing them in all the refinements of European falshood, in the practice of rapine, revenge, and every diabolical crime that heated fancy and selfish views can suggest. Champlain State of the colony.

plain was not a man of a cast either to discover or to remedy those disorders, and Pontgravé,^a in whom Caen very deservedly reposed his greatest confidence, was by the bad state of his health forced to return to France in 1623.

Jealousy of the Hurons.

THE Hurons, at this time, notwithstanding all the services Champlain had done them, began to suspect the views of the French upon their habitations, and to hate them even worse than they did the Iroquois, whom they invited to join them in an attempt to exterminate the French settlers in their common country. Champlain having undoubted intelligence of their design, dispatched father Caron and two other missionaries to keep the Hurons firm to their alliance with the French; but not trusting to this mission, he built the fort of Quebec all of stone, for the better protection of his colony. No sooner was it finished, than his volatile humour, to the amazement of the colonists, led him back to France, to which,^b at the same time, he carried his family. He there found Montmorenci in a treaty with his nephew, the duke de Ventadour, who had taken holy orders, for the viceroyalty of Canada; and the bargain between them was quickly concluded. The views the duke had in this purchase were entirely religious, without the least mixture of secular considerations. He sighed for the conversion of the Indians to the gospel; and having given up his conscience to the jesuits, he resolved to employ them for that purpose, instead of the recolects, who, in general, were glad to have fellow-labourers in the vintage of conversions. A mission of five jesuits was accordingly appointed, and the duke de Ventadour obliged William de Caen, who conducted them in person to Canada, to promise they should want for nothing. Charlevoix, who was himself a jesuit, pretends that he falsified his word, and that the jesuits were no sooner landed at Quebec, than he told them, that unless the fathers recolects would provide them in their house with lodgings, they must return to France. The same author pretends, that Caen put Calvinistical treatises against the jesuits into the hands of the inhabitants of Quebec, to prejudice them against that order; but that the good behaviour of those fathers effaced all prejudices against them.^c jesuits.

A FEW days after their arrival, as two of the most zealous of them were preparing to set out for the conversion of the Hurons, they heard of the death of Viel, and a young Christian convert, who had been overset in a boat by those barbarians, seemingly with design, as they seized upon their baggage. The religious disputes that had then prevailed in France, was probably the chief reason why, about the year 1626, Quebec began to assume the face of a^d city; but as it was under a Huguenot direction, the jesuits prevailed with the duke de Ventadour to write a sharp letter to Caen, whom they represented as being the author of all the difficulties they met with. This divided state of the colony had almost ruined it. The natives massacred the French wherever they could securely do it, and religious disputes in the colony came to such a height, that, in 1627, when Champlain returned to Quebec, he found no advances had been made either in building houses or clearing the ground. The jesuits, some of whom were not only men of interest but quality, made strong complaints on this at the French court, throwing all the blame upon Caen and his associates, who minded nothing but the fur-trade.

The colony

the protestants;

Richelieu was then first and sole minister of France, and his character cannot be unknown^e to our readers. He hated the French protestants, and resolved entirely to alter the constitution of Quebec, by putting that colony and its trade into the hands of a hundred partners, under the following regulations. 1. That the partnership should next year (1628) send over to New France 2 or 300 workmen of all kinds; and before the year 1643 engage to augment the French inhabitants to the number of 16,000; to lodge, maintain, and find them in all necessaries for three years, and then make an equal distribution amongst them of the lands that should be cleared, according to their respective wants, furnishing each family with seed to sow them. 2. That no colonist, who was not a native Frenchman, should be admitted in New France; and that all Huguenots, as well as strangers,^f should be excluded. 3. That in every district, at least, three priests should be maintained, whom the partnership was to supply with all necessaries both for their persons and missions for 15 years; after which time they were to live upon the cleared lands that were to be assigned them.

Its constitution,

ON the other hand, his most Christian majesty, to indemnify the partnership for those expences, gave up to them in perpetuity the fort and district of Quebec, with all the territory of New France, comprehending that part of Florida which had been settled by his predecessors, with all the course of the Great River till it discharges itself into the sea; with all the isles, ports, havens, mines, and fisheries, contained in that vast extent of territory; his majesty reserving to himself only the faith and homage of the inhabitants, with a golden crown of eight marks weight, to be paid to every new king of France, together with the provisions for the officers of justice, who were to be named, and presented to him by the associates or partners as soon as it was found requisite to establish a civil government there. The partnership had likewise power to cast cannon, and to make all kind of arms, as well^g

- a as to fortify places. The second article gives the partnership a power of conveying lands in such proportions as his majesty shall think proper, and to annex such titles, honours, rights, and powers to them as he shall prescribe, according to the merits of the persons, but with certain restrictions and conditions; but that the erection of duchies, marquises, earldoms, and baronets, should require the royal letters of confirmation upon the presentation of cardinal Richlieu, great master, head and superintendant of the navigation and commerce of France. The third article repeals all the former grants of the same nature, and gives the partnership for ever all the fur and peltry trade, and all other trades within the fore-mentioned limits for 15 years, except the fisheries, which his majesty intends should be in common to all his subjects. By the fourth article, the French settled in Canada, and b not depending upon the partnership, might trade with the natives for furs, provided they disposed of their beavers only to the company's factors, who were obliged to take them at a certain price. The fifth article grants to the company two ships of war, each of 2 or 300 tons, to be victualled by the company, who were to replace them if lost, unless they are destroyed or taken by an enemy. By the sixth article, the company was to repay to his majesty the price of two ships, if, during the first ten years of their contract, they did not carry over 1500 French, men and women, to New France; and their patent was to be void, if they did not carry over the same number during the last five years. By the seventh and last article, all military officers, and soldiers of whatever kind, sent to Canada in those two ships, c the officers and soldiers of their own ships, and his majesty makes them a present of four culverins.

By another ordonnance, his most Christian majesty gave still greater encouragement to the new colonists, viz. all tradesmen and machanics employed by the company, who should chuse to return to France, after residing six years in Canada, had liberty to practise their several professions in Paris or any place in France. Merchandises manufactured there, were to pay no imposts upon being imported into France for fifteen years; nor was any tax to be laid upon provisions of any kind exported to the new colony. Ecclesiastics, noblemen, and others, associating in the company, might do it without derogation to their rank or honours; and his majesty was to create twelve of the company nobles; and all the natives d of Canada were, to all intents and purposes, to be reputed natives of Old France. And his majesty reserved to himself the qualification of the above articles, in case the company should meet with any obstruction from war, either civil or foreign.

We have been the more explicit with regard to the above articles, because, except what relates to religion, (and that perhaps was necessary at that time) they undoubtedly contain a most excellent system for forming a colony, and well worthy of imitation. They were signed the 19th of April 1627, and the duke de Ventadour, at the same time, resigned in- to his majesty's hands the post of viceroy. The company was called that of New France, and its numbers soon rose to 107; at the head of whom were the cardinal Richelieu him- self, the marshal Desiat, superintendant of the finances, and other persons of great dis- e tinction; but the bulk was composed of rich merchants and traders. It happened, how- ever, at this time, that Charles the First quarrelled with France; and David Kirk, whom English writers commonly call Sir David Kirk, a native of Dieppe, and a Calvinist, insti- gated probably by Caen, who was piqued at losing his exclusive privilege, received the command of three English ships, and came up the river St. Laurence as far as Tadoussac, where he set on shore some men, who destroyed all the houses, and took the cattle at Cape Torment; and he then proceeded to Quebec, with orders to summon the governor to deliver up the fort.

THE infant colony at that time was in a miserable situation, being reduced to seven ounces of bread a day for each man, and they had but five pounds of powder in the gar- rison. Notwithstanding this, Champlain and Pontgravé who happened to be then at Quebec, after some consultation, returned for answer to the English officer, that they were de- termined to hold out the fort to the last extremity. This bravado, perhaps, would have been ineffectual, had not Kirk had intelligence from Caen of a squadron having entered the river under Roquemont, with provisions and all kind of necessaries for the new colony. This Roquemont had been governor and lieutenant-general of New France, under his most Christian majesty, and instead of avoiding Kirk, he sought and fought him, but was de- feated, and his squadron taken. This misfortune encreased the distresses of the colony, which now had nothing to depend on but the labours of some missionaries, who had return- ed to France to solicit their friends for relief. They were so successful as to procure a ship g laden with provisions of all kinds; but it was wrecked before it touched Quebec. This disaster reduced the colony to the utmost distress, which was aggravated by the divisions that prevailed amongst the colonists themselves, and the growing disrespect of the savages for the French; the cause of which Charlevoix attributes to the Huguenots introduced amongst them by Caen. In this extremity Champlain made war upon the savages out of mere necessity; and the colonists, who consisted but of one hundred people, were obliged to repair to the woods, and there to dig roots for their sustenance. Towards the end of July 1629; the English under Kirk again appeared off point Levi, and an officer was sent on shore to Quebec to summon it to surrender. Champlain, in the situation he then was, looked upon this summons as his deliverance, and the capitulation was soon made between him and Kirk's two brothers, the one of whom was to command the squadron, and the other to be governor of Quebec. It imported, that the English were to furnish a vessel, at the expence of the garrison, to carry it, and all the effects of the colonists that they could transport, to Old France, with other very favourable terms for the colony, which were punctually and honourably fulfilled by the English; even the jesuits themselves, contrary to their usual custom, extolled the good faith, humanity and politeness of the English upon this occasion. In short, their behaviour had so good an effect, that most part of the colony chose to remain with them rather than go to Old France.

THE capitulation being finished, Champlain went on board one of the English ships for Tadoussac, and it was met, and almost taken, by a French ship under the command of Emery de Caen; but his crew being composed of Calvinists, according to the French writers, did not chuse to exert themselves against the English. Charlevoix pretends that the peace between England and France was concluded before Kirk entered upon his expedition, and he attributes all his success to the intelligence given him by one Michel, a French Calvinist. Be this as it will, it is certain that Kirk was greatly disappointed when he took possession of Quebec, where he found nothing but want and misery. Upon Champlain's return to France, he perceived the public there divided with regard to Canada; some thinking that it was not worth the reclaiming, as it had already cost the government vast sums without bringing any return; and that it only served to depopulate the mother-country. But these considerations were over-ballanced by the vast advantages of the fishery, and accordingly proving a nursery for seamen. Champlain supported his plan so well, that he carried his point; and not only Canada, but Acadia, and the isle of Cape Breton, were restored to the French by the treaty of St. Germain's in 1632. Emery de Caen carried the treaty to Lewis Kirk, who had been left governor of Canada, and who resigned his command to Caen. By this time, however, the English began to have some idea of the profits of the fur-trade; for though, by the treaty of St. Germain's, none but the French were to exercise it, Kirk carried it on for a whole year after the surrender of Quebec.

PERHAPS had it not been for a dash of enthusiasm, which Champlain had in his composition, he never could have succeeded in supporting this unpromising colony; but no difficulties were unfurmountable by his zeal: and in 1633, the company of New France re-entered into all its rights in Canada, of which Champlain was made governor; and so indefatigably did he act, that in a short time he was at the head of a new armament, furnished with a fresh recruit of jesuits, inhabitants, and all kind of necessaries for the welfare of the revived colony. It is almost incredible that Champlain's principal view was neither to advance his own, nor his country's temporal interests in this undertaking, but to convert the savages, by means of the jesuits, who now engrossed the whole of the mission, and whose views, perhaps, extended much farther than those of Champlain. They found, however, the task of conversions extremely difficult and discouraging. The natives were far from being so tractable as had been given out. They were invincibly obstinate in their dispositions, and their compliances in point of religion were either fictitious and interested, or so slight that the impressions soon wore off; so that the jesuits found amongst them few or no christians. Charlevoix attributes their apostacy to the English; who, he says, tyrannized over the inhabitants. But the number of ecclesiastical missionaries, exclusive of lay-brothers, were now fifteen, the chief of whom were Le Jeune, De Noue, Masse and Brebeuf. In a short time, they prevailed with the French court to banish all protestants out of Canada, so that it was entirely planted with good catholics. Champlain in 1634 endeavoured to settle a mission in the Huron country, but met with many difficulties. An Algonquin had killed a Frenchman, and Champlain had clapped the murderer into prison; the missionaries were then ready to depart for the country of the Hurons, but an Algonquin chief flatly refused to suffer them to embark in their canoes (the only way by which they could travel) unless his countryman was set at liberty. The reason he gave for his obstinacy in this point, was, that the parents and relations of the criminal expected him, and that they durst carry no Frenchman into their country without him. It was in vain for Champlain to reason with the chief on this occasion; for though the Algonquin chief seemed to be single in his opinion, yet it soon appeared that all the others were in a concert with him, and that he spoke their sense; so that Champlain persuaded the missionaries to drop their journey for that a that time. Thus those savages outwitted even the jesuits themselves. We shall only on this occasion take notice, that the real name of the Huron nation was Tendats, and that Hurons is a word of French original, occasioned by the frightful appearance of their hair when first discovered (A).

CHAMPLAIN's zeal seems to have been encreased by the difficulties he encountered. The Hurons, though, according to French writers, the most tractable and ingenious of all the American savages, could not be persuaded to admit a missionary into their country till they obtained their own terms; and even then they appeared so reserved and dogged, that the fathers looked upon themselves as so many sheep in the midst of wolves. We shall not trouble our readers with the encomiums Charlevoix bestows upon the first French missionaries in the Huron country. It is very probable, their difficulties were so great that none but jesuits could have surmounted them. At last they gained footing in a village called Jouhatiri, where they made half a dozen converts, and built a chapel which they dedicated to St. Joseph, whose name they likewise gave to the village; and they began to gain some footing by their inflexible perseverance. New France, all this while, was gaining inhabitants, and the colony was approaching to a degree of consistency. In 1635, René Rochault, eldest son of the marquis de Gamache, having entered into the society of Jesuits, resumed the design he had before formed, but which had been interrupted by the conquest which the English had made of Quebec, of founding a college there. While this affair was in agitation, the indefatigable Champlain died in December 1635, at Quebec; and, notwithstanding the encomiums the jesuits bestow on his memory, he appears to have been a weak-brained enthusiast, excessively credulous, but very proper for executing what he undertook. Notwithstanding his death, the design of the college still went on, and was of infinite service to the colony. Many of the French were now encouraged to embark themselves and their families for Canada, and the savages themselves began to lose their reluctance to associate with Christians, as the good fathers, besides giving their children education, kept up good house-keeping in their college, which greatly reconciled the natives to their interest.

Conduct of Champlain.

His death.

In the year 1606 Monf. de Montmagny succeeded Champlain in the government of New France; and M. de L'Isle commanded at the new settlement of Trois Rivières; both of them being knights of Malta, and zealous for the propagation of christianity, or rather jesuitism. Montmagny encouraged the Hurons to send their children to Quebec, where he had projected a seminary for them in the college of the jesuits. But those barbarians, receiving presents, they seemed to be all compliance, but retracted when they had nothing more to expect. Five or six Indians agreed to send their sons to the seminary; but after they were put on board the canoes, they pursued and rescued them from the hands of the fathers. The soon found that the colony lay still under great difficulties. Montmagny proceeded upon Champlain's plan, but nothing was to be done with the savages without rewards. Montmagny found his funds deficient in this respect, and every day cooled the ardor of the natives, till at last they came to be almost estranged from the French. The Iroquois, who were still more intractable than the Hurons, or the Algonquins, courted their enemies to take part with them against the French; but the Hurons depending on French assistance, gave themselves very little trouble, till the Iroquois surprized and massacred many of them. Whatever endowments the French may be possessed of as a people, they certainly acted most impolitically on this occasion; and their public was the dupe of the European jesuits, who thought to extend their power and influence at the expence of the company.

Succeeded by Montmagny.

Account of the jesuit missions.

For this purpose they sent to Canada the most resolute enthusiasts they could pitch upon, who underwent incredible fatigues in their mission, and often employed even force in converting and baptizing the savages. It happened that Old France itself was at this time, viz. in 1637, not a little infected with the same spirit of enthusiasm that actuated the missionaries. The flame was kept up by those fathers, who from the wilds of Canada wrote over to France in the most affecting and pathetic terms, accounts of the difficulties, the dangers, and the unspeakable fatigues they daily underwent. The Iroquois, notwithstanding all that Montmagny could do to blind them, were sensible of the real weakness of the colony, and even insulted the governor of Trois Rivières; so that the affairs of New France were in immediate danger of being ruined, when the European jesuits, who had the possession of the consciences of the French court and ministry, blew the flames of religion with such efficacy, as engaged the queen herself and the princesses of the blood in the support of the colony. In the beginning of the year 1628 a contagious distemper broke out in one of the Huron villages, and in a short time communicated itself to the whole nation. The savages, who never reason but from appearances, till this happened, a had attributed all the calamities they met with to the incantations and witchcraft of the christians amongst them; but they were now undeceived. Those barbarians are as ignorant in treating inward maladies, as they are excellent in curing external wounds; and the jesuits administered such effectual remedies as stopt the progress of the distemper, and greatly reconciled them to their company. The accounts of this animated the court of France; so that a scheme was formed of establishing a nunnery at Quebec, to which the ursulins and the hospitallers offered their persons and their services with the most lively zeal. The commander of Sylleri was indefatigable in seconding the views of the jesuits, for erecting a settlement composed only of christians and profelytes, to be a bulwark for the colony against the insults of the Iroquois, and to promote the cultivation of lands. With b this view he sent workmen to Quebec, and requested father Le Jeune to pitch upon a proper spot for their settlement. The father chose one on the north-side of the river St. Lawrence, into which twelve christian families entered, whose numbers soon encreased, and the place at this time retains the name of the founder. A school for female children, and an hospital for the sick, were still wanting. The hospital was equally to serve the colonists as the natives, both being as yet very indigent; and the school was to be under the direction of French ursulins, who were to educate in it not only French, but savage, girls. The duchess of Aiguillon undertook the foundation of the hospital, and by her persuasion the religious hospitallers of Dieppe, all of them females, offered to sacrifice all they had to the service of sick Canadians. It was therefore thought proper to make choice c of no more than three, who accordingly departed for the colony. The ursulin foundation encountered new difficulties. It is possible that the company of New France by this time began to think that the good jesuits were engrossing too much power to themselves; and it must be confessed that the colony at that juncture wore the face rather of a religious seminary than a national undertaking. For that reason they had given no attention to the ursulin foundation. Nothing, however, could resist the ridiculous spirit of devotion that then obtained in France. A young widow of Alençon, Madam de la Peltrie, devoted her person and fortune to this establishment; and came to Paris to regulate her proceeding, and removed from thence to Tours. There she found two ursulins fit for her ends, viz. d the illustrious Mary of the Incarnation, to speak in the terms of Charlevoix, who has written her life, and Mary de St. Joseph. From Tours this widow removed to Dieppe, where she found a third ursulin proper for her purpose. Nothing can exceed the absurdity of the miracles said to be worked by those holy sisters, who have been always looked upon by the Canadians as their tutelar angels. They embarked on the 4th of May 1639, along with Madam de la Peltrie and father Vimond, who had been appointed to succeed father Le Jeune, as superior of the jesuit mission in Canada; and after a hazardous voyage they landed at Quebec on the first of August. This new kind of mission makes a great figure in the annals of Canada. The governor received the ladies on their debarkment at the head of his troops, who were drawn up under arms. They entered Quebec under a general discharge of the cannon, and proceeded in triumph, amidst the acclamations of the people, e to the church, where Te Deum was solemnly sung for their arrival. This was a period of triumph to the jesuits. They held forth not only to the savages, but to the colony, the infinite merits of those ladies, who could exchange ease and affluence in Europe, for fatigue and indigence in America; and the behaviour of the ladies themselves confirmed all they said in their praise. Far from being shocked at the indigence, poverty, and squalid appearance of the Indian huts, they seemed to rejoice at their having an opportunity to manifest their zeal by their intense labours for propagating christianity. The enthusiasm of madam de la Peltrie went to extravagance. She not only stripped herself, that she might cloath the naked savages, but worked with her own hands in cultivating the ground for their subsistence. The ursulins and the hospitallers strove to out-do one another in f their zeal; and the former settled at Quebec, as the latter did at Sylleri, where the hospital was daily crouded with patients. According to Charlevoix, the labours of those good sisters, as well as the charities of the inhabitants of Quebec, were inconceivable; but the company failed on their part, and gave them little or no assistance. About the year 1640 the war broke out afresh between the Iroquois and the Hurons; and here we shall, once for all, exhibit a scene that may give the reader some idea of the manners of those infernal barbarians.

ONE day the Hurons having the advantage in a skirmish, made an Iroquois chief captive, and he was brought to one of the Huron villages, where the fathers were assembled. No sooner was he arrived, than it was decreed in an assembly of the antient savages, that he g should be presented to one of their old chiefs, to replace his nephew, who had been killed in war, or to be disposed of as he should think proper. Brebeuf, one of the jesuits, immediately resolved to convert him to christianity. The captive was cloathed in a new beaver a beaver habit, with a curious necklace, and his temples were circled with a kind of diadem. He was surrounded by a troop of triumphant warriors, and seemed to be quite unconcerned at his fate. When Brebeuf approached him, he perceived, that, before his fate was determined, he had been tortured. One of his hands had been crushed between two flints, and had lost a finger. His other hand had lost two, which had been cut off by a hatchet. The joints of his arms had been burnt, and a great gash appeared upon one of them. All this had been inflicted upon the poor wretch, before he entered the Huron village; for he no sooner arrived there, than he was treated with the greatest endearments, and a young woman was assigned him for his wife. Such was this barbarian's situation when he was converted by Brebeuf; and he is esteemed to be the first adult convert, that ever was made of the Iroquois nation; being baptized by the name of Joseph.

b ALL this while the captive was loaded with caresses, and Brebeuf was suffered to take him to his tent every night; but his sores now became putrid and full of worms. To increase his misery, he was carried in triumph from village to village, and wherever he came he was obliged to sing, so that sometimes his voice entirely failed him, nor had he the least respite, but when he was alone with Brebeuf, or some of the missionaries. At last, he was conveyed to the village where the chief lived, who was to be the disposer of his fate. The captive presented himself with an air perfectly unconcerned to his supposed uncle, who, after surveying him, talked to him in the following strain. "Nephew, said c he, you cannot imagine the joy I conceived, when I understood that you was to supply the place of him whom I have lost; I had already prepared a mat for thee in my cabin, and it was with the utmost satisfaction, that I resolved to pass the rest of my days with thee in peace; but the condition I see thee in, forces me to alter my resolution. It is plain that the pains and tortures you suffer, must render your life insupportable to yourself, and you must think that I do you service in abridging its course. They who have mangled you in this manner, have caused your death. Take courage, therefore, my dear nephew, prepare yourself this evening to shew that you are a man, and that you are superior to the force of torments." The captive heard this discourse with the greatest indifference, and only answered with a resolute voice, that it was very well. The sister of the deceased then d served him with victuals, and caressed him in the most affectionate manner, while the old chieftain put his own pipe into his mouth, and wiped the sweat from his brows, with the most tender demonstrations of paternal love. Towards noon the captive, at the expence of his supposed uncle, made his farewell feast, and while the inhabitants of the village were all assembled around him, he harangued them as follows: "Brethren, I am about to die, divert yourselves boldly around me; be convinced that I am a man, and that I neither fear death, nor all the torments you can inflict." He then began a song, in which he was joined by the warriors who were present. He was then presented with victuals, and when the feast was ended, he was carried to the place of execution, which is e called the cabin of blood (or heads cut off) and always belongs to the head of the village. About eight o'clock in the evening, all the savages of the village being assembled, the young men, who were to be executioners of the tragedy, forming the first row round the prisoner, were exhorted by one of their infernal elders to behave well, meaning thereby to put him to the most excruciating tortures. The prisoner was then seated on a mat, where his hands were tied, and then rising, he danced round the cabin, singing his death-song all the time, and then replaced himself upon the mat. One of the elders then took f from him his robe, which he said was destined for such a chief (naming him) that such a village was to cut off his head, which, with an arm, was to be given to such another village, to feast upon it. According to Charlevoix, whose brethren the jesuits are all of them heroes, temporal as well as spiritual, father Brebeuf encouraged the victim to suffer with the sentiments of christianity, which he did, with a most amazing firmness, without dropping the least reproachable word. He even talked of the affairs of his nation, with as much indifference, as if he had been at home with his family. Eleven fires had been lighted to torment him; and the elders said it was of consequence, that he should be alive at sun-rising, for which reason his tortures were prolonged to that time, when the barbarians, fearing that he should expire without iron (another of their barbarous superstitions) carried him out of the village, and cut off one of his feet, a hand, and his head, which were disposed of as proposed, while his body was thrown into a cauldron.

His resolution.

g THIS horrible story makes it doubtful, whether cruelty, stupidity, caprice, and dissimulation, do not equally form the composition of those savages. It is certain the missionaries, whose way of life Charlevoix describes as minutely as pathetically, underwent astonishing labours, as well as the most imminent dangers, from those barbarians. The least whim that struck them of their having lost a relation, because he had been baptized, or a friend, who was under the care of the fathers, brought them into peril of their lives; and even

even their Huron friends, who waited upon them as guards, beheld their dangers with the utmost indifference, without offering to interpose in their favour, and nothing but covering the dead could save them, that is, their making a present of furs by way of expiation. Charlevoix gives us a remarkable instance of this kind, that happened to father Lallemant, who, while he was under the protection of a Huron guard, narrowly escaped being strangled by an Algonquin savage in his tent.

TroisRivieres prosper.

By this time, the settlement of Trois Rivières began to be greatly resorted to, not only by the Algonquins, but by the most distant northerly nations, particularly the Attikamegues, who live in the neighbourhood of the lake St. Thomas, whom the fathers who frequented that settlement found to be a very tractable race. Another mission was formed at Tadoussac, the most frequented station in all Canada by the savages, particularly the Papinachies, the Bersiamites, the Mountaineers, and the Porcupines. Sometimes all those nations met together at Tadoussac; but as soon as their traffic was over, they returned to their wilds and forests, to which they were often followed by the missionaries, who even attended them in their winter huntings, which presented the most dreadful and uncomfortable scenes, the most frightful delarts generally supplied the greatest plenty of game. Some of the savages however resided all winter in the neighbourhood of Tadoussac, and were there converted. Another mission was established at the island of Miscou in the gulph of St. Lawrence, to which the Indians resorted for the benefit of fishing. The civil distractions of France, at last, prevented any great national assistance being afforded to those promising settlements. The Canadian company neglected their interests so much, that they suffered both the fur and fish trade to be ingrossed by individuals, and no pains was taken to give the colony a consistency.

The Iroquois
overawed.

THE presence of the French, however, in Canada, overawed the five Iroquois Cantons, who continued still the irreconcilable enemies of the Hurons and the Algonquins; and the war amongst them was still carried on with great fury, but began to turn in favour of the Hurons. It appears, that notwithstanding their docility to be instructed in the christian religion, the missionaries never could prevail with them to abolish the practice of putting their prisoners to death. All they could do, was, to convert and baptize them before they suffered; and, like the antient Druids, they often rushed into the heat of the battle, between the arms of contending nations, where they baptized the wounded, and the dying, or administered to them other spiritual assistance. The Iroquois having received a smart defeat, were cunning enough to lay a plan for disuniting the French from their savage allies, by exciting in the latter a suspicion of their fidelity. With this view in all their excursions they treated the French who fell into their hands with great humanity, but the natives with their usual cruelties. A body of them gathered about Trois Rivières, which, for some time, they had in a manner besieged. M. Champflours had lately succeeded M. de L'Isle in the government of that settlement, and when he least expected it, they sent one of their French captives to propose a peace with him, provided the Hurons and Algonquins were not comprehended in it. Champflours was in no condition to carry on the war; but the prisoner cautioning him against the insincerity of the Iroquois, he sent an account of what was passing to Montmagny at Quebec, who immediately came up to Trois Rivières, and from thence sent two deputies to demand from the Iroquois, that their French prisoners should be set at liberty. The deputies were received with great civility, and in quality of mediators seated on a buckler. After this, the French captives were brought forth slightly tied, and then one of the Iroquois chiefs began a formal harangue, expressing the great desire he and his nation had to live in friendship with the French. In the midst of his speech he unbound the captives, and throwing the cords over the pallisades into the river, he wished that the stream might carry them away, never to be heard of more. He then presented the two deputies with a belt of wampum as a pledge of their liberty, restored to the children of Onontio, or the great mountain, for so they called Montmagny; but when they spoke of the French king, they called him the grand Onontio. He then placed two bundles of beaver skins before the captives, to serve them for robes, it being, as he said, unjust to send them away naked; and renewed the assurances he had already given them of peace, begging in the name of his nation, that Onontio would conceal under his cloaths the hatchets of the Algonquins and the Hurons, during the negotiation, protesting that they themselves would commit no hostility.

Their dissimulation.

The colony
supported.

WHILE the barbarian was yet speaking, two Algonquin canoes came in sight, and were immediately chased by the Iroquois. The Algonquins being overpowered, swam on shore, and their canoes were plundered in sight of the French general, who was preparing to punish their treachery, but they instantly vanished, and soon after plundered a number of Huron canoes going to Quebec, laden with furs. But in fact, notwithstanding the accusations brought by Charlevoix against the Iroquois on this occasion, it perhaps is no easy matter to fix upon them the charge of treachery for what happened, as the treaty was not concluded, and a and it was natural for the Iroquois, upon the appearance of their professed enemies, to suspect the intentions of the French. Be this as it will, the Iroquois changed their language after this accident; but the affairs of the colony continued still to be so much neglected by the company, that it was on the point of being ruined, when a spirit for the conversion of the Indians again broke forth amongst the great in France, and 35 persons of quality associated themselves together to settle Montreal.

THE first missionaries were sensible of the expediency of such a settlement; but the company had taken no care to have it executed. The new associates proceeded upon a rational plan; they resolved to begin by erecting upon that island a French fortification, strong enough to resist all the assaults of the savages; that the poor French inhabitants received into it, should be put into a way to earn their own bread, and that the rest of the island should be settled by savages, without respect to their tribes, provided they were christians, or willing to become such. It was likewise proposed not only to assure them of protection, against all their enemies in this new settlement, but to provide them with medicines and subsistence, till they could be so far civilized as to get their livelihood by their own labour. To carry this plan into execution, the French king, in 1640, vested the property of the island in the 35 associates, and next year one of them, Maisonneuve, a gentleman of Champaigne, carried thither several French families, together with a young lady of condition, Mademoiselle Manse, who was proposed to have the superintendency of the female colonists; Maisonneuve being declared governor of the island, on the 15th of October following. It was not before the 17th of May next year, that the French entered into possession of their new habitation and chapel of this island, which they did, with a superabundance of religious exercises, which we shall forbear to transcribe.

NOTWITHSTANDING the precaution taken by the French settlement at Montreal, the Iroquois still continued to make dreadful irruptions into French Canada; into which they generally penetrated, by a river called after their own name, but afterwards by those of Richelieu and Sorel. At the entrance of this river, Montmagny, who suspected that the Iroquois were instigated and supplied by the Dutch settled in New Holland, now New York, began to erect a fort, and completed it, though the workmen were interrupted by 700 of the Iroquois, who attacked them, but were repulsed with loss. This fort went by the name of Richelieu, and was finished with a good garrison, and a remarkable spirit of conversion to christianity now generally prevailed among the Hurons. Amongst other converts was Ahasistari, who was baptized by the name of Eustace. He was a Huron chief, of so distinguished power and authority, that his example brought an incredible number of his countrymen into the pale of christianity, whose conversions were looked upon by the missionaries as miracles. Eustace on this occasion served in the double capacity of missionary and champion, and persuaded his countrymen by his own example into a belief that baptism rendered them invulnerable; thereby deluding them into security, that soon after proved their ruin. After his baptism, he raised a great body of Indian warriors, all of them christians. About this time the jesuits received an invitation from a remote nation of Indians, that go by the inexplicable name of Pauoirigoudieubak. Those savages inhabit a country near the falls of St. Mary, on the canal by which the Lake Superior discharges itself into that of Huron, and may be considered as lying in the very heart of French Canada. The jesuit fathers Isaac Jogues and Charles Raimbaut undertook this dangerous mission to the country of the Saulteurs, as that nation is called by the French, where they were entire strangers. Following the Saulteur deputies, they arrived at their nation, where they were affectionately received; but before they could make any considerable progress, they were recalled to Quebec. By this time, the Iroquois had entered into a considerable commerce with the Dutch at New Holland, to whom they disposed of their peltry, and who furnished them with fire-arms, by which means they obtained a decisive superiority over the Hurons. Upon their recall from their mission on the 13th of June 1642, the two jesuits reached Quebec, where they had indispensable business, and on the first of August they set out under a convoy of 13 armed canoes, manned with christians, and converts, under the command of captain Eustace, and other celebrated warriors, whom mistaken christianity had now degenerated into miserable bigots; for instead of making preparations to resist an attack, nothing passed among them but mutual exhortations to suffer bravely in the cause of Christ. About 13 or 16 leagues from Quebec, they perceived the footsteps of the Iroquois, but were so secure in their imagined superiority, that they proceeded up the river without the least precaution, till they came to a pass where 70 Iroquois lay in ambush, and where they were saluted with a brisk regular fire, which wounded many of the christians, and pierced their canoes. Some of them upon this fled; but the bravest amongst them, encouraged by two or three Frenchmen who had accompanied father Jogues, made a resistance, till their canoes were full of water, and then, all of them, but a very few, who escaped in the confusion, were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners.

Irruptions of the Iroquois.

History of a Huron christian,

and of father Jogues.

Jogues might have escaped likewise, and his companions even pressed him to it; but his a frantic zeal for the crown of martyrdom detained him, and he resolved to run the fate of his dear children, as he called the prisoners. He even, amidst the carnage and confusion, baptized a Catechumen with all the composure imaginable, and then with another Frenchman, Couture, who was resolved to run his fate, surrendered himself prisoner to the barbarians. Charlevoix has been at great pains to recount all the particulars of the miseries this jesuit and his fellow-prisoners underwent. If any thing could make us doubt of the truth of his account, it is the improbability of human nature being able to support, for so long a time, the dreadful torments they endured from the barbarians, the particulars of which are not very instructive. Captain Eustace suffered at the stake; but father Jogues was still disappointed of his crown of martyrdom, for though the barbarians had b crushed his hands, cut off his fingers, and filled his face and whole body with wounds and sores, that had become putrid, yet he survived all his sufferings, and continued indefatigably in his profession of making proselytes, in which, according to his own account, he was very successful. The whole of his adventures are, after himself, described by Charlevoix in a style of holy romance. He now passed his time chiefly amongst the Agniers, who, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the governor of Canada, refused to part with him;
after a variety of adventures, some of which are not very probable, he escaped to New York, and from thence to France.

The war continues.

THE Iroquois, all this while, were carrying on war with the most unrelenting fury against the Huron tribes, whom they bade fair to exterminate, by cutting off, and burn- c ing whole villages at once; but it is observable, that the jesuit fathers make those calamities fall chiefly upon the unconverted Hurons, as so many judgments of God for their hardness of heart; though they cannot deny, that great numbers, even of the converts, fell by the hands of the Iroquois. As we do not think the nature of this work intitles us to enter into a detail of all the actions of those fanatics, we shall now return to the civil history, though it is impossible to separate it entirely from the religious.

State of Montreal.

IN the year 1644 the colony of Montreal had gained a great number of Indian profe-lytes. The Algonquins, who were seated on an island formed by the Outawois, had the greatest commerce with our new colonists; but they were headed by a chief who had an d invincible aversion to the christian religion, though he pretended to be a great friend to the French nation. He was rather more fierce on this head than the Iroquois themselves.
This barbarian had a nephew who settled at Montreal, together with his wife; and there, by the persuasion of two jesuits, Vimond and Poncet, they embraced christianity, but were grieved to think that their uncle should still continue in a state of obstinate infidelity.
After several discourses held between this proselyte and his ghostly fathers, upon the means of converting the uncle, who had been for some time gone upon an expedition, the latter appeared in his nephew's cabin, and pretended, that as he was traversing the wilds of the country, he was seized with an irresistible impulse to become a christian, that he could have no peace in his mind till he should repair to Montreal for baptism, e together with his wife, who was impressed with the same sentiments. Maisonneuve and the jesuits did not fail to encourage the chief and his wife in those pious dispositions; and both of them were baptized with great pomp and ceremony. Though nothing is more common with those barbarians, when they have the purposes either of interest or revenge to serve, than dissimulation; yet the good missionaries have exalted the conversions of this chief and his wife into a miracle. The effects were suitable, and in a short space of time most of the Algonquin nation became christians. Missionaries now sprung up amongst the savages themselves, and spread not only through the missions of Tadoussac and Trois Rivières, but extended to the most remote nations, but with a most profound submission to the jesuits. The Iroquois, however, still not only disdained all proposals for f their conversion, but carried fire and sword to the very gates of Quebec, so that the settlers at Sillery were in danger of being starved, as they durst not venture abroad, for fear of being cut off by the Iroquois, either to hunt or cultivate their lands; but the truth is, conviction was not so often, as indolence was, the motive of those conversions. Enthusiasm or vanity, or both, had taken possession of the French Canadians, and it was fed from Europe. The Indians, who love idleness beyond any thing in life, were supported by the charity of the French colonists, till they became so numerous, that they could support them no longer.

Charges against the jesuits.

ABOUT this time, the enemies of the jesuits, both in Canada and Europe, gave out that all their labours tended only to establish themselves in the fur-trade, which, in fact, was g now ingrossed by the company of a hundred, or Canadian company. Though nothing could be more unjust than this charge was against the American missionaries, yet we know not how far it might be truth with regard to their European brethren, who certainly at that

a that time had vast influence on the affairs of Europe, and were far from being either of a disinterested or enthusiastic turn; nor is it at all incredible, that they had part of the company's profits. The latter thought themselves at least obliged to contradict those reports, which they did in an authentic declaration under their hands and seals. But indeed no worldly consideration could make amends for the miseries which those missionaries amongst the Hurons endured. During the wandering painful life they led for three years, having received no supply of cloaths, they were almost naked. For want of communion elements, they could not administer the sacrament; and when their wine had failed them, they have been obliged to squeeze the wild grapes they found in the woods. At last, some Hurons ventured to go in winter-time upon the ice to Quebec, where they laid before the governor the distresses of the mission, and a supply of provisions was ordered for their relief. The dangers of the journey, however, were so dreadful, that even the most zealous declined it, till Bressani, a Roman jesuit, undertook it. He embarked towards the end of April 1644, attended by a young Frenchman, and six Hurons, two of whom had been saved out of the hands of the Iroquois; but when they came to the entrance of St. Peter's lake, their canoe was wrecked; and a thick snow happening the night after, several of the convoy were so imprudent as to fire upon some savages, which discovered them to the Iroquois, who instantly seized the booty, eat one of the prisoners, and forced the rest to travel night and day, sometimes swimming, and sometimes on foot, loading them all the way with severe bastinadoes; but they split the missionaries left hand between two stones, and, after coming to the first village of the canton of Agnier, his tortures were redoubled, so that he fell down lifeless and motionless; and to recover him, they cut off his left thumb and two fingers of his right hand. The tortures, manglings, and burnings, he afterwards underwent after this, are incredible; so that his body became one continued sore, crawling with worms and maggots, and emitted so noisome a smell, that none durst approach him. He understood at last from the elders of the barbarians, that they were resolved not to put him to death; a favour which the good father and his historian Charlevoix attribute to the fervor of his devotions. He was then consigned to a matron, who treated him with great humanity; but the stench issuing from his sores remained so offensive, that she sent him to the next Dutch settlement to be sold. d Fortunately for him, he found a Dutchman who bought him, and after ordering his wounds to be carefully inspected, they were cured, and the father was put on board a ship that landed him at Rochelle towards the end of November. Though we have given this history, and that of Jogues, from Charlevoix, the only authority that contains it; and though, without all doubt, those barbarians are possessed with an unbounded spirit of cruelty, and love of tormenting their fellow-creatures; yet we cannot believe all the particulars that have been published by this jesuit and his brethren, who probably thought it their duty to enhance the torments of the missionaries, for the benefit of their order in Europe. We may, however, observe, that the cruelty of those barbarians was of a peculiar cast, for they scarcely thought it worth their while to take the life of any man who seemed susceptible of pain, which might be the reason of Bressani's being consigned to the matron.

The colony distressed.

History of father Bressani.

The more conversions, as we have already hinted, that the missionaries made amongst the Hurons and Algonquins, the French colony in Canada became the weaker. The Iroquois, to courage and barbarity, added craft and policy. They amused Montmagny with proposals of peace, which he earnestly wished for; but they had no other design than to have an opportunity of learning the situation of the colony, which they found to be so weak, that they publicly vaunted they would soon oblige the French to repass the sea. In short, Montmagny was reduced to the most despicable shifts, and obliged, instead of humbling, to truckle to, the barbarians, to gain a little respite to himself and his colony. About this time, Champflours, governor of Trois Rivières, informed Montmagny that some Hurons f had arrived at Trois Rivières, with three Iroquois prisoners, one of whom they had given to the Algonquins, who had been with a good deal of difficulty prevailed upon not to put him to death, till he could hear from Montmagny. Upon this the latter immediately went up to Trois Rivières with some presents, and summoning together the heads of the Algonquins and Hurons, he displayed his presents before their eyes; and then informed them, that, in order to prevent any impositions from their common enemies the Iroquois, he only wanted liberty to send one of the prisoners to the cantons of the Iroquois, to inform them, that if they meant to save the lives of the other two prisoners, they must immediately send deputies, with full power to treat of an accommodation. His speech being finished, an Algonquin chief arose, and presenting his prisoner to Montmagny, he told him, g that he could refuse nothing to his father; and that if his presents were accepted of, it was only in order to dry up the tears of a family where that captive was to replace one of its dead; but that though he wished for a peace, he was afraid it would be a very difficult Management of the colony.

Difficulties of

difficult matter to effect it. Montmagny then turned to the Hurons to know their sentiments, and one of them told him with a resolute air, that he was a warrior, and not a merchant; that he had not left his home to trade, but to fight; that if the governor had so great a desire for prisoners, he might take them; that he knew where to make more captives, or to die; in which last case he would have the consolation of dying as a man, but that his nation would say, that Onontbio was the cause of his death. Montmagny appeared a good deal disconcerted at this speech; when another Huron, who it seems was a christian, addressed him, and gave him reasons why the elders of his nation, of whom none were then present, must take it highly amiss, if they, who were all of them young men, should return with merchandizes instead of prisoners. He observed, that the Algonquins, who were present, were elders, and had authority for the offer they had made; and that he did not doubt that Onontbio's proposal of peace would be accepted of by the Huron elders, as soon as they were acquainted with it; but that the Hurons present could not anticipate their elders in the pleasure of their giving their father Onontbio a proof of their submission to his will. Another reason, continued he, that will justify our retaining our prisoners, is, that we know the river is covered with our enemies. If we meet them, and they should prove stronger than us, your presents will only serve to incommode us, and to animate them to the combat, that they may enjoy our spoils. But if they shall see amongst us some of their brethren, who shall bear testimony that we are for peace, that Onontbio wants to be father of all the nations, and that bearing to all an equal affection, he cannot longer behold them cutting one another's throats; their arms will then drop out of their hands, our prisoners will save our lives, and they will be much more forward to second the negotiations of peace, than if we should be too forward in granting them their liberty. The savages reasoning was unanswerable. Montmagny agreed to it, telling the assembly at the same time, that it was more their interest, than that of the French, to make peace. The Hurons then departed with their prisoner; and on their arrival, a general council of their nation being called, they resolved that the two prisoners should be given up to Montmagny, who had, by this time, sent home the captive, presented to him by the Algonquins. The Iroquois, to manifest their desire of peace at the same time, sent Couture, who had still remained a prisoner with them after he had been taken along with father Jogues, and the captive who had been taken by the Hurons, and five deputies, with full power to the Hurons for concluding a treaty. As soon as those deputies arrived at Trois Rivières, Montmagny gave them audience in the square of the castle, which was covered over-head with canvas; he himself being seated in an elbow chair, and attended by Champflours, father Vimond, and the principal inhabitants of the colony; while the Iroquois deputies, to shew their respect to father Onontbio, as they called Montmagny, were seated at his feet upon a mat. The Algonquins, and other nations of their language, ranged themselves opposite to Montmagny, but the Hurons were mixed with the French.

A negotiation,

and treaty.

THE reader is here to observe, that the practice of eloquence amongst those barbarians resembled that of the Romans, who heightened their speeches by the powers of action, and in all their pleadings had a void space left for enforcing their oratory, by walking, stopping, and other gesticulations of their limbs and bodies; and this void always was before the tribunal of the judge; such a space being left before Montmagny's chair of state. The Iroquois had brought along with them 17 belts of wampum, and had run a string between two poles from one end to the other of the void space, on which they were severally to hang the belts (A). All the ceremonies of the conference being then adjusted, the speaker of the Iroquois cantons arose, and presenting Montmagny with one of the belts of wampum, accompanied it with the following speech: " Onontbio, lend an ear to my voice, all the Iroquois speak by my mouth, my heart harbours no bad sentiments, and all my intentions are upright. We want to forget our songs of war, and to exchange them for songs of joy." He then began to sing, and the other deputies kept time with him with a He! he! which they seemed to force from the very bottom of their breasts; and while they sung, the orator agitated himself, by walking about as fast as he could, and throwing himself into a thousand ridiculous attitudes. All this time he frequently looked at the sun, stroked his arms, as if he had been about to wrestle; but at last he resumed a more composed air, and went on as follows:

Speeches of the barbarians.

" The belt, my father, which I here present thee, thanks thee for having rescued him from the tooth of the Algonquin; but how couldst thou let him return home by himself? Had his canoe been overset, who was to assist him to bring it to rights? Had he been drowned, or had he perished by any other accident, thou wouldst have heard no word of a peace, and perhaps have imputed to us the fault committed by thyself." When the orator had finished this speech, he hung the belt upon the cord; then taking another, he fixed it to Couture's arm, and again, turning to Montmagny, addressed him as follows: "My father, this belt brings thee back thy subject; but I was far from saying to him, Nephew, take a canoe, and return home; never could I have been easy till I had certainly heard of his safe arrival. My brother, whom thou hast sent us back, suffered a great deal, and underwent many perils. He was obliged alone to carry his own bundle; to swim all day, to drag his canoe against the falls, and to be always on his guard against surprise." The orator accompanied this speech with the most expressive action, which represented a man sometimes pushing forward a canoe with a pole, sometimes paddling with an oar; sometimes he seemed to be out of breath, and then resuming his spirits, he appeared more calm. He then seemed as if he had hurt his foot against a stone in carrying his bundle; and halting along as if he had been wounded, he thus continued his discourse. "Hadst thou but assisted him in surmounting the most difficult parts of his journey—Really, my father, I know not what became of thy understanding when thou didst send us back in this manner one of thy children, without an attendant and without assistance. I did not serve Couture so. I said to him, Come along, my nephew, follow me, I will restore thee to thy own family at the peril of my own life."

(A) Wampum is a kind of bead, composed of shells, and strung in rows, so as to form the belt. Every belt is considered as a new subject, on which the orator is to display his eloquence.

The other belts were disposed of in the same manner as the two preceding; and each of them had a particular allusion to the terms of the peace in agitation, and was explained by the orator in a very picturesque manner. One of them levelled the roads, another smoothed the river, a third furnished the contracting parties with the means of visiting one another without distrust or danger. One was emblematical of the feasts that were to pass amongst them; others of the alliance to be concluded; of their intentions to restore the fathers, Jogues and Bressani; others, of their impatience to see them return; the cordial reception they would meet with, and their thanks for the late deliverance of the three Iroquois captives. When the delivery of a belt was not accompanied with a speech, it was with gesticulations and motions, sufficiently expressive of the meaning of the orator, who continued this fascinating scene for the amazing space of three hours, without appearing to be heated; for he afterwards led up a dance, and joined in the singing and feasting, which concluded the conference.

It is the custom of those savages, that they neither give nor receive an answer the same day that a public proposition is made. Two days after, Montmagny returned his in a meeting, which was as numerous as the former, and where he made as many presents as he had received belts of wampum. Couture on this occasion served as interpreter, and performed his office in a grave solemn manner, suitable to the dignity of the personage for whom he interpreted. When he had finished his speech, Pieskaret, who was esteemed one of the bravest men that ever Canada produced, made his present; "Behold, said he, a stone which I place on the tomb of those who die in war, that none may dare to remove their bones, or think of revenging their death." Negabamat, the chief of the mountain Iroquois deputies, then made a present of an elk's skin, saying, that "it was to make shoes for the nations present, probably having with them neither chief nor interpreters, made no speeches. When the conferences were over, three cannons were fired, as the governor ordered the savages to be told, to carry every where the news of the peace. The savages were then feasted by the superior of the jesuits, and his good cheer rendered them extremely eloquent, and drew from them many professions of friendship. Next day, the deputies returned home, attended by two Frenchmen, two Hurons, and two Algonquins, for whom three Iroquois remained hostages. The treaty was ratified by all the cantons, especially that of Agnier, the only one that had been in open war with France. Mean while, the fanatical Bressani returned to Canada, and understanding from the report of the two Frenchmen, and four savages who had attended the Iroquois deputies, that that people was desirous of having missionaries amongst them, he absurdly offered himself, and even made interest for the mission. Next winter, the Iroquois, the Hurons, and the Algonquins, went a hunting all together, as if they had been but one nation; a circumstance which had not happened since the arrival of the French in Canada; but just as the latter were beginning to taste the sweets of peace, the Sokakis, who were enemies to the Algonquins, and had done all they could to hinder the Iroquois from concluding the treaty, murdered several of the christian savages after they had settled at Sylleri. The Agniers, to exculpate themselves, again ratified the treaty by new deputies, who hinted to Montmagny, that he ought to be upon his guard against all the savages who were not expressly included in the treaty, and that he had it in his power to bring them in by procuring the release of some of their prisoners who had been taken by the allies of the French; but we know not the reasons why this counsel never was followed.

Their customs.

The treaty ratified.

Return of Jogues and Bressani.

FATHER Jogues, as well as Bressani, was now returned to Canada, and being, if possible, more zealous than ever for the crown of martyrdom, he petitioned the governor for leave again to visit the Agniers; which was granted him, provided he came back after the treaty had been ratified by the other four cantons of the Iroquois, and give Montmagny an account of the dispositions he found them in. The Algonquins very sagaciously insisted, that in his first expedition he should neither appear in the habit of his order, nor speak of religion, which advice he complied with. He set out on the 16th of May, attended by Bourdon, one of the most considerable inhabitants of Quebec, and two Algonquins, who carried in their canoe presents from their nation to that of the Iroquois. At the first Agnier village Jogues came to, he was known by some of his former tormentors, who loaded him with caresses and compliments, so that Jogues came to a resolution to settle among them, and hurried back to Richelieu, where Montmagny was, to be discharged of his promise. He assured that general, who well knew from what motives he spoke, that he might depend upon the friendship of the Agniers; and at last with some difficulty he was released from his engagement, and returned to his mission, attended by a Frenchman and four savages. By this time, the Upper Iroquois, who composed the four cantons that had not ratified the peace, had re-commenced hostilities against the Hurons, and had surprized one of their villages. By this it appeared, that in their pacific professions they had all along acted from motives of interest or conveniency. The missionaries, however, felicitated themselves upon the great progress their labours had made during the short interval of peace, but they were soon undeceived. Father Jogues had scarcely passed Trois Rivières, when he was abandoned by his four savage guides, and left alone with his young Frenchman, La Land. Any man but a mad enthusiast in such a situation would have turned back, but he travelled on, and the first Iroquois village he and his companion reached, they were seized, stripped, scourged, buffeted, and treated as prisoners of war. This sudden change was matter of amazement to the good father, who began (for he could speak their language) to expostulate very eloquently with them, but all to no purpose; all the favour they shewed him, was, that instead of burning him and his companion alive, their heads were cut off with a hatchet in their cabins.

War again breaks out.

CHARLEVOIX, who himself writes like an enthusiast, on the madness of this missionary, by imputing his conduct to a supernatural impulse from heaven, is at great pains to attribute this sudden change of sentiment in the Agniers to ignorance and superstition, in believing that Jogues had concealed the devil in his trunk which he had left behind him, and that his enchantments were the causes of all the natural calamities they had suffered that year; but we are to observe, that the father received his crown of martyrdom only on the 16th of October 1646, so that those prepossessions must have come to a surprizing head in a short time. It is therefore more probable that the change was wrought by the scandalous conduct of the French themselves, and that the savages were not so stupid, as to be insensible that their design was to enslave them. Their love of native liberty, which the French undoubtedly had no right to take from them, soon got the better of all other considerations, and made them drop their mask of religion. Their hatred of christians carried them to an excess of fury, for they murdered or tormented them to death without regard to sex or age whenever they fell into their hands. Amongst others who fell martyrs to their rage, was the brave Pieskaret, whom one of the parties met alone, and not daring to attack him to his face, engaged in familiar conversation with him, and killed him from behind. The Algonquin women nobly resisted their enemies on this occasion, and fighting their way to the French, were the first who apprized them of their danger. The reader may form some idea of the courage of those heroines from one example.

Fury of the Iroquois.

Remarkable escape of a woman.

ONE of them being taken prisoner, was carried to an Iroquois village, where she was stripped naked, and her hands and feet bound with ropes, in one of their cabins. In this condition she remained ten days, the savages sleeping round her every night. The eleventh night, perceiving they were all asleep, she disengaged one of her hands, and soon freeing herself from the ropes, went to the door, where she snatched up a hatchet, slew the savage that lay next her, and springing out of the cabin, concealed herself in a hollow tree, that she had observed the day before, just by the cabin. The noise the dying person made, soon alarmed the other savages, and all the young ones set out in pursuit of her. Perceiving from her tree, that all of them directed their course one way, and that no savage was near her, she left her sanctuary, and flying by an opposite direction, she ran into a forest without being perceived. The second day after this happened, her footsteps were perceived, and they pursued her with such expedition, that on the third day she discovered her pursuers at her heels; she instantly threw herself into a pond of water which was near her, and diving amongst some weeds and bulrushes, she could just breathe above water without being perceived; so that her pursuers, after making a most diligent search for her, a were forced to return. For five and thirty days this poor creature held on her course, through woods and deserts, without any other sustenance than roots and wild berries. When she came to the river St. Laurence, she made with her own hands a kind of a wicker raft, on which she passed it. As she went by Trois Rivières, without well knowing where she was, she perceived a canoe full of savages, and fearing they might be Iroquois, she again ran into the woods, where she remained till sun set; and soon after continuing her course, she saw Trois Rivières. She was then discovered by a party whom she knew to be Hurons, and when they approached her, she squatted down behind a bush, calling out to them, that she was not in a condition to be seen, because she was naked. They immediately threw her a blanket, and conducted her to the fort of Trois Rivières, where she recounted her story; the most remarkable circumstance of which is her innate desire of blood, which was so strong as to induce her to kill the savage, which occasioned all the danger that afterwards pursued her. We are told that many like instances of resolution and perseverance, in the Algonquin women, happened at the same time.

WHILE the Iroquois were thus shaking off the yoke of christianity, it was taken up by the Abenaguais, a nation lying between Lake Champlain and New England, and divided into various tribes who live on the banks of the river Pentagoet^b. About this time, viz. 1646, the colony of New England was very strong, and many dissenting ministers, who had been driven from their native country on account of religion, having settled there, some of them grew as zealous for the conversion of the Indians as the jesuits themselves were, and had made a very considerable progress in it. This alarmed the French at Quebec, and father Gabriel Dreuilletes was sent upon a mission amongst the Abenaguais for their conversion. Charlevoix pretends that this commission was solicited by the Cannibas, an Abenaguais nation who traded with Quebec. Be this as it will, it is certain that this jesuit, and some capuchin fathers, who had been before settled near the river Pentagoet, were very successful in their missions, and the Abenaguais, who are commended by the French writers for being as brave as any Indian nation, but much more tractable and docile, proved ever after very useful allies to the French colony of Canada. We are however to observe, that interest and convenience might be two great motives for the conversion of those savages. Their countrymen who had been converted by the English, and who lay nearest to New England, beginning to thrive, and to live in much greater abundance than before, their lands being much better improved, and their persons better clothed; the Abenaguais, who lay nearest to Canada, being miserably poor and lazy, no doubt expected the like desirable change of circumstances from a like conversion by the French. Accordingly, profelytes poured in upon Dreuilletes and his fellow-labourers, and the ministers of superstition and delusion, the jugglers themselves, became converts, and burnt the instruments of their detestable calling.

WHILE matters were in this situation in Canada, a resolution was taken in the French court, formed upon the disobedience of Poinci, governor of their West India islands, who refused to resign his command to the successor appointed him by his master, that no French governor in America should hold his commission above three years. Montmagny therefore received an order from his court to deliver up his commission to D'Ailleboust, who had for some time commanded at Trois Rivières, and he departed for France, with a great character, both for his virtues and abilities. His successor is said to have been a worthy man, and to have been a zealot for the conversion of the Indians. Having great experience in the affairs of the colony, high expectations were formed of his government, and it was owing to neglect and mismanagement at home, that they were not answered.

ABOUT the year 1648, the Andastes, a warlike tribe of Indians, offered their assistance to the Hurons, against the Iroquois, who still continued to be their implacable enemies; but the Hurons seem to have exchanged for christianity all their native courage and love of their country. Depending on the protection of the French, they civilly declined the offer of the Andastes, and giving way to their natural indolence, they made no provision for their defence, when the Agniers fell upon their village of St. Ignatius, and gave them a complete defeat. Instead of preparing to revenge their loss, the Hurons, finding their enemies did not follow their blow, relapsed into all their former supineness; and for some time the colony enjoyed a state of tranquility, while the French followed the fur-trade about Trois Rivières and Tadoussac, with great success and profit. The Iroquois had foreseen the security of the Hurons, and watching their time, they secretly armed themselves, when they understood that the greatest number of the young Hurons were out a-hunting, and all of a sudden they invested the populous village of St. Joseph. Father Daniel, an obstinate enthusiastic missionary, who attended this village, was then saying mass, and had but just time to strip himself of his ecclesiastical habit, and to lock up the holy utensils, when he saw himself surrounded with the Iroquois, who slaughtered all they found. The father instantly stepped in the midst of the carnage, and dipping his handkerchief in water, he baptized by sprinkling many who implored it in their last moments; and obstinately refusing to fly, he was himself the last victim of the fury of the Iroquois, who killed him with their arrows, and mangled his body in a barbarous manner.

Reflections.

NOTHING better than the practice of those shocking inhumanities could arise from the fanaticism of those jesuit missionaries. All they studied was, to instruct the poor natives in ceremony, superstition, and in mysteries which they could not comprehend. They continued rude as to all the arts of civil life, and ignorant in the principles of society, industry, and moral virtue; and though nominally christians, they were as real savages as ever. That this was the case, appears evidently from the difference between them and their brethren on the borders of New England. The latter were, by one Mr. Elliot, and some other dissenting ministers, instructed in the principles of true practicable christianity. They had submitted to the practice of industry, and subjected themselves to a set of plain moral laws, on certain penalties, in case of transgressing them. They bound themselves in like penalties, never to return to any of their former barbarous customs. They learned to dig, to hoe, to clean the ground, as well as the English themselves. The women, as well as the men, earned money, and served for wages. They built houses in the European manner, and many of them could even read the Bible, which was translated into their language, and printed for their use by their zealous teachers. All this was the reverse of the character of the Canadian converts. Their fathers, in teaching them to be humble and patient, rendered them indolent and cowardly, and their christianity taught them to suffer themselves to be butchered without resistance, nay even with pleasure, because they died in the bosom of christianity, for so those jesuit missionaries called their religion.

Proposal from
New England

ABOUT this time, viz. in 1648, the people of New England sent to the governor and council of Canada, a very sensible proposal, that there should be a perpetual peace between the two colonies, even though their mother-countries were at war. D'Ailleboust and his council relished this proposal so well, that they appointed father Dreuilletes to go to Boston, and to finish the negotiation, provided the English would assist the French against the Iroquois. This was a most absurd and unreasonable condition, as the Iroquois, far from provoking the English, traded with them, and lay as a kind of a barrier between them and the French Canadians. It is no wonder, therefore, if we hear no more of this negotiation, till some time after, that it was renewed, when Godefroid, a member of the French council at Quebec, was made joint plenipotentiary with Dreuilletes in the negotiation; but all was to no effect. The Iroquois however had discontinued their massacres for six months, and the christian Hurons continued to live with their usual indolence, as if they had no enemy to guard against, when on the 16th of March 1649, before day, a body of 1000 Iroquois suddenly attacked the village of St. Ignatius. It was guarded by a strong pallisade, but had in it at that time no more than 400 persons, most of them asleep. The savages soon set fire to the pallisades, and breaking in, they massacred without resistance all the inhabitants excepting three, who fled and gave the alarm to the village of St. Louis, where all the women and children instantly fled to the woods, but fourscore of the men remained with a resolution to defend themselves to the last. The village was entrenched round, and the assailants were twice repulsed with loss. The reader is here to observe, that it appears from Charlevoix, who discommends their noble resolution, that those brave Hurons were all of them rank heathens, for the two missionaries who were amongst them, Brebeuf and Lallement, refused to make their escape with the women and children, that they might be present in the siege to baptize the wounded and the dying.

Massacre.

AT the third assault a breach was made, and the Iroquois, who were furnished with fire-arms, which had already destroyed the most forward of the besieged, breaking in, butchered, or, which was worse, took prisoners all the Hurons. They then set fire to the village, and returned with their spoil and captives to St. Ignatius, where they had left their provisions, and a body of reserve in case of accidents. In the mean while, a great number of the warlike, that is, the heathen Hurons had assembled to revenge the murders and captivity of their countrymen; and two days passed in skirmishes, especially near St. Mary's, which was no more than a league from St. Louis.

defeated.

ST. MARY'S was a populous village, and, besides being well fortified against an attack by savages, the inhabitants kept watch and ward for fear of surprizes. Two hundred of the Iroquois, the main body of whom had now returned to St. Louis, approached St. Mary's, but fell into an ambuscade of the Hurons, who killed many of them, and forcing a forcing the rest to fly, pursued them as far as St. Louis, where the Hurons, who were but a handful, were surprized in their turn, and surrounded by their enemies. They defended themselves, however, very bravely; all of them were wounded, many were killed, some were made prisoners, but none of them escaped, and in them fell the flower of the Iroquois nation. The people at St. Mary's were overwhelmed with consternation and despair, at hearing of this defeat; but, instead of preparing to defend themselves against the Iroquois, who were returning to attack them, they contented themselves with putting up prayers for their deliverance to St. Joseph, which Charlevoix thinks were so far regarded, that the Iroquois next day were seized with a panic, and returned home, where they put to death their two reverend captives, with circumstances of cruelty, not only too shocking to be related, but too incredible to be conceived, and therefore we shall not particularize them.

THESE scenes of butchery lay to the south-east of lake Huron. The inhabitants of St. Mary's now found themselves in a most lamentable situation. All their savage neighbours round them had fled to the woods, after setting fire to their huts; and being thus left alone they were in danger of starving, as they durst not go abroad, for fear of being surprized by the Iroquois. The missionaries amongst them, upon this, formed a project for collecting together the remains of the nation, and transporting them to some place of safety, where they could not be disturbed by their enemies. For this purpose they proposed the isle of Manitoulin; a narrow spot about forty leagues in length, lying in the south part of lake Huron: but this proposal was rejected by the Hurons, because it was of too great a distance from their native country; and they pitched upon the little isle of St. Joseph, lying within sight of their ancient habitations. This island soon was peopled, and the inhabitants grew numerous, on account of the conveniency of fishing and hunting in the neighbourhood. The missionaries, instead of instructing them in the rational parts of Christianity, and the arts of industry, wasted their time in idle mystic devotions, and baptized, or in other words, rendered unfit for the service of themselves, or their country, 3000 in a short time. The summer passed over without any thing remarkable happening, but winter overtook them in a most lamentable situation. So fervid had been their devotion, that they had sowed little or nothing. Their fishery had turned out very ill, and all their game was soon destroyed; so that before autumn was over they began to feel the approaches of famine. As winter advanced, their miseries became insupportable; so that they even dug the earth for half-famished bodies to devour; mothers eat up their children, and children their parents. This horrible famine was followed by a pestilence; and all those calamities were considered as the very harvest of the jesuits, for their savage conversions encreased, and all of them went out of the world with great demonstrations of devotion, and kissing the hands of their holy fathers.

Misery of the Hurons.

WHILE the inhabitants of the isle of St. Joseph were plunged in those miseries, news came to the Huron nation, that three hundred Iroquois had taken the field, and seemed to meditate some blow against the Tionnontatez Hurons. This tribe was so populous, that one of their villages, that of St. John, contained upwards of six hundred families. The Huron chiefs, far from keeping upon their guard, took the field in quest of their enemies, who, giving them the slip, marched directly towards St. John's, where they killed or took prisoners all they met with; and put to death, but not with their usual circumstances of barbarity, Garnier, the father of that mission.

Ravages of the Iroquois.

THE most sensible of the unconverted Hurons, in a village called St. Matthew, attributed the indolence and inactivity of their nations, to which they owed all their misfortunes, to the jesuits; and endeavoured to bring some of the converts into their own opinion. They pretended that they had seen amongst the Iroquois, belts of wampum, which had been sent them by the French governor and council at Quebec, inviting them to exterminate the Hurons. It is no wonder, if those representations made an impression upon the minds, even of the converted Hurons. Charlevoix pretends that on this occasion a settled design was formed to put to death all the missionaries who should fall into their hands. But this supposition seems only to be calculated for the sake of the following miracle. Two missionaries enter the village, and were not put to death, which might very well be; if, as probably was the case, they were under the protection of the nation. But the truth is, those missionaries had now got a vast ascendancy over the minds, even of the unconverted Hurons, not to mention the great interest they had in the nation, by the converts they had made. In the mean while, the miserable remains of the St. Joseph colony had left it, and many of them had perished in the lake, the ice breaking under them. Those who remained alive, who did not exceed three hundred, applied to father Ragueneau, their missionary, to shelter them from the Iroquois, by conducting them to Quebec, where, under the protection of their father Onontio, as they still called that governor, they might cultivate the lands that should be assigned them. The father, by the advice of his brethren, consented.

The savages jealous of the jesuits.

Their migrations.

consented. They set out by the river of the Ouatacriais, and, despair rendering them a hardy, they marched on without being attacked by their enemies. On the road they met father Bressani, attended with a good escort, returning to his old mission, without knowing that it was entirely destroyed, and, after narrowly escaping being assassinated by a small party of the Iroquois. The father and his attendants, hearing of the fate of the Christian Hurons, thought they could not do better than return with Raguenau; and they arrived, after touching at Montreal, at Quebec, where they were received very humanely by D'Ailleboust; but indeed the colony was still so miserably poor, that it was with the utmost difficulty they could subsist in that capital of Canada.

Such of the Hurons as could not be persuaded to leave their native country, experienced b great variety of misery. Some of them fled for shelter to other nations, who thereby drew upon them the arms of the Iroquois; some of them settled under the protection of the English, on the borders of Pensylvania. The Iroquois wanted to decoy others of them into an ambuscade; but the Hurons trapped them in their own cunning, defeated and killed a great number of them. After which they retired to the isle of Manitoualin; from whence they moved and joined their countrymen at Quebec. Almost all the inhabitants of the villages which remained still undestroyed, followed a different course, and though seemingly desperate, perhaps the most rational; for they submitted to the Iroquois, and were taken into their friendship and alliance; while parties were sent out, who destroyed all the dispersed Hurons who had not yet reached any place of shelter. Thus, upon the whole, c the propagation of a fanatical religion, which its teachers impiously call Christianity, desolated a most populous country, and the finest in all North America; for all about the river Ouatacais, with the ancient country of the Hurons, lay now desert.

Distress of Quebec.

THE encrease of mouths at Quebec laid the French colonists there under inconceivable difficulties to subsist them; and the superior general of the missions went over full fraught with zeal to France, to remonstrate to the government there, the shame and scandal that must result to Christianity, if so many converts, who had been brought into the pale of the church, should remain destitute, and unprovided for. All he could say had no effect, and, in a short time, the French themselves became as contemptible as the Hurons had been, in the eyes of the Iroquois. The Hurons, who had taken refuge under the cannon of d Quebec, having now wherewithal to subsist on, entirely forgot their former miseries, and passed from despondency to presumption. They associated themselves with their countrymen at Sylleri, with the Algonquins of Trois Rivières, and the gleaning of their countrymen, who had escaped the hatchets of the Iroquois, and madly formed amongst themselves a croisade to exterminate the Iroquois, those professed enemies to the gospel. Setting out upon this ill-concerted expedition, they dispatched a Huron, and an Algonquin, to reconnoitre a village of the Agniers, which they were to attack. The Huron fell into the hands of the Agniers, and he betrayed the croisaders, by bringing them to the place where the Hurons were lying all of them fast asleep. They were awaked by a discharge of musketry, which killed or disabled their best warriors, for the Agniers had time to take their aim. Some of the croisaders, however, fought their way into a neighbouring wood, where they saved them- e selves; but all the rest were either killed or burnt alive, excepting two, who escaped to Quebec with the melancholy news.

 defeated.*

So terrible a defeat was received by their parents and friends with the utmost dejection, and Charlevoix gives us some more of his miracles on that head; but a short time manifested the true spirit of these boasted conversions. The French at Tadoussac found it for their interest to indulge the Algonquins and Hurons, who repaired thither, with the use of brandy, which kept them in a perpetual state of intoxication, and their passion for strong liquors grew every day so violent, and intractable, that no authority, either civil or ec-clesiastic, could put a stop to it. Not only the converts at Quebec, but all the mountaineer f savages in the neighbourhood of Tadoussac, were infected with the same vice, and, at last, their elders, who remained at Quebec, applied to D'Ailleboust to build a house of correction for their offences. That governor was now recalled, and M. de Lauson, one of the chief directors of the Quebec company, was nominated to succeed him; but he did not arrive at his government till next year. He had great experience in the affairs of the colony, and had negotiated the restitution of Quebec by the English; but was amazed to find the colony in so miserable a state upon his arrival. The Iroquois marched up to the very mouth of the French cannon without fear, and insulted them on all hands. Bochart, a man of capacity and virtue, was then the French governor at Trois Rivières, and had prevented the vice of drunkenness from infecting that settlement, which, under him, was in very good order. Perceiving that the Iroquois extended their insults to his government, he somewhat g unadvisedly marched out in person against them, and was killed. His death encreased the insolence of the Iroquois; and the new governor of Quebec found himself obliged to enclose Sylleri with a wall. The insatiable thirst of the Iroquois for blood was not confined to

a to the Hurons, but extended itself indiscriminately to the most distant Christian savages, whose countries were filled with blood and massacres by the Iroquois. The Abenaguais were the only Christian nation they did not attack; but they were probably restrained by the respect they bore for the English. Father Dreuilletes, who seems to have had the same zeal, but a much greater capacity, than his brother missionaries, had been long employed with great success in converting the Abenaguais, and having entirely won their affection, he formed them into a barrier against the English, who did not foresee that that nation one day would prove the sharpest thorn in their sides, and who, at the time we now treat of, even gave them their protection. It was about this time that father Buteux, in travelling to convert Indians in undiscovered regions of the north, was murdered by the Iroquois. At last, the perseverance and zeal of those good fathers began to abate, and many of them pretending, that by the destruction of the Hurons they had now no farther objects for their labours, returned to Europe; amongst whom was father Brissani, who after this became a very popular and admired preacher in Italy.

THE settlement at Montreal, which was not immediately under the French king, partook of those general calamities. Maisonneuve, who still continued to govern there, found himself obliged to go to Old France for fresh recruits; and in 1653, he returned with one hundred men, and a female housekeeper, called Margaret Bourgeois, who afterwards instituted the order of the daughters of the congregation. While Maisonneuve was employed in guarding Montreal from surprizes, about sixty of a savage tribe, called Onont guese, presented themselves at the gate of the fort, and demanded a parley, upon which some of them were admitted into the place, and declared that their nation were disposed to treat of a peace. They accompanied their speech with presents, and fresh assurances of their sincerity. Upon this, they were suffered to return to their chiefs with the terms offered by the governor, and in their way they engaged the tribes of Onneyouth and Goyogouin to join them in the negociation. The head of the latter not only named his deputies to go to Montreal, but sent along with him a belt of wampum, as a token, that five hundred Iroquois were on their march to attack Trois Rivières. Maisonneuve acquainted Lauson with his danger. The latter immediately assembled all the Hurons he could get together, and attacked a body of the Agniers, whom he defeated, making their chief, and many of their leaders, prisoners. Another party of the Iroquois marched up to the very gates of Quebec, where they made some prisoners, amongst whom was father Poncet, who was the darling of the province, whom they carried into captivity. Forty French, and a number of savages instantly entered into an association to deliver their missionary, and, setting out from Quebec, they discovered the names of Poncet, and his fellow-prisoners, engraved on the trunk of a tree, with the following note underneath: "Six Hurons now naturalized Iroquois, and four Agniers have carried us off, but as yet done us no harm." They soon had reason to alter their tone; for when they came to the Agnier village, where an assembly was held to deliberate on the fate of the prisoners, a woman came up to the party, and presented them with a string of wampum, that she might be permitted to cut off one of the missionaries fingers. This favour was granted her; and, to the great joy of the missionary, who it seems used to perform the sacred ceremonies with the right hand, the fore-finger of the left-hand was cut off. Next day he was abandoned to the barbarous treatment of the children of the several villages through which he was to be carried; and, at last, another council assembled, who pronounced sentence, that the Frenchman, his companion, should be burned alive, which was executed immediately; and that the father should be put into the hands of a matron who had lost a near relation in the war, and who gave the missionary his life. Three days after, an Iroquois came express from Trois Rivières with an account that peace was upon the point of being concluded, and that Onontbio had obliged the Iroquois to give him hostages, whose lives were to be answerable for that of father Poncet.

Affairs of

g THIS news entirely altered the father's situation. They carried him to Orange, the nearest Dutch settlement, where he was new cloathed, his own cloaths being torn to pieces. Upon his return, he was conducted from one canton to another, with all demonstrations of the most sincere friendship; and, on the 15th of October, he set out for Quebec, attended by an Agnier deputy, who was charged with presents for Onontbio, and the superior of the mission. After travelling two days they were met by an express from Quebec, informing the deputy, that the Iroquois hostages had been put in irons; that some of them had lost their heads, and that he ought to take care how he proceeded. It happened luckily for Poncet, that the deputy had a more than ordinary regard for him, and the father promising him an indemnification on the part of the French, they pursued their journey: but after many alarms of the same kind, it appeared, that there was no kind of foundation for the report, which had been raised by the father's enemies. At last he arrived, on the 5th of November, at Quebec, where he was received as a guardian angel.

By

Danger of Monoye.

By this time the peace had been concluded, and a reciprocal confidence seemed to have been settled on both sides. Next year father Le Moyne was sent to Onnontagué, to ratify the treaty on the part of Onontio, and was so well satisfied with the cordial reception he had from the savages, that he offered to take up his residence with them, which was readily accepted; an apartment was assigned him, and he accordingly took possession of it. He then set out for Quebec, loaded with presents from all the Iroquois chiefs. While Monoye was amongst the Iroquois, he had the pleasure of seeing a great number of Huron Christians, who professed their religion amidst all the insults and cruelties of the infidel barbarians. He had, however, before he reached Quebec, a proof of the little dependance that is to be had upon the faith of those savages. Being in a canoe with two Onnontaguése, and followed by other canoes, in which were Algonquins and Hurons, when they came near to Montreal they were surrounded by canoes filled with Agniers, who poured into his canoes a fire of musketry, which killed all the Algonquins and Hurons, and one of his Onnontaguése; and the enemy then took and bound the father himself, as if he had been a prisoner of war. They at the same time told the surviving Onnontague, that he was at liberty to return home. But the savage declared, that he never would abandon the missionary, and threatened the Agniers with the resentment of the upper Iroquois; so that the barbarians, perceiving him to be resolute and inflexible in his purpose, unbound the father, and replaced him under the care of his faithful guide, who conducted him to Montreal. It was afterwards found, that this action was disavowed by the Agnier canton, and that it was owing to the treachery of a Dutchman's son, begot upon an Agnier woman, and brought up in his mother's cabin, and who always was called the bastard Fleming. The father was so intent upon establishing a church amongst the Iroquois, that he never complained of this usage, either to the French or the savages, nor did it in the least discompose the observance of the lately concluded treaty.

State of the Iroquois cantons.

It has been already hinted, that, of all the Iroquois nations, the Agniers were the most irreconcilable to the French and their Indian allies, and they had motives of interest that stimulated their natural fierceness. They had, during the time of the war, carried on a constant trade with the Dutch at Orange, who supplied them with fire-arms and European goods. This had long given great umbrage to the upper cantons, who lay at a vast distance from the Dutch settlement, nor could they trade with it unless they came through the Agniers country, and this gave the latter a kind of superiority over the other cantons; besides their being always sure of support from their Dutch allies. But by the peace they lost all those advantages; for the upper cantons now opened a trade with the French as gainful, at least, as that of the Agniers with the Dutch. The Agniers had foreseen this, which had made them so averse to peace, nor could they ever be brought, as the upper cantons, to agree, that the allies of the French should be comprehended in the treaty; so that they were harassed by the Agniers, almost as much as ever. In short, the Agniers perceiving, that their own importance was every day diminishing, secretly resolved to break the peace, which obliged them never to appear armed in the French colony, and not to interrupt the missionaries in their functions. In a short time a missionary was found murdered and scalped near Sylleri, and it was plain, that the barbarians had resolved upon a rupture.

Gallant action of an Algonquin woman.

At this time an Algonquin woman, a Christian, performed an action so brave, that it might claim a place in the history of the greatest people. As she, her husband, and their young children were in the fields, they were surrounded by a party of five Agniers, who seized and bound the husband, but not the wife, nor the children, who were so young that they could not escape, and the savages knew the mother would not leave them. She watched her time, and finding an opportunity, snatched up a hatchet, with which she cleft the skull of one of the barbarians, and then of another, who ran up to assist him, while the other three were so much struck with her courage and resolution, that they betook themselves to flight; upon which the woman untied her husband, and they returned with their children in triumph to their village. Those, and many other acts of treachery, at last obliged the French to take the field, which they did, the rather because they knew the Agniers could not, at that time, be supported by the upper Iroquois; and this had so good an effect, that those barbarians apologized for their conduct, and not only offered to enter into the treaty without any restriction, but earnestly petitioned to have a missionary sent to instruct them; and father Le Moyne as earnestly petitioned to be employed in that mission, which was accordingly granted him. He was a well-meaning simple enthusiast, and utterly void of all talents for converting a people at once so fierce and so subtil as the Agniers were. His zeal and perseverance would not suffer him to see the dangers he every day ran, particularly once from a savage, who pretended to be a demoniac, and ran up and down with a hatchet in his hand to kill him, but was prevented by some less furious of the canton.

a THE Onnontagueſe, in the year 1655, ſent deputies to Quebec, who were attended by a large number of their nation, to beg, that miſſionaries ſhould be ſent them. The firſt deputy's wife accompanied him, and took a liking to the French, and to the forms of the Chriſtian worſhip, particularly to the two religious communities of young women. The fathers Chaumonot and Dablon were aſſigned to this miſſion, the former the oldeſt miſſionary in all Canada, and the other juſt arrived from New France. The deputy's wife, and ſix or ſeven other Iroquois, had a great deal of diſcourſe with Chaumonot about Chriſtianity, with which they were ſo well ſatisfied, that upon their arrival at their own country they were immediately baptized. The reception of the miſſionaries there, November 5, had every appearance of reſpect and cordiality. They preſented the elders of the nation with the preſents ſent them by Laufon, which were received with great deference, and a cabin, with a ſpot of ground, was aſſigned in the principal village of the nation for their habitation. A general aſſembly of the canton was then called, at the requeſt of the miſſionaries, and father Chaumonot held forth there ſo powerfully that he made many real proſelytes. A young female Onnontagueſe, who, it ſeems, was the beauty of the canton, and who was courted by two lovers, diſcarded them both, becauſe they were not Chriſtians; and ſoon after, one of the head warriors, who was deſperately in love with her, attempting to violate her chaſtity, ſhe had the courage to reſiſt him, and to ſecure herſelf from his perſecutions, an inſtance of virtue ſo uncommon amongſt thoſe ſavages, that it is ranked by their jeſuits amongſt their miracles; and indeed it is one of the moſt miraculous amongſt the many they recount. But notwithſtanding the great harveſt of proſelytes amongſt the Onnontagueſe, the miſſionaries met with many rubs. Of all the enemies that order of men encountered amongſt the ſavages, none were ſo irreconcilable to Chriſtianity as the unconverted Hurons, for this plain reaſon, that their nation had been almoſt exterminated, ſince they admitted Chriſtianity into it. Some of them, at this time, reſided amongſt the Onnontagueſe, and they were extremely aſſiduous to attribute to Chriſtianity all the loſſes and diſeaſes that happened to the converts. The miſſionaries, however, got the better of all their arts, and ſeveral of the heads of their nation became their proſelytes, and thereby, perhaps, the fathers ſaved the French colony in Canada from deſtruction.

d THE reader may conceive ſome idea of the extreme inhumanity with which war is carried on amongſt thoſe barbarians, when he is informed, that, about this time, the Iroquois ſo effectually exterminated a great nation, the Eries, or Cat nation, that no traces of them now remain, nor could it be known they ever had exiſted, were it not for the great lake, on the borders of which they were ſituated, and which, for that reaſon, ſtill bears their name. The Iroquois, at the beginning of that war, were worſted; but they purſued it with ſuch unrelenting fury as to effect the catastrophe we have mentioned. The Eries lay to the weſt of the Iroquois, and their country is now amongſt the leaſt known of any in North America. The French were under great apprehenſions, that this ſucceſs of the Iroquois might encourage them to renew the war, which indeed might have been the caſe, had not the canton of the Onnontagueſe been ſo well diſpoſed to Chriſtianity, that they e refused to enter into the quarrel. They went farther; for they ſent father Dablon, with a commiſſion from their chiefs, to Quebec, to perſuade M. Lauſon to ſend a number of French to ſettle amongſt them. Dablon, attended by a numerous retinue of the natives, arrived at Quebec; and notwithſtanding all that an ancient Huron, who had lived long in the Onnontagueſe country, could do to diſſuade him, Laufon reſolved to grant the requeſt. Fifty Frenchmen, with the Sieur Dupuis, to command them, were choſen for the new ſettlement. Three miſſionaries were aſſigned them, and, though the harveſt had been but indifferent, Dupuis was furniſhed with provisions to ſupply his colony for a year, and to ſow all the ground that ſhould be aſſigned them.

Project of a French ſettlement amongſt the Onnontagueſe.

f THIS project, ſo new and ſo daring, amazed the other Iroquois cantons; and the Agniers, in a general aſſembly, reſolved to leave nothing undone to defeat it. They inſtantly raiſed four hundred men, whom they ſent out to attack the party under Dupuis on their march; but, miſſing their blow, they fell upon ſome ſtray canoes, which they pillaged, pretending that they did not know they belonged to the French, but that they were Hurons or Algonquins. The flower of the Chriſtian Hurons were at this time ſettled, to the number of ſix hundred, in the iſle of Orleans, where they had begun to cultivate the grounds; another miracle the jeſuits bring in proof of their religion. But, notwithſtanding their Chriſtianity, they were as preſumptuous as ever, and ſo careleſs, that the Iroquois found means in one day to carry off fifty of them to their own country, where they were put to death with the moſt horrible tortures, without being purſued by Laufon, though the barbarians on their way homewards inſulted him under his own cannon. The truth is, Laufon, tho' he was much blamed for his inactivity on this occaſion, was not in a condition to reſcue the Hurons, and was obliged to put up with the inſult.

Account of the Outaouais.

AFTER the Iroquois had subdued the Hurons, they fell upon the Outaouais; but the latter prudently left their own country, and dispersed themselves through various parts of the continent, the bulk of them settling on the borders of the river, which still bears their name. After the entire destruction of the Huron habitations, they were joined by the Tionnontatez Hurons, and they moved southwards, till they came to the river Mississippi, where, at first, some of them made an alliance with the Sicux; but breaking with them, they were reduced to the greatest misery, and obliged to divide themselves into little parties, wandering wherever they could find subsistence through the vast tracts lying to the eastward of the Mississippi. Two Frenchmen came up with about twenty of them, whom they conducted from the banks of lake Michigan, as they had some furs with them, to Quebec; where they were favourably received on account of their civilities to their two French conductors. Lauson hearing that a settlement of those Outaouais had been made on the borders of lake Michigan, and seeing their furs to be of an excellent kind, immediately thought of sending some French to settle among them. Thirty young French offered themselves volunteers for that service, nor was there wanting plenty of missionaries, as usual, to attend the Outaouais on their return. The adventurers set out from Quebec about the 12th of August, 1656; but as they drew near Trois Rivières, they met with an advice-canoe sent to inform them that a party of the Agniers was in the neighbourhood. Being thus put upon their guard, they escaped the ambuscade the barbarians had planted for them, and arrived safe at Trois Rivières. The French adventurers landing there began seriously to reflect upon the dangers they were about to encounter, especially as they saw their savage friends but ill provided for an engagement. All of them, therefore, but three, who would not abandon their ghostly fathers, refused to proceed. The Outaouais, however, having provided themselves with fire-arms, with which they had been before entirely unacquainted, diverted themselves with firing them off, which, when they were re embarked, instructed the Agniers, who watched them, in the route they had taken; and they had sufficient leisure to prepare a fresh ambuscade. They were then above the island of Montreal, and the Agniers, having chosen a proper station, poured into the six first canoes, which were filled with Hurons, all but father Garreau, one of the missionaries, a full discharge of their fire-arms, which killed many of them; and then, the canoes being attacked hatchet in hand, all who did not fall by the first discharge were killed or made prisoners. The Outaouais who were not engaged, though they made all the haste they could, came too late to prevent the mischief, which they seemed resolved to revenge; but, after a brisk skirmish, they intrenched themselves, and next day they departed with all imaginable secrecy, leaving behind them the two jesuits, one of whom (Garreau) was mortally wounded, and the three Frenchmen. It was plain from this attack, that the Agniers wanted to break the friendship then subsisting between the French and the Upper Iroquois. The former had conceived great hopes from the projected settlement at Onnontague; and, in the mean while, M. Dupuys, in revenge of what had happened to the Outaouais, fell upon the canoes of the Agniers, and pillaged them.

Hardships of
the French.

THE French underwent great hardships in their march to Onnontague, being disappointed in their scheme of supporting themselves by hunting and fishing; and they must have perished for want of the mere necessities of life, had not the elders of the Onontague sent them provisions on the road in canoes. They were at the same time informed, that a vast number of the Iroquois, and other savages, were assembled on the borders of the lake Gunnentaba, to receive them; upon which M. Dupuys prepared to enter the country with great parade, and in such a manner as might strike the barbarians with respect. For this purpose, he landed five small pieces of cannon, which were fired; and, at the same time, he ordered his musquetry to make a general discharge. This had an excellent effect. The French were received with all the marks of honour, and even devotion, that the savages could express. Te Deum was sung, the mass was celebrated, and the sacrament administered in the most solemn manner; the whole nation of the Onontague seeming prepared immediately to embrace Christianity. Their most remote cantons demanded missionaries for their instruction, and they were obliged to enlarge their chapel to receive their converts. To give the utmost proof of their friendship, when the heats of the country introduced distempers amongst the French, the savages cured them by medicines peculiar to themselves. Those friendly appearances imposed on the greatest part of the French, while the most sensible amongst them advised their countrymen to be upon their guard, and to build a fort which might bridle the natives. This advice, however, could not be complied with, because of the poverty of New France; but the necessity of it became every day more and more apparent.

Treaties among
the savages;

THE Hurons of the isle of Orleans, thinking they were not safe there, had removed to Quebec, and in resentment for the French having, as they thought, abandoned them to their enemies, they had secretly sent a message to propose to the Agniers an union, and to become one a one people. The Agniers willingly embraced the proposal; but the Hurons retracting it, the Agniers resolved to carry fire and sword, as they did, into their country. A great number of the straggling Hurons were accordingly put to death; and at last, when the Agniers thought they had been sufficiently humbled, they sent a deputation of thirty of their chiefs to Quebec to conduct the Hurons to their country. This deputation behaved with intolerable haughtiness. The chief of the deputation demanded an audience in a full assembly, which Lauson was weak enough to grant them; and there he addressed himself to the Hurons, in the following strain of savage eloquence: "My brother, said he, for some time past you have been stretching forth your arms, imploring me to conduct thee to my country; but as often as I prepared to do it, you retired from me, for which reason, in order to punish your inconstancy, I struck you with my hatchet. Let me beg you not to give me occasion to treat you any more in that manner, but rise and follow me." The savage then presented to the assembly two strings of wampum, the one, as he said, to enable the Hurons to arise, the other as an assurance that the Agniers were resolved to live thenceforth with them as brothers. The chief then turned towards Lauson, whom he addressed in the following manner: "Onnonthio, unfold thy arms, and suffer the children, whom thou art hugging in thy bosom, to go along with me; for if they should commit any folly, it is to be feared, that, while I am chastising them, my blows may fall upon thee. Take this belt (presenting him with one), that it may extend thy arms. I know that the Huron loves prayer, that he acknowledges and adores the Author of all things, and that he has recourse to him in all his necessities. I am inclined to do the same. Let Ondesson (meaning father le Moyne), who left me I know not for what, return with the Huron to instruct me; and as I have not a number of canoes sufficient to carry with me so many people, pray do me the favour to lend me some of yours." He then presented Lauson with two other belts, and left the assembly, which was greatly divided upon the proposition of the deputies. their speeches

THE Hurons in general were greatly dismayed at seeing the tameness with which the French governor bore the haughty behaviour of the Iroquois. Some of them were for joining the Onnontague, to whom they had already made proposals for that purpose; others were for remaining in the protection of the French; but the tribe of the Bear remained firm to their engagements with the Agniers. Those points being settled, the council was re-assembled, and the Agnier deputies called in, Lauson himself having the meanness to continue present all the while, though nothing could be more impolitic as well as cowardly, because it sunk the French in the esteem of all the savages. Father le Moyne served as interpreter on this occasion, and addressing himself to the Agnier deputation, "Onnonthio, said he, loves the Hurons; they are his children; but he does not hold them in pupilage: they are of age to chuse for themselves, he opens his arms, and he gives them liberty to go where they please; for my part, I will follow them wherever they go. If they repair, Agnier, to thy country, I will instruct thee likewise in what manner the Author of all things is to be prayed to and adored; but I cannot flatter myself that thou wilt hear me: I know thee and thy indocility; but I will comfort myself with the Hurons. As to the canoes you demand, if you want any, you must make them. Thou seest we have not enough for ourselves."

THE chief of the Bear tribe then addressed himself to the deputies in the following manner: "My brother, I am yours: I throw myself with my eyes shut into your canoes: I am resolved on every thing, even to die; but I intend that I and my family shall go first: I will suffer no others to embark with me; if afterwards the rest of my nation should join us, it is well; but I shall be glad to see beforehand how you treat me." He then presented the deputation with three belts to prevail with them to treat him and his family well. After this the deputies set about making canoes, on board of which they embarked with the Bear tribe, and father le Moyne. Some days after their departure, deputies came from Onnontague on the same errand; but were incensed when they heard that the Bear tribe had gone off with the Agniers, and began to use threats against the Hurons, who made the best apology they could, but to very little purpose. Lauson was then obliged to interpose, and to tell the deputies that they were wanting in the respect they owed to their father; that the Hurons in general were ready to follow them; but that their wives and children were terrified at their threats and warlike appearance, which were very improper while they were applying to them as friends and brothers; that if they would return to their country, and act regularly, the Hurons would wait for them at Montreal, and give hostages for the performance of all they had promised them. This speech, with good entertainment in eating and drinking for some days, pacified the deputies, and they returned home, seemingly well satisfied.

THE deputation of the Onnontague was, however, detrimental to the interests of the French in Canada, because it exposed their weakness and their inability to protect their friendly Indians against their enemies. The missionaries, who were best acquainted with those Perfidy of the savages.

those barbarians, soon perceived an alteration in their behaviour; but such was their zeal, that they comforted themselves with the great progress they made in converting the distant savages at Montreal. The Onnontague came, as had been stipulated at Quebec the year before, to carry with them the Hurons, who were accompanied by two jesuits, and some Frenchmen. On the day of embarkation, the latter were surprized when the Onnontague flatly refused to suffer any but the Hurons to attend them. They, however, at last agreed to some of the French embarking, but were so obstinate against the jesuits, who would by no means abandon their Huron disciples, that they were obliged to embark on board a canoe without any provision, but a small bag of meal. This specimen of the behaviour of the Onnontague created many melancholy apprehensions amongst the Hurons, which were soon verified. A Huron woman had her brains beat out by an Onnontague chief, who wanted to be rude with her; and, as if that murder had been a signal for others, in a moment after a great number of the most considerable Hurons were massacred, and the survivors treated as slaves, some of them being even burnt alive. The two missionaries and the four French, who attended the Hurons, expected every moment the same fate: but, for what reason does not appear, they were saved, and arrived with the convoy at Onnontague.

A. D. 1657.

Conspiracy against the French.

HERE they understood from Dupuys and the French colony, that a resolution had been taken by the savages to cut off all the French in their country. This barbarous resolution took rise from the following occasion. A body of Onneyouths had murdered three Frenchmen near Montreal; and D'Ailleboût, the French governor at Quebec, in the room of Lauson, who was recalled to France, seized and imprisoned all the Iroquois whom he could find in his colony, till he should receive satisfaction for the death of the Frenchman. This exasperated the savage tribes; but instead of proceeding immediately to violences, they coolly resolved on the following scheme of murder. Father le Moyne was to be sent, attended by a numerous convoy, to protect him, as they pretended, against the insults of the young savages, to treat of the ransom of the Iroquois. At the same time, numerous bodies of other savages were to disperse themselves through the neighbourhood of Quebec, who, as soon as they heard of the deliverance of their countrymen, were to fall upon the French, and murder them wherever they could be found, and the colony under Dupuys was to undergo the same fate. Those savages are inconstant in their resolutions, and impatient till they come to action, when their motive is revenge: so that without waiting for le Moyne, great bodies of the Agniers, Onneyouths, and Onnontague, took the field with all their warlike equipages. This alarmed the suspicions of Dupuys; and being informed by a Christian convert of the truth, he sent a courier to M. D'Ailleboût to warn him of his danger. As to himself and his people, he could think of no expedient for safety but to fly; and he immediately set them to work to make boats in an out-lying barn of the jesuits, that they might not be discovered by the savages.

Their wonderful escapes.

ALL his precautions, however, had probably been in vain, had not a young Frenchman, the adopted son of one of the savages, and therefore as dear to him as his own, persuaded his father of adoption, that he dreamed of one of those feasts, at which the guests are obliged to eat all that is served up; that one of those feasts must be made, and that he would die if the smallest morsel was left. The affectionate father granted the son's request, and invited all the tribe to the feast, which was fixed to the 14th of March; the day on which the French were to attempt their escape. Every thing succeeded as the latter could wish: the guests feasted under the sound of all the drums and trumpets of the village, till all of them fell fast asleep; and the Frenchman, watching his opportunity, slipped out and joined his companions, who, favoured by the noise, had by this time got off in their boats. Such, in the main, is the account that Charlevoix^a gives us of this escape, which, if true, was wonderfully providential. But the good father, perhaps, in some particulars, was imposed on, however the account may be true upon the whole. The savages were surprized to the last degree, when next day they found the French were gone; but we are told by the same father, that though the French went off in their boats, the savages could not follow them in their canoes, because of the ice in the river. As to M. Dupuys, after encountering vast difficulties and fatigues, he arrived in fifteen days at Montreal.

THE reader, from the success of this Onnontague colony, may form to himself some idea of the blind zeal of the missionaries, and the credulity of the French, as well as the profound dissimulation of the savages, who seem fairly to have outwitted the Europeans in every thing, but the next to miraculous escape of the latter. It is probable, however, from what has fallen from Charlevoix, that the savages had been impelled to the bloody resolution they formed, by discovering that Dupuys and his followers intended to enslave them, and that their settlement had been made for no other purpose. When Dupuys arrived at a Montreal, he found consternation and confusion spread through all the colony. Parties of the Iroquois covered the country, and, without declaring themselves enemies, obliged the French to keep within their walls. Towards the end of May, father le Moyne, who had been preaching among the Agniers, was by them safely conducted, according to their promise, to Montreal; a proof of the regard those savages have for the laws of hospitality, and they afterwards joined the other Iroquois; upon which those savages immediately broke out into open hostilities, and murdered the Algonquins, even under the cannon of the fort of Quebec.

Such was the melancholy situation of French Canada, when the viscount d'Argenson, who had been appointed governor-general of New France, arrived at Quebec to take possession of his government. His first exercise of power there was to detach about two hundred men, French and natives, against the Iroquois, but they could not come up with them. The savages marched next to surprise the settlement of Trois Rivières: they proposed to do this by amusing de la Potherie, the French commandant there, with a sham conference, and dispatched eight of their countrymen to Trois Rivières for that purpose. Potherie was aware of their intention. He instantly seized on the eight savages, one of whom he detained in his own prison, and sent the other seven to the governor-general, by whose orders they were put to death; and this seasonable severity for some time restored tranquility to the province.

Situation of Canada.

The court of France seems, at this time, to have entertained very false notions of the state, as well as of the interests, of Canada, which, in 1659, was dignified with the presence of a bishop, who was to reside there, Francis Laval, who had been before abbot of Montigny. The choice of this prelate was directed by the jesuits; for when the queen-mother urged that one of the ancient missionaries should be appointed bishop of Canada, they pretended that it was against their institutions for any of them to accept of that dignity, and recommended to it the abbot of Montigny. The first thing this new prelate did, was to demand the famous father Jerome Lallemant, who then presided in the college of La Flèche, from the general of the jesuits to attend him to Canada; and his request was accordingly complied with. This prelate, however, introduced a total alteration into the ecclesiastical discipline and government of Canada, where no priests but jesuits had hitherto found access; for he first carried over with him monks of other orders, who were instituted to benefices; but Montreal and its dependencies remained under the direction of the fathers of the seminary of St. Sulpice. In 1662 (that we may keep the ecclesiastical narrative as distinct as possible from the civil) a seminary was established at Quebec, in favour of the seminary of foreign missions, and the tithes were ordered to be paid to the directors of the new seminary; but with an exception of all new-cleared lands for the first five years. Other ecclesiastical regulations, which are not much to our purpose, we shall omit, as well as many disputes that happened between the civil and ecclesiastical power concerning the regulation of the tithes. But we cannot omit to mention the hospital, which was founded at Montreal by contributions amongst some zealous souls in France. The seminary of St. Sulpice had, by this time, obtained the entire property of the isle of Montreal, where Maisonneuve, the governor, had begun to lay the foundations of a city, which was afterwards built. This undertaking was distinguished by an institution, which was called that of the Daughters of the Congregation, and it owed its rise to a female devotee, one Margaret Bourgeois. It consisted of a number of maidens, who undertook the education of poor female orphans; but those daughters never could be brought to become nuns, a profession which they said was absolutely inconsistent with their institution. This conduct was much more successful, as well as rational, than that of the Ursulin nuns at Quebec, who undertook the like employment there; but it was soon found that their pupils, by being educated within the walls of a cloister, were unfit for society, and in danger of perishing for want, when turned out into the world.

A bishop sent to Canada.

In the mean while, the new bishop, who went by the title of bishop of Petrea, and had obtained from the pope a brief for being apostolical vicar of New France, was amused with daily accounts of discoveries of nations to the north and west of lake Huron; and, in concert with father Lallemant, who had been again named superior-general of the missions, he prepared for their conversion. In this, according to Charlevoix, who drew his information from his brethren the jesuits, they had so great success, that they not only converted all the numerous nations of the Abenaguese, but many of the Esquimaux, who, as we have already observed, were of all Indians the fiercest and most intractable, differing but little from their wolves and bears. But there is great reason to believe, from some ridiculous circumstances attending the relation of those conversions, that they were no other than compliances on the part of the savages, to which they were induced by interest, but oftener by curiosity, that they might experience the wonderful effects, which they were told their being sprinkled with water, or swallowing a wafer, would produce. In the year 1660, an Account of the Sieux.

Algouquin met with numbers of his countrymen near Hudson's Bay, who had fled thither from the cruelties of the Iroquois. He found the natives, as well as his countrymen there, so well disposed to join with the French against the Iroquois, that they sent him with presents to the governor-general of New France to assure him of their friendship and assistance. About the same time, two Frenchmen, who had wintered on the borders of the upper lake, by travelling westward discovered the nation of the Sieux. This was a people who had never heard of the French, and who were but little known, even to the Hurons and Algouquins. The Huron nations of the Tionnontatez and the Outaouais, whom we have already mentioned, trusting to their fire-arms, sought to make their quarters good amongst the Sieux, to whom they fled for protection, and even killed some of them; but the Sieux, though startled at first, attacked their guests in a body, and put to death great numbers of them, while they massacred others, whom they drove into a kind of a pool, where unawares they found themselves entangled in nets, and not a man escaped death from the arrows of the Sieux. This determined the Hurons to seek their habitations elsewhere, and they settled to the south-east of the western point of the upper lake. As to the Sieux, they are represented by the missionaries in a very advantageous light^b, and their situation, with the similarity of their persons, manners, and doctrines, scarcely leaves room to doubt that they were originally the same with the Asiatic Tartars. The two Frenchmen found them very numerous, and divided into forty large townships, which frequently changed their places of abode. They have a knowledge of one God, and are said to believe the doctrine of transmigration. They are merciful to their prisoners; and the jesuits praise them for their docility, mildness, and good sense. c

THE summer of the year 1660 had almost proved irretrievably fatal to the French in Canada. Though Old France was, at that time, at a high pitch of glory, no care had been taken to support their colonies in America, where the Iroquois remained masters of all the open country, which they ravaged from Montreal to Quebec. A body of seven hundred of them had defeated a numerous party of French and Indians, and many of the colonists were making dispositions to embark with their all for Old France. Even the nuns were obliged to fly from their monasteries to take refuge at Montreal and Quebec; and so closely had the savages blocked up the French within their walls, that there was all the appearance of an approaching famine; the Frenchmen, in many places, not daring to stir abroad, either to d reap or sow. At last, towards the end of autumn, they disappeared; but it was soon discovered to be with an insidious intent of decoying into their hands some French missionaries, or men of consequence, whom they might exchange for their countrymen, who were prisoners among the French; after which they intended to renew all their barbarities, and, particularly, to carry off all the children they could, to repeople their country. Their designs, however, were disconcerted by the accidental death of one of their chiefs; and the savages disappeared entirely till towards the end of the winter; they then appeared again in numerous bodies, and every-where butchered the French and Indians. Amongst the former, some persons of rank lost their lives; and amongst the latter, the women, rather than fall into the hands of the Iroquois, fought as bravely as the men. To complete e the misfortunes of the colony, the inhabitants were attacked by a kind of hooping cough, which proved epidemical, and turned into a pleurisy, that carried off great numbers. Even the physicians encouraged the belief, that this distemper was the effect of witchcraft, and this fantastic notion produced amongst the inhabitants numbers of others equally fantastic, such as apparitions of crowns, canoes, and men on fire with dreadful yellings, in the night-time; and, at last, a comet, that really appeared, heightened the general consternation.

in the colony.

WHILE this deplorable state of the colony continued, the councils of the Onnontague took a most favourable turn for the French. It seems that, amongst those savages, the matrons form the most considerable part of the government, and the men, knowing that most of them were sincere converts, and friends to the missionaries, had carefully concealed from their females the intended massacre of the French under Monf. Dupuys. On discovering that the French and the missionaries were gone, the ladies and their daughters celebrated a general mourning, and asserted their prerogative from the usurpations of the men, so resolutely, that they set at liberty all the French prisoners, amounting to twenty; and they converted one of their cabins into a chapel, where great numbers of Christians prayed every day; and for effecting this great revolution, they were assisted by the Christians of the cantons of Goyogouin and Onneyouib, who continued staunch in the faith. Soon after this, news came the Iroquois savages disappeared, and towards the end of July 1661, two canoes, with a white flag, appeared before Montreal. Being suffered to approach, they were found g to be deputies from the cantons of Onnontague and Goyogouin; and that the deputy from the a latter had not only the best interest of any man in his canton, but was the most determined friend the French had amongst all the savages. They brought with them four Frenchmen, whom they proposed to exchange for eight Goyogouin prisoners, and to set at liberty all their remaining French prisoners, on the like terms. They presented Maisonneuve, at the same time, with a letter to the remaining French prisoners, informing him of the good treatment they received, but at the same time, that if the proposal of their exchange was rejected, they must infallibly undergo the flames. Maisonneuve, not thinking himself sufficiently authorized to return an answer to those propositions, sent an express with them to the governor-general, and in the mean while lodged the deputies in his fort. D'Argenson, who by this time had become peevish and sour by his situation, and had demanded his recal, with some difficulty agreed to the proposals; but was at a loss to find a missionary, who would venture into the savage country, which the Indians insisted on, as an indispensable preliminary of the accommodation; but his uneasiness was soon over, the zealous father le Moyne cheerfully, for a fourth time, embracing that mission.

In the mean while, D'Argenson was relieved in his government by the baron D'Avaugour, who had been bred up in the wars of Hungary, and was esteemed an honest man, as well as a good officer; but in other respects was very ill qualified to be a governor-general of New France. Having visited the posts of Canada, he appeared highly surprised and dissatisfied at seeing them so weak, and openly declared, that if the French court did not send him the supplies and reinforcements they had promised him, he would leave his government, without waiting for the appointment of his successor. By this time le Moyne had left Quebec, while the fathers Dreuilletes and Dablon sailed up the river Saguenay, as far as the source of the river Nekouba, thereby to get a passage into the north sea. The heats they endured were excessive. They perceived, that the lake of St. John is the real source of the Saguenay, and several other rivers. The description of that lake, which they said was of an oval figure, and about twenty leagues in circumference, full of beautiful islands, crowned with trees, and affording the most delightful prospect in the world, was perhaps greatly exaggerated by the remembrance of the frightful countries through which they had travelled. Notwithstanding the frightful appearance of the country, both before and after they passed this lake, they found some savages, whom they converted to Christianity, about the source of the river Nekouba, beyond which they could not proceed, on account of the Iroquois, who were approaching, and had lately destroyed a whole nation. As it is of importance for us to be acquainted with every material circumstance relating to a country now belonging to the crown of Great Britain, we are to mention from the journal, which Dablon left behind him of this expedition, a most extraordinary disease, which, he says, is common in those northern countries. A person suddenly becomes hypochondriac, and then frantic; in which state, becoming insatiably ravenous after human flesh, he darts himself like a wolf upon all who approach him, and tears them to pieces. This disease, which encreases the more the hunger is gratified, is so incurable, that the patient is knocked on the head, if possible, the moment the symptoms appear upon him.

c Though the different tribes and townships of those savages are independent of one another, and though each adopts a form of government, as custom or caprice directs, yet they commonly have some person of high distinction among them, whom they consider as the chief of their nation, and who guides them in their general deliberations. We are, therefore, to consider the resolution taken by the Onnontague to massacre Dupuys and his people, as belonging only to that tribe which had sent deputies to Montreal; for, from what follows, it does not appear to have been the general sense of the nation to break with the French. Father le Moyne, in his travels to the Onnontague country, escaped several dangers from the Agniers, the Onneyouths, and the Tsonnonthouans, who had no chief in the Onnontague deputation to Montreal. When he came within two leagues of Onnontague, he was surprised to be met by Garakonthie, the grand chief of the whole nation, and lord of that canton in particular; as he knew that those savages seldom or never advance above a quarter of a mile, to meet their deputies on their return. But this Garakonthie was a very extraordinary personage, and had nothing about him of the savage, but his birth and education. He was not only a renowned warrior, but an able statesman; for he had a particular talent in managing the popular assemblies of his countrymen; and to complete his character, he was good-natured, mild, candid, and possessed of extraordinary genius. By his great credit with his canton, he had saved the lives of all the French prisoners his people had made, and had even the address to deliver many who were in the hands of the Agniers; and, in consequence of his affection for the French in general, he was incessantly labouring to bring about a firm alliance between them and his countrymen. The first proof he gave of his talents for negotiation, was to carry le Moyne to wait upon the other chiefs, before he brought him to his cabin, that the pacification might seem to take its rise from them, and not to be entirely his own work. On the 12th of August, the deputies of Onnontague,

Montague, Goygouin, and Tsonnontbouan, assembled in Garakonthie's cabin, to which le Moyne was invited. He accordingly repaired thither, and, after delivering his presents, he opened the conferences. Being perfectly acquainted with the genius, manners, and language of the parties he was treating with, he conducted the negotiation with all the solemnity, figurative expressions, and actions, which he knew those barbarians to be fond of, delivering his wampum strings at the conclusion of every article, and then quitting the character of envoy from the governor-general, he resumed that of the missionary, and turned the discourse upon religious subjects.

Negotiations
about peace.

THE savages, who affect formality in all their deliberations, took some days to consider of their answer to what le Moyne had proposed. The result of their consultation was, that nine French prisoners should be sent to Onnontkio, but that they would reserve the others in compliment to Ondeffon (meaning father le Moyne) to keep him company during the winter; and that Garakonthie should be appointed head of the deputation, which was to be sent to Montreal to conclude the peace. The missionary put them in mind of their promise to send back all the French prisoners; but being peremptorily told that that could not be, he desisted from his request, especially as he saw that they were well treated. It was the middle of September, when Garakonthie set out on his embassy; but, while he was on his journey, he encountered two accidents, which, had it not been for his great credit and prudence, must have proved fatal to his negotiation. The first was his meeting with a troop of warriors of his own canton, commanded by one Outreoutiati, a chief of reputation, who had been in irons at Montreal; but escaping, he and his party were returning loaded with the scalps and spoils of the French and their Indians, whom they had killed in revenge. The Indians of Garakonthie's train were for returning immediately, lest reprisals should be made upon them, on their arrival at Montreal; but he, though somewhat embarrassed at first, satisfied them they were in no danger as long as le Moyne and the French remained in their canton; upon which they proceeded forward. A few days after he overtook a party of the Onneyouths, who told him they were going to eat Frenchmen; but upon his making them a present, he persuaded them to return. Upon his arrival at Montreal, he was received with distinctions due to the great services he had done the colony. In many private conferences he had there with the governor-general, the latter conceived so high an opinion of his sincerity, as well as capacity, that upon his promising him to return in the spring with the remaining French prisoners, all the Iroquois captives were delivered into his hands; a proof that the governor-general was but ill acquainted with the nature of the American savages; though it is true that he had other reasons for believing, that a peace would soon be concluded. He imagined, that the superior cantons of the Iroquois were so involved in war with the Andastes, and the Agniers, with other nations, supported by the Abenaguese, that the desire of peace amongst all the Iroquois would become general. But he soon received intelligence, that the Iroquois were victorious over all their enemies, whom they had either conquered, or forced to sue for peace. The Onnontaguese hearing of this, and that the Agniers had again pushed their ravages to the very gates of Montreal, took arms against the French. Being no longer awed by the presence of Garakonthie, two hundred of them invaded the French colonies; and attacking a great many of the inhabitants of Montreal, who were at work in the fields, they cut in pieces the French town-major, who had sallied out with twenty-six well armed soldiers, to bring off the people of Montreal. At the same time, it was known at that place, that the Outaouais had maltreated father Misnard, who had been granted to them as a missionary; so that he never was heard of more. In the mean while le Moyne continued to exercise his functions amongst the Onnontaguese, notwithstanding the hostilities their countrymen had been guilty of against the French, and by a prudent course of dissimulation he gained his ends. Garakonthie, loaded with valuable presents, and attended by the Iroquois captives, arrived at this critical juncture at Onnontague, and, though greatly startled at the alteration of his people's sentiments, he acted with so much address and firmness, that he not only obtained a ratification of the treaty he had concluded, but the delivery of all the French prisoners into the hands of father le Moyne, excepting one, who was put to death by his master, who refused, being a married man, to marry a savage.

The colony reinforced.

D'AVAUGOUR, though now convinced of the good faith of Garakonthie, was sensible, that his colony was in a most desperate situation, and he wrote in the strongest terms to the court of France for reinforcements, by Boucher, the commandant of Trois Rivières, who was an honest man, and entirely well acquainted with the affairs of Canada. The French king, upon his representations, appeared to be greatly surprised, that so promising a colony should have been so much neglected, and immediately ordered four hundred of his troops to embark for Canada, to strengthen the most exposed posts. Their arrival at Quebec, and Dumont's promise of farther reinforcements next year, gave new spirits to the colony; but they were soon damped by the rash conduct of the governor-general. The strictest a strictest orders had been issued by him for preventing the selling any brandy or spirituous liquors to the savages; and a Quebec woman having been detected in this fact, was immediately carried to prison. Her tears, and the intercessions of her relations, prevailed with father Lallement to apply for her release to the governor, who, with a frantic haughtiness, answered, that, since the crime was not punishable in that woman, it should not be so in any other person. What is still worse, he adhered so strictly to this declaration, that he thought it a point of honour not to retract it. This license introduced such a spirit of debauchery, not only among the savages, but amongst the French soldiers, that the clergy was insulted, and all kind of order and decency in the colony was disregarded; upon which the bishop, despairing of being able to do any service by his authority, resolved to embark for France, and there to lay his complaints before the king.

Upon his departure, the whole system of nature, in French Canada, seemed to be inverted; for nothing was to be seen or heard all over the province, but the most dreadful coruscations, balls of fire, breaking in a most terrible manner, claps of thunder, and terrible earthquakes. Those phenomena, though produced by natural causes, were urged by the clergy, and the nuns, as immediate visitations from God, upon the sins of the province; and a thousand supernatural prodigies were invented, to persuade the people, that still more judgments were waiting them, unless they repented, and turned from their wickedness. Fortunately for the colony, this prediction was fulfilled by the most dreadful earthquakes and hurricanes happening, that ever had been felt or known in those parts. The largest trees were pulled up by the roots; the courses of rivers inverted; the largest mountains torn from their foundations, and thrown upon one another; provinces enveloped in flames, issuing from the bowels of the earth; the country was covered with sea-monsters, that were cast on shore; and, in short, nothing was wanting that could announce the dissolution of the world to be at hand; while the clergy and nuns continued still to encrease those real terrors with imaginary prodigies. Those calamities were not confined to one spot, but reached from east to west for three hundred leagues, and for above one hundred and fifty from south to north. Even New England and New York felt the shocks of the earthquake, and saw the other appearances of this stupendous visitation. One circumstance, however, gives some reason to believe that the relations of it are somewhat exaggerated by the missionaries; for we are told that no life was lost during its continuance.

Amazing earthquakes and tempests.

The real effects of those calamities were incredible; for they not only brought the professors of Christianity to a sense of their crimes and irregularities, but occasioned great numbers of sincere conversions amongst the natives; so that nothing was now to be seen, but public penances, fastings, alms, pilgrimages, and processions. Above all, the illicit commerce in spirituous liquors was solemnly decried and detested. Upon the whole, though perhaps, as we have already observed, the jesuits have not stuck to strict truth in their representations of those amazing incidents, yet the face of Nature in Canada, to this very day, affords frequent evidences, that the earthquakes and hurricanes we have mentioned were the most dreadful any country ever suffered, that was not entirely destroyed. The consternation even reached the Iroquois, who were so amazed, that though they again appeared in arms near Montreal, they lost all courage, and were beat in several small encounters by the French and their Indians. The small-pox, soon after this, swept off great numbers of them, and at last they came to be so well disposed towards a peace, that the Onnontague not only invited the French to resume their former settlement amongst them, but offered to send their daughters as hostages to Quebec, there to be educated by the Ursulin nuns. But the affairs of Canada were now about to resume a new face.

The company of Canada, unwilling, or unable to support so unprofitable a settlement as that of New France, had made a voluntary surrender of all their property in it to the French king, who, upon the representations of the bishop of Petrée, resolved to put its government upon a new establishment. For this purpose, he appointed Monf. de Mesy to succeed the baron D'Avaugour as governor, and the sieur Gaudais to go as his commissary, and to take possession, in his name, of all New France. Along with those two officers a body of troops, and one hundred families, for peopling the colony, embarked, besides other officers of all denominations. The commissary began by receiving the oath of allegiance from the inhabitants, and establishing new courts, where new processes of justice were introduced; but those regulations had a very different effect from what his most Christian majesty expected. The French Canadians, till that time, had but very few differences amongst themselves, concerning matters of property, and those few were always decided by the governor-general, upon the principles of equity and good sense. But no sooner did the above-mentioned regulations take place, than the Canadians, from being amongst themselves the most inoffensive people in the world, became the most litigious. A council of state was likewise established this year, viz. 1663. It was composed of Mesy, the governor-general, the bishop of Petrée, Robert the intendant, four counsellors, whom they three were to name, a procurator-general, and a head secretary. It is immaterial for this history to relate the several alterations which this institution underwent afterwards, while Canada was in the hands of the French; it is sufficient to say, that the number of counsellors were at last increased to twelve, and the subaltern judges to so immoderate a number, that the inhabitants smarted more under the fees of lawyers, than they had done before from the ravages of the Indians.

recalled.

WHEN those regulations were going forward the sieur Gaudais returned, according to order, to France, that he might make a report to his most Christian majesty of the state and dispositions of the colony, the conduct of D'Avaugour, whose severity had been greatly complained of, and the manner in which the new governor and regulations had been received. All this he did, and D'Avaugour having returned to Europe, had his master's permission to re-enter into the emperor's service against the Turks in Hungary, where he was killed next year. But the arrival of the reinforcements from France retarded the restoration of peace with the Iroquois; for when it was on the point of being concluded, a Huron, who was a naturalized Iroquois, spread a report, that before he left Trois Rivières he saw thousands of soldiers landing at Quebec, and that the French were in full march to destroy the dwellings, and exterminate the race of the Iroquois. This report broke off for that time the negotiation. The savages stood on their guard, but without venturing to invade the colony. Perceiving, however, by degrees, that the French had no hostile intentions, towards the winter they made incursions into the northern parts, where they were guilty of enormous cruelties.

BUT such was the spirit of those barbarians, that though in all probability they believed the first report of the French immense reinforcements, it did not produce from them one advance towards a submission, and it required all the prudence and credit of Garakontbie to keep them from breaking into farther hostilities. He succeeded so far, that he assembled the French prisoners in the cantons, who had been taken, and gave them an escort of twenty Onnontague to conduct them to Quebec. In their voyage thither, they were attacked all of a sudden by a party of Algonquins, who took them for enemies, and killed several of the Iroquois, but the French escaped unhurt. This accident must have produced an immediate and a fresh rupture, had not Garakontbie persuaded the Onnontague, that it was owing to a mistake. Some months after, the Goyogouin chief agreeably surprised the colony at Quebec with a pacific visit. He presented the governor general with belts on the parts of all the cantons, excepting that of Onneyouth, and declared, that they were fully resolved to live in peace with the colony. The general, though pleased with the compliment, put on an air of superiority, and acquainted the savage, that he was resolved to be upon his guard against a nation that had been so often trusted by his predecessors, and had so often betrayed them. He, however, treated the chief with great politeness and civility. It was about this time that the colony of Canada was deeply affected by the English getting possession of New York, as we have already seen in the history of that province.

nor.

THE bishop of Petrée had been the main instrument in procuring the recal of the late governor D'Avaugour; and so highly was he in favour with Levis XIV. that he was left to name D'Avaugour's successor. Mesly was then major of the citadel of Caen, and so great a professor of piety, that the bishop recommended him to the king, who confirmed his choice. He scarcely was fixed in his government, when the bishop found he had mistaken his man. The bishop patronized the jesuits, Mesly hated them. Thus the colony was split into two parties. Each sent over their remonstrances to the court of France, where the interest of the jesuits proved too strong for that of Mesly. His complaints were founded upon the vast credit the jesuits had obtained in the province, which, in fact, rendered the authority of the governor a cypher; as, without their intervention and agency, he could take no step with regard to the Indians. It was easy for some of the most discerning amongst the counsellors of state, to know where the weight of interest would lie at the court, and therefore they took part with the bishop. Mesly, however, seems to have given them some handle by his arbitrary proceedings, and by sending home the counsellor de Villeray, and the Sieur Bourdon, procurator-general, without any form of trial. The bishop took advantage of this, and some other unguarded acts of power, which the governor could not disprove. But notwithstanding all the power of the jesuits, Monf. Colbert, then first minister of France, though obliged to give way to the recal of Mesly, did not conceal his opinion, that the good fathers were rather an overmatch for the credit that ought to be vested in a governor-general of such a province, and that care ought to be taken to circumscribe their power, and to send over governors, who could do it with more temper and prudence than Mesly possessed.

Tracy viceroy
of the French

WHEN the old Canada company resigned all their rights in that country, to his most Christian Majesty, he transferred the same to the West India company, together with the power

a power of nominating all the governors and officers of Canada. The company, however, politely enough declined that honour, and left those nominations in the hands of his majesty, on pretence that they were not sufficiently acquainted with the affairs of the province, to make a proper choice of its high officers. In consequence of this act of self-denial, Mesly had been appointed governor-general of New France, and on the 19th of Nov. 1663, his majesty nominated the marquis de Tracy his viceroy over all America, with a commission to visit first the French islands, and then to repair to New France, where he was to give orders for the future establishment of the colony, and for securing it against the Iroquois. This commission was expedited a little before the disputes between Mesly and the bishop began, and when his most Christian majesty had, in consequence of petitions from the colony, come to a most serious resolution to send thither a most effectual and powerful supply, both of troops and inhabitants. It is remarkable, that the petitioners prayed, that the colonists sent over might be natives of the isle of France, or the northern provinces, because a great many heretics were shipped from the southern. The recal of Mesly being resolved on, the king nominated Daniel de Remi, lord of Courcelles, to be his successor, and Monf. Talon, to be intendant, in the room of Robert, who never had gone to New France. A commission was likewise issued out on the 21st of March, 1665, to empower them, together with the marquis de Tracy, who was then in America, to enquire into the conduct of Mesly; and, if they thought him culpable, to put him under arrest, and to try him; at the same time orders were expedited, for raising colonists, and for sending the regiment of Carignan Salieres, part of which was with Monf. de Tracy, to Canada. In June, the same year, Tracy arrived there, with three companies of that regiment, and instantly drove back the Iroquois, who had again begun their inroads; by which a reasonable check the inhabitants got in their harvest without any molestation. Soon after, the rest of the regiment of Carignan arrived with their colonel, Monf. de Salieres, together with Courcelles and Talon, on board a powerful squadron, which carried a great number of families, tradesmen, artied servants, the first horses that had ever been seen in Canada, horned cattle, sheep, and, in short, says father Charlevoix^b, a more powerful colony, than that which they came to reinforce. The viceroy then gave orders for building three forts towards the mouth of the river Richelieu, one upon the spot where fort Richelieu had stood; the command of which was given to Monf. Sorel, from whom it is now called fort Sorel. The second was built at the foot of a rapid river, called St. Louis; but afterwards took the name of its governor, Monf. Chambly, who was a great proprietor of land there, and was likewise built on the ruins of a former fort. The third fort was erected by Monf. de Salieres, and was called St. Theresa. The construction of those forts, though at first they struck the Iroquois with consternation, is thought to have been injudicious, because the main purposes they were intended to serve, might have answered by a strong well-garrisoned fort in the canton of Onnontague, or that of Agniers; though fort Chambly, it is true, covered the province from the incursions of the people of New York, and the lower Iroquois. During those transactions, Talon remained at Quebec, where he made himself fully master of every thing relating to Canada; which he digested in a memorial to Colbert, acquainting him at the same time, that Mesly being dead, and the clergy perfectly easy, without making farther complaints, it was judged to be most conducive to his majesty's service, not to proceed to any enquiries into his conduct. In short, Talon, by this memorial, discovered himself to be a very able minister. He laid before Colbert the prodigious advantages that might accrue to its mother country, by the encouragement of this colony. But he informed the minister, that his majesty had entirely mistaken his measures for that purpose, by putting it into the hands of the West India company, who had already declared they would suffer no provisions to come from France, without their permission, even for the subsistence of the inhabitants; and that they would suffer no liberty of commerce, but what they themselves should carry on. He added, that unless his majesty took the colony into his own hands, it would not be worth either his, or his ministers attention; and that the inhabitants must be in a state of bondage to the company, who would enrich themselves by their misery. Towards the end of December, Garakonthie arrived with the deputies of his canton, of Goyogouin and of Tsonnonihouan. After delivering his presents, and making the general compliments of submission from the three colonies, he made a kind of a funeral oration upon the death of father le Moyne, which had happened some time before, in terms that equally affected and astonished his hearers. He touched, but with great modesty, on his own services to the colony, and concluded with a demand of peace, and the freedom of all the prisoners of the three cantons, that had been made since the last exchange. This request was granted by Tracy, who highly caressed Garakonthie both in public and private, and, at parting, loaded him and the other deputies with presents.

*Expedition

No sooner had they taken leave of the viceroy, than two bodies of regulars were ordered out against the Agniers and the Onneyouths, under Courcelles and Sorel. The Onneyouths immediately offered to make their submission, by sending deputies to Quebec, who are said to have been charged with the like commission on the part of the Agniers; but they failed in the negotiation; for the last mentioned savages had still parties in the field, one of which killed Chafy, the viceroy's nephew, and two other French officers. Sorel was all this while upon his march against the Agniers, but on approaching one of their villages, he was met by a troop of the warriors, with the bastard Fleming, we have already mentioned, at their head. What follows, though we take the relation from the French themselves, cannot be easily justified on the principles of either good faith, hospitality, or humanity, and yet it is mentioned by them with an air of applause. The Fleming, making signals for a parley, acquainted Sorel, that he was going to Quebec to treat of peace with the viceroy; upon which Sorel, without any hesitation, accompanied him thither; and being well received by the viceroy, he was followed in a day or two by another Agnier deputy. He too was well received; and so far were they from being suspected not to be real deputies, that the viceroy entertained them at his table, where mention was made of Monf. de Chafy's death. Upon this, the last arrived barbarian, with a savage air of triumph, stretching forth his arm, There, said he, is the hand that killed him. Then, replied the viceroy, it never shall kill another, and he ordered him immediately to be strangled, by the common hangman, which was performed in the presence of the bastard Fleming, who was sent to prison.

COURCELLES, who knew nothing of what had passed at Quebec, was then at Corlar, a settlement belonging to Albany, upon the borders of the Iroquois country; where, before he entered upon hostilities with the Iroquois, he prevailed with the English commandant to promise, that he would give no assistance to the Agniers. Courcelles performed this journey in the midst of winter, walking with snow shoes, and carrying his arms and provisions like the meanest soldier, many of whom were disabled by the cold from attending him. The precautions he took for success, defeated it; for when he entered the country of the Agniers, he found their villages abandoned, and that their children, women, and old men, had secured themselves in the woods, while their warriors had marched against other nations, till they should know the result of the Onneyouths negotiation. All he could do was to kill or pick up a few stragglers of the savages. Returning to Quebec, he found Tracy, though then above seventy years of age, ready to set out on an expedition against the Onneyouths and the Agniers. His army was composed of six hundred regulars, the same number of Canadians, savages of different nations; but he carried with him no more than two pieces of artillery. While he was setting out new deputies came from the two cantons to endeavour an accommodation, but they were detained prisoners, and the army began its march in three divisions on the 14th of September. Their magazines of provisions were calculated to serve them till they should arrive in the enemy's country, where they counted upon being plentifully supplied; but, before they had got half way, they found their provisions at an end; and they must actually have returned, had it not been for a wood of chestnuts; on which they lived, till they reached the enemy's country. A body of Algonquins, who marched before the first division, alarmed the inhabitants of the first village they reached, which the French general entered with all the display of military pomp: but he found no inhabitant there, excepting a few old men and women, who were too decrepid to fly. The French were surprized to meet here with cabins well built, and properly ornamented; some of them six score feet in length, of a proportionable breadth, and all of them wainscotted within. Upon searching farther they discovered an amazing quantity of provisions buried under-ground, sufficient to serve all the colony for two years.

NOTWITHSTANDING all this, never was a worse conducted, or a more ill-judged expedition than this was on the part of the French. Tracy, instead of burning the provisions he could not carry off, contented himself with burning the cabins, of which he did not leave one standing, in the whole canton; and instead of building forts for bridling so fine a country, he amused himself with drawing up his men in order of battle, and marching against the savages, who were too wise to hazard an engagement with him, but bade him defiance in their woods and fastnesses. He excused himself from those omissions, by saying, that the security of the colony was provided for by the forts he had already raised against the barbarians, whom he had sufficiently chastised, and taught to respect the French power. He likewise alledged the instructions, which directed the governors of New France to keep their possessions as compact as possible together upon the banks of the river St. Laurence, where the land should be first cleared; so that there should be none of those straggling settlements, which had been so often the objects of the Indian ravages. Charles-voix, however, is of opinion, that those ends might have been more effectually obtained, by fortifying the frontiers against the enemy. But, in fact, the regulations of the French king a king in this respect never were complied with ; for the desire of gain led the colonists to pitch upon, and clear those situations, however dangerous they might be, that were most convenient for trade.

It was now towards the end of October, and consequently too late for Tracy, who seems to have been now in a state of military dotage, to proceed against the canton of Onneyouth. He had rather exasperated than chastised the savages, and a little more delay would have rendered his return impracticable, by the rivers being frozen, and the attacks he must have been exposed to from the Indians. In his return his troops suffered greatly from the fatigues of their march, and an officer and some soldiers were drowned in passing lake Champlain. Upon Tracy's arrival at Quebec he ordered some of his prisoners to be hanged, and sent home the others with the Flemish bastard. The last act of his government in New France was to establish the West India company, in all the rights of the whole Canada company, and then he returned to France. Canada, notwithstanding all his omissions, might, however, date the æra of her importance from his administration. The late expedition against the Iroquois, had it been properly pursued, must have rendered her colonists respectable ; but her government, notwithstanding the sensible remonstrances of Talon, went upon wrong principles. The bigots at the court of Old France, who guided that king's conscience, were devoted to the jesuits, who appear, by all their own relations, to have made the conversion of the Indians the primary object of the colony, whereas, in pursuing those conversions, as they did, it was threatened with ruin ; because the savages no sooner became converts than they lived like drones, upon the public stock, and indulged their irresistible propensity to indolence. It is in vain for the jesuit historians to pretend, that the interests of the colony were connected with those of religion. Had the savages, instead of being taught the fopperies of their religion, been taught to taste the sweets of commerce with the French, they would soon have come into the habits of civil life, and the practice of christianity ; if the religion of the jesuits can be called such. The French Canadian laity were fully sensible of all this, and, after the last establishment of the colony, those conversions, to the no small mortification of the jesuits, began to be discontinued ; and even the converts already made insensibly dwindled and disappeared, partly through diseases, introduced by their indolence, and partly from other causes.

Tracy's expedition against the savages.

d THE ascendancy of the jesuit counsellors at the court of France could not render it entirely insensible of their engrossing practices amongst the savages ; and therefore repeated orders were sent to Talon, that the missionaries should by all means instruct the children of the savages in the French language. The jesuits have not informed us, why that instruction, so evidently beneficial to the colony, was not followed ; but we are given to understand, that they had the address to gain over to their interest Colbert as well as Tracy ; and, in general, that the instruction was dropt, because of the difficulties attending it. In the mean while, Talon exerted amazing talents in promoting the prosperity and commerce of the colony. He had been told of silver mines that were to be found in Canada ; but in this he was soon undeceived by experience : other mines, however, were discovered in great abundance, and especially those of iron ; and Talon formed a scheme for manufacturing it, and shipping it to Europe from Gaspey, then in possession of the French. In August, 1666, he employed la Tessarie to discover mines ; and he found a very fine one of iron, with a prospect of copper and other mines. Soon after, Talon went to France, and prevailed with Colbert to lend la Potardiere, a famous miner, to Canada, where he made a most favourable report of the mines, particularly those about the town of Champlain, and Cape Magdalen, between Quebec and Trois Rivières. In the year 1668, full liberty of commerce was published in Canada ; and this, together with the discovery of the mines, and a tannery manufacture, which had been set up with great appearance of success, raised very high expectations in all who had the least concern with Canada. It may perhaps give some information to a British reader, at this time, to be informed, that, notwithstanding all the promising appearances of this colony, from its mines and manufactures, they came to nothing ; unaccountably, as father Charlevoix says, though the reason is very plain. It was against the interest of the jesuits, his brethren, that any thing but their own commerce should flourish in Canada. They knew that if the inhabitants should once be possessed of a spirit of commerce, their functions must cease of course. It is true, they encouraged the fur trade, the only commerce we can discover that was carried on in the inland parts of Canada, for an obvious reason, because they themselves had a great interest in it, on account of their vast credit with the savages. The Outaouais, whom we have already mentioned to be seated on the upper lake, in particular, now drove a great trade with the French Canadians in furs, and solicited that a jesuit might be sent amongst them, in hopes that other French would follow him, and make a settlement in their country. This request was granted, notwithstanding the dreadful fate of Garreau and Mej-

Mines in Canada.

Mission of father Allouez amongst the Outaouais.

hard ; and father Allouez was employed in that mission. He surmounted incredible hardships, in his voyage thither, and was greatly scandalized to see the inhabitants apply to the sun for the cure of some of their countrymen, who had been miserably scorched by a barrel of gun-powder taking fire. On the first of October, he arrived at Chagouamigon, where he found a township, containing, at least, eight hundred warriors of different nations, and there he built a chapel, to which proselytes of all nations resorted. Charlevoix himself owns that he made little or no progress in the works of his mission, because of the idolatry of the people, who erected idols to which they sacrificed dogs, and made offerings that they might be cured of an epidemical distemper then raging amongst them. Those savages undoubtedly had notions of a superior being, and even their absurdities are proofs of it. When they were in storms, they sacrificed dogs, and other animals, to appease the raging of the sea, and they had amongst them customs that evidently marked their belief of a transmigration of souls. This was exemplified in a variety of instances ; and so strongly were they prepossessed with those notions, that even the proselytes to christianity could not be kept from sacrificing to the true God. Every thing amongst them was transacted as a religious matter from the highest pitch of their worship to the lowest obscenity. Their physicians attributed all their diseases to the neglect of superstitious duties, especially their omitting making a feast, when the hunting and fishing season was over, and their priests, or, more properly, their jugglers, prescribed a feast for removing every disease they were subject to. Though a great many christian Hurons lived amongst them, yet they were so degenerated, and retained so many of their native superstitions, that their religion could scarcely be discerned. Allouez endeavoured to reclaim them, and understanding that the whole nation was congregated from the islands, where they resided, he paid them a visit. The first thing the barbarian who served as porter required of him was to deliver his shoes, which, after examining them carefully, he returned to the father ; as being a mark of the greatest respect he could shew him. When introduced to them, he was charmed with their gentleness and docility. He there found a man, who had lived almost a hundred years. He had the gift of fasting for twenty days at once, and so high an opinion did the savages entertain of his virtue, that they said he often saw the Author of all things. This aged Indian had two daughters, who were proselytes to christianity, and so assiduous were they with their father, that, some days before his death, they prevailed upon him to be instructed by Allouez, who baptized him. The missionary intended to give this venerable father a christian burial ; but his countrymen burnt him for some reasons too fanciful to be repeated here.

His great success.

If we are to believe Charlevoix, this missionary had vast success in converting the Outagamis, the Illinois, and even the Sieux ; but he could converse with the latter, as well as several other nations he there met with, only by interpreters. The Sieux informed him, that their nation was the most northerly in the world ; but probably they included the Astiniboils, and all the other tribes, who spoke dialects of their language. Their neighbours, towards the west, were the Karefis, who lay in the neighbourhood of a nation, who were man-eaters, and sold human flesh ready dressed. Father Allouez had there an opportunity of seeing the Cristinaux, or, as they are called, the Creek Indians, who, as he says, adored the sun, to whom they sacrificed dogs hanged on trees. He gave them the character of being great talkers, and said that they spoke a dialect of the Algonquin. About the beginning of the year 1667, father Allouez, understanding that the Nipissings had taken refuge in great numbers on the borders of the lake Alimipegou, to the north of the upper lake, at the distance of 1500 miles from the spot where he was, set out, attended only by two savages to visit them. He found them for the most part christians ; but as degenerated in their religion as the Outaouais, and the Hurons. After performing the functions of his mission amongst them, he returned to Chagouamigon, where he took an opportunity of joining a large company of Outaouais, who were going with furs to Montreal, from whence he went to Quebec, where he was joined by father Nicholas, a friar, and four labourers or volunteers in the service of conversion. From Quebec they went to Montreal, where they found the Outaouais had finished their business, and were ready to embark ; but they obstinately refused to suffer the friar and the four volunteers to go on board their canoes ; so that the two fathers were obliged to embark by themselves, without provisions, or even necessaries of any kind. But it is now time to return to Quebec.

Submissions of the Iroquois.

THE Iroquois cantons of Agnier and Onneyouth, at the departure of Tracy, the French viceroy, perceiving the French were now grown too powerful for them in Canada, made their submissions to Courcelles, the governor-general, who, at their request, sent the fathers Bruyas and Fremin to labour among them in the vineyard of conversions. Father Garnier

- a was sent after to assist them; but visiting the christians of Onnontague, he was detained there by Garakontie, who built him a cabin and a chapel; and engaged him to remain there till he should return from Quebec, where he was going to solicit for missionaries to his own canton; and that of Goyequin. Garakontie, after some stay at Quebec, returned to Onnontague, with the fathers Carheil and Milet; and the bishop of Petrée was so active, that, excepting the canton of Tsonnonthouan, all the savage nations in America were provided with missionaries; but, notwithstanding all the pains the good fathers took, their success in conversions was but very moderate. The savages, all but a few weak Hurons, began to despise them; and Charlevoix, with great reason, says, that the neighbourhood of the Dutch and English was a great obstacle to the conversion of the Indians. The truth is, those savages now knew the sweets of trade. Gain was their only religion, and commerce their worship. We ought to repeat it, that the missionaries employed in Canada were a set of indefatigable, dauntless, enthusiasts; the tools of European jesuits, who practised on the weakness of the French, and other zealots in courts, and raised contribution upon the public, by publishing splendid accounts of the progress the gospel was making amongst the savages. Charlevoix, in his part of this history, takes occasion to launch out into high encomiums upon several religious ladies and jesuits, who then lived in Canada, and who, if we are to believe his characters of them, were sufficient by their lives and exemplary zeal to have converted half the globe from idolatry to christianity: but he thinks that their labours were defeated by the Iroquois dealing so much as they did in strong liquors with the people of New York, though, at the same time, he frankly owns that his own countrymen, the French, were far from being irreproachable on that head.

- In the year 1668, so great was the attention of the court of France to the prosperity of Canada, that the affairs of that colony had a most promising aspect. Gentlemen of Prosperous State of Canada. ancient families and small fortunes in Old France transported themselves to the New, where they had lands and lordships assigned them; and, with a very moderate share of industry, they were soon enabled to live like men of quality. The soldiers of the regiment of Carignan Salieres were now become planters and colonists, and every officer amongst them was a great landholder; a policy that cannot be sufficiently admired in the court of France, as every man thereby had an interest and a property in what he fought for. New troops were sent over, which still added not only to the strength, but the tranquility of the colony; and the habits of industry, application, and labour, became now to be fashionable. Happily for their neighbours, the subjects of Great Britain, those habits were forced, and of no long continuance. The moment the French planter found means to subsist himself with a little outward shew and splendour, all toil and application was laid aside; which always gave the English an important superiority in the solid possessions of life. The tranquility, however, which the colony enjoyed was a proof of its prosperity; so that, towards the end of this year, even the Tsonnonthouans applied to M. Courcelles for a missionary to instruct them, and he sent them father Fremin. The Agniers, who had hitherto appeared the most determined enemies of the missionaries and who had so often embroiled their hands in their blood, became now reconciled to their doctrines; and vast numbers of converts were made about the falls of St Lewis, and the mountain; but the Onneyouths and Goyogouins were less tractable. By this time, the Iroquois, remaining in perfect peace, the Algonquins, whom they had dislodged and driven away, returned to their former habitations, all of them converts to christianity, or rather to popery, though Charlevoix ingenuously confesses^a, that most of those conversions were the effect of interest and convenience only, and seldom sincere. About this time, father Nicholas, who was labouring with Allouez at Chagouamigon, conducted to Quebec savages who are known by the name of Pierced noses, from their practice of piercing their noses, and hanging beads and plates to them. After disposing of their merchandizes they returned to Chagouamigon.

- ABOUT the year 1668, or 1669, a misunderstanding grew up between Courcelles the governor-general, and Talon, the intendant general of New France. Both of them were men of great and acknowledged abilities. Talon understood the interests of the colony and had done it great services; but being an accomplished courtier, he espoused on all occasions the interests of the jesuits, whom Courcelles disliked. The latter had fine parts, and would have been a most excellent governor, had he been a little more active; or if he could have suffered Talon to have supplied his place. Talon saw this weakness, and often ventured to dispatch business without consulting the governor-general, so that they lived uneasy together, and Talon going over to France was succeeded by M. Bouteroue. This minister brought along with him a letter from M. Colbert to Courcelles, which politely gave him to understand that he ought to live upon better terms than he did with the bishop of Petrée and the jesuits, and that M. Bouteroue was preferred to the intendence of the province, chiefly on account of the great regard he had for that order.

Quebec made a bishopric.

For some years past a negotiation had been on foot between the courts of France and Rome about erecting Quebec into a bishopric. As there was at this time but a very indifferent understanding between the two courts, his holiness made great difficulties on account of the independency, which a bishop of Quebec might affect in so distant a country. At last, all difficulties were got over; his most Christian majesty, to make suitable provision for the new bishopric, gave to it, and the chapter of the cathedral, the rents of the abbey of Maubec, which was afterwards encreased with those of the abbey of Benevent. So miserably poor, however, was the new bishop of Quebec, and so griping the papal court, that the bulls of his creation lay for four years at Rome for want of money to defray the expence of passing them. About this time, Maisonneuve, who had so long and so worthily governed Montreal, resigned his post, and M. Bretonvilliers, as superior general of the seminary of St. Sulpice, named M. Perrot to succeed him. The latter, who had married a niece of Talon, thought it beneath his character to act under a commission from a private subject, and, therefore, had interest enough to obtain commission from the king, which, however, expressly mentioned that it was granted upon the nomination of M. Bretonvilliers.

Conduct of Courcelles.

NOTWITHSTANDING the natural inactivity of Courcelles, yet he was extremely alert in every thing relating to the interest of New France, especially with regard to the savages. Understanding that the Iroquois, who lay towards the lake Ontario, had sent presents to the Outaouais to engage them to bring their furs to them that they might dispose of them to the English of New York, he resolved to check them. For that purpose he embarked with a body of troops on the river St. Laurence, and notwithstanding the great number of falls and rapids he met with between Montreal and lake Ontario, he shewed the savages that it would always be in the power of the French to invade them by boats; which had all the effect he could have wished for, by their breaking off their commerce with the Outaouais, and the other northern savages. This voyage, however, did so much prejudice to his health, that he soon after desired to be recalled. The remaining term of his government was chiefly taken up in replacing the French settlements of Acadia and Newfoundland, which had been ceded to the crown of France, by the treaty of Breda. In the year 1670, M. Talon, who had retired from the intendency of New France, only that he might resume it with greater advantages, returned to Canada. That able minister, notwithstanding all his attachment to the jesuits, was convinced that their ministry was prejudicial to the temporal affairs of the colony; and, during his absence in France, he had obtained the re-establishment of the fathers recollects, who the reader may remember, were the first missionaries in Canada, before the conquest of Quebec by the English, and whose successors were extremely desirous of resuming their functions in that colony. Talon's views in this re-establishment was to moderate the influence and power of the jesuits over the natives, whom they absolutely governed, not only by the sway they had over their consciences, but by debarring them from, or indulging them in, the use of spirituous liquors. He obtained at the same time a recruit of five hundred families from his most Christian majesty for peopling Canada; but after setting sail with part of them, the ship they were in was wrecked and many of them lost. Talon, however, soon raised fresh recruits both of recollects and inhabitants, with whom he arrived at Quebec, where he found that the same storm, which had wrecked his ship had done damage to the amount of 100,000 francs.

Irregularities
soldiers.

TALON's zeal for peopling Canada, though founded on right maxims of policy, was not without its inconveniences; for his colonists imported, into the country, vices, till then unknown to the inhabitants. Three French soldiers meeting with an Iroquois chief, who had with him a valuable cargo of furs, first made him drunk and then murdered him; but notwithstanding all the precautions they took, they were discovered and thrown into prison. While their process was preparing, six Makingan Indians, who were possessed of furs to the amount of 1000 crowns, after being made drunk, were murdered and robbed by three other French soldiers, who sold the furs as their own property, and had so little precaution, that they did not even bury the dead bodies, which were discovered by their countrymen. The latter, imagining the Iroquois were the perpetrators of the murders, flew to arms, and demanded satisfaction; but one of the French soldiers, quarrelling with his confederates, discovered the truth, and then both the Makingans and Iroquois united in a war against the French. Four of the Makingans burnt the house of a French lady with herself in it; and the Iroquois were equally exasperated by the impeaching murderer, accusing his two confederates of designing to poison all the savages they met with. Matters, however, were but just coming to extremities, when Courcelles arrived at Montreal, and, in the presence both of the Makingans and Iroquois who were there, put to death a death the French soldiers, who had murdered the Iroquois chief, promising that the assassins of the three Mahingans should meet with the same fate, as soon as they could be discovered. This example of speedy justice charmed the savages, and disarmed them of their wrath; and, upon Courcelles promising to make good all the damages that had been done, they laid aside all farther resentment. Courcelles, having thus established his authority by his justice, applied himself to compose the differences between the Iroquois and the Ou-taouais, which had broken out into hostilities, and so highly was he respected, that both sides sent deputies to Quebec, where, chiefly by the prudence of Garakontbie, all interests were reconciled. Garakontbie, who, no doubt, had a secret understanding with the French before the departure of the deputies to their own country, publicly professed his having been long a christian in his heart, and his detesting the errors in which he had been educated, and earnestly desiring the bishop to baptize him, which he accordingly performed with great state and ceremony. The name he received at the font was Daniel; and the ceremony was attended with a noble entertainment given to the savage deputies, which had a most excellent effect upon the unconverted natives in general.

WHILE the province of Canada was in this desirable situation; a most dreadful mortality broke out amongst the northern natives, which carried off whole tribes, particularly that of the Attikamegues, who never have been since heard of under that name. About the same time, Tadoussac, which had hitherto been the chief mart of the Indian savages in the fur trade with the French, began to be entirely deserted, as likewise did Trois Rivières, by means of the small pox breaking out, which carried off 1500 savages at once. The French, however, maintained their settlement at Trois Rivières, though they could not do that at Tadoussac. The same loathsome distemper made likewise great havock at Sylleri, Loretto, which we have already mentioned, was instituted by father Chaumonot; and that the English subjects of New York, in the neighbourhood of the canton of Agnier, began to tamper with the natives, and to endeavour to bring them over to protestantism; but, according to Charlevoix, without effect. They then endeavoured to intimidate the women, by telling them that the government of New York would not suffer them to appear with beads and other marks of popery in their province; but all was to no purpose; for the ladies, on the head of religion, proved still more intractable than the men. Notwithstanding this, many of the Agniers continued to insult the missionaries. A chief of one of their cantons turned father Perron out of the assembly of the natives, and imposed silence upon them; upon which Perron threatened them with the resentment of the great Onnontio, and to complain of the affront to the governor-general. We are told that this shew of resolution in the missionary so greatly daunted the Iroquois chief, that he came and asked pardon of the father, who reproached him soundly for his insolence and impiety, and would not even hear what the savage had to urge in behalf of himself. The haughtiness of the father produced an effect very contrary to what might have been naturally expected, for the chief immediately undertook to bring all his canton into the pale of Christianity. For this purpose, he went round to all its elders, and persuaded them to agree to a general assembly, which being accordingly held, was opened by a speech from the chief, which might have proceeded from the most zealous missionary. He was seconded by father Perron, and Garakontbie happening providentially to be there, he harangued in his turn, on the same subject, with so much energy, that the assembly unanimously came to the following resolutions. First, no longer to acknowledge Agreskoue (which it seems was the name of the supreme deity of those savages) as the author of life, and that he should be no longer worshipped. Secondly, that their jugglers or empirics should no longer be called to visit their sick; and, thirdly, that they abolish all indecent and superstitious dances.

Mortality amongst the savages.

Zeal of their women.

Ill success of the missionaries.

WE have mentioned these particulars, rather to give our countrymen, now that they are become possessed of New France, some idea of the manners and dispositions of the savages and the true method of treating them, than for any material information they contain. Charlevoix acknowledges that the event was far from answering those promising appearances. In the canton of Onneyouth, father Bruyas, the missionary there, had very indifferent success, though he was seconded by the indefatigable zeal of Garakontbie. The missionaries attributed the aversion of the natives for them to the neighbourhood of New York, from which they were furnished with spirituous liquors. All the zeal of Garakontbie, and his assistant-missionary, could not prevail with a single savage of either sex to declare for them, or to hear their instructions. They comforted themselves, however, by peopling heaven with a great number of children, whom they baptized in the last stages of their lives. They had better success with the other cantons of the Upper Iroquois, who were farther removed from the English, and had been greatly mortified by the late wars. They had still greater success with the Upper Algonquins, in whose conversion not only the missionaries, but the government of New France, took great concern. A large quantity of ground was cleared and sown with grain of all kind, near the fall of St. Mary, which was in the heart of their settlements, and was the center of a considerable commerce. But after all, there is reason for believing that their success in propagating their religion, even there, was nothing equal to what they gave it out to be, as appeared on every occasion.

Differences with the Tsonnon-thouans.

COURCELLES, ever since the French expeditions against the Agniers, had affected to treat all the savage nations in the neighbourhood of New France as his master's subjects, and had been at great pains in prescribing them the terms of their pacifications with one another; of which he gave them to understand he was to be the guarantee. This haughtiness had a considerable effect upon the savages lying in the neighbourhood of the French, who found their account in the same; but was by no means relished by the Tsonnonthouans, who fell upon the Pouteouatamis, notwithstanding Courcelles had but very lately concluded a peace between them. He immediately sent a threatening message to the assailants, and charged them to keep the peace on pain of his high displeasure. The Tsonnonthouans resented this haughtiness in a manner worthy a free people, and told the governor-general, that they neither were, nor ever would be, subjects to France. Courcelles had ordered them to give up the Pouteouatamis prisoners. This, at first, they refused to do; but, after some deliberation, the great chief of the Goyogouins, who has been already mentioned, and who was next in credit with all the Iroquois to Garakonthie, persuaded them to put into his hands eight prisoners, out of thirty-five of the Pouteouatamis. He then delivered them up to Courcelles, who received them as the whole, being glad of getting off with some shew of credit in so ticklish an affair. The Goyogouin chief, in presenting the captives, acquainted Courcelles, that he had undertaken that commission only with a view of being baptized by the hands of the bishop. This gave great pleasure to all the French. M. Talon, who was by this time returned to Canada, was his godfather, and gave him the name of Lewis, together with a grand entertainment to all the Christian savages at Quebec, Loretto, and Sylleri, in the name of the new convert. About this time, most of the Christian Agniers, amongst whom were some eminent female converts, removed to the Huron settlement of Loretto, where they were encouraged by Courcelles to reside, in hopes that they would in time prove a barrier against their savage countrymen, if they should renew their inroads. As their numbers considerably increased, he formed a settlement for the Christian Iroquois almost opposite to Montreal, in a place called Magdalen's Meadow, from whence it was removed soon after two leagues farther to the south; and it is now called The Mission of the Fall of St. Lewis. In the mean while, Talon began to carry into execution a project he had formed when he was last in France, which was to send a proper messenger through the most distant parts of Canada, to engage all the different nations of the savages to send deputies to a certain place to treat with them about putting themselves under the protection of France. Having communicated his project to Courcelles, the latter recommended as a proper person for this negotiation, one Nicholas Perrot, who was in the service of the jesuits, and, being a man of address, had been employed by them in different parts of Canada.

A grand congress between
the French and the savages.

TALON having approved of this choice, Perrot received his instructions, and visited all the northern tribes, who were known to the French, and invited them to send their deputies, by a certain time, to the falls of St. Mary, there to meet one of the great Onontio's commanders. From thence he went towards the west, and edging to the south, he fell down to Chicagou, which is situated at the bottom of Lake Michigan, then the residence of the Miamis, being escorted all the way by a party of Pouteouatamis to prevent them from insults; the savages being then at war with each other. Perrot found the chief of the Miamis, as well as his subjects, to be very different from the other savages. He could raise four or five hundred warriors, and was always attended by forty of them as his body-guard. He lived in some kind of state, and had his ministers, to whom he issued his orders, without communicating them to any other. Tetinchoua, for that was his name, being apprized of Perrot's approach, who travelled under the title of envoy-general of France, received him and his escort in a warlike manner, and ordered him a splendid apartment with a guard of fifty men. In short, nothing could be wanting to testify their high esteem for the French nation; and when Perrot set out for St. Mary's fall, Tetinchoua would have attended him; but was dissuaded by his subjects, on account of his great age and infirmities. Perrot then would have visited a great many nations lying towards the Mississippi, particularly the Mascoutins, the Kicapous, and the Illinois, but had not time. In May, 1671, the grand assembly was held at St. Mary's fall, and savages resorted to the meeting even from the southern part of Hudson's Bay. The reader, however, is to judge for himself of the credibility of the French relations of this congress, as even Charlevoix himself a himself seems to be somewhat scrupulous of Perrot's strict adherence to veracity in his relations. He certainly had an interest in magnifying his services with his employers, whose professed purpose on this occasion was to intimidate, or trick the ignorant inhabitants out of their country.

On the day appointed for the great congress at St. Mary's fall, the sieur Luffon, a sub-^{His event,} delegate for the intendant of New France, acted under a special commission to take possession of all the country held by those people, and to receive them under the French king's protection. The assembly was opened by father Allouez pronouncing a speech in the Algonquin tongue, magnifying the power of France; and explaining to the deputies the infinite advantages they would receive by their becoming slaves to his most Christian majesty, or, as he expressed it, by their acknowledging him for their great head. Luffon then asked in French, which was interpreted by Allouez into Algonquin, whether all of them agreed to what was proposed; which all having done, with loud acclamations of "long live the king," a cross and the arms of France were immediately erected, and his most Christian majesty was, by the sieur Luffon, graciously pleased to take possession of all the countries from which the said deputies came, and to receive the inhabitants into his protection. After this, the assembly was concluded with great civilities and caresses, that passed on both sides, and by a grand entertainment given by the subdelegate, the expectation of which, more than probably, was the great inducement to their submissions. Luffon, after this, by Talon's order, paid a visit to the southern part of Canada, where he found many well-built English settlements on the banks of Kennebeck river; but he acquainted the owners, that, by the transactions of the late congress, the lands, on which they had been built, had been ceded to his most Christian majesty; and that they were now his subjects. Luffon most absurdly pretended, in the memoirs he sent on this occasion to his superiors, that they willingly promised obedience and fidelity to his most Christian majesty; notwithstanding which, they still remained the subjects of the English, even by the acknowledgment of the French court.

THE year, viz. 1671, the Tionnontatez Hurons established themselves near Michillimackinac, upon a spot lying on the strait that divides lake Michigan from lake Huron, and in the center of those two lakes and the upper lake. This situation was chosen for them by father Marquette; though extremely incommodious on account of the bitter cold occasioned by the neighbourhood of those immense lakes. This year is distinguished in the annals of the jesuits by many supernatural appearances of mock suns, and other phenomena in those savage countries, which are of little consequence to our history, though, no doubt, the fathers improved them to their own ends amongst the ignorant inhabitants.

ALL this while, the savages seem to have purchased no repose by their pretended submission to his most Christian majesty. It appears, even from the French accounts, that some of the most powerful cantons had refused or neglected to send deputies to the congress at St. Mary's fall; and the Iroquois, in the mean while, continued a most cruel war with the Andastes and the Chaouanons, two nations whom they almost exterminated. The few who remained unbutchered were incorporated into the cantons of the victors, especially those of the Tsonnonthouans, to repeople their country. Courcelles soon became sensible that the pretended submission of the Indians was a most precarious dependance, and that the Iroquois paid very little regard to his authority. He therefore resolved, as he could not subdue them, to endeavour to out-wit them. For this purpose he sent messages through their cantons, informing them that he had something of great consequence to propose, and desiring them to meet him at Cataracouy, as soon as possible. The savages, curious to know what this important business was, resorted thither in great numbers, and were met by the governor. After the usual introduction of some presents, and a vast number of caresses, he informed them that he had their welfare so much at heart, that he intended to erect near that spot a commodious building, to serve as a place of trade and resort in their dealings with the French. The savages, little suspecting that Courcelles intended to erect a strong fort for bridling them, highly approved of his intention, and pressed him to set about it immediately; but this was incompatible with his private views of returning to France.

He had already solicited his recall at that court, and upon his return from Cataracouy to Quebec, he there found count Frontenac, who had been appointed to succeed him. After conferring together about the design of the fort, the new governor highly approved of the same, and early in the spring set out for Cataracouy, where he built it, and gave it his own name; by which it was afterwards so greatly distinguished; but as that fort was thus fraudulently erected upon the lands belonging to the allies, if not the subjects, of England, we mean the northern Iroquois, the legality of the French title to it was even then, very doubtful. This important fort stands upon the bay of Cataracouy, at the place where the river St. Laurence discharges itself into lake Ontario, and thereby commands the passages ages between Montreal and that lake; so that, while in the hands of the French, it served to connect that dangerous chain of forts, which they had raised for 3000 miles, along the frontiers of the British colonies. As to the new general, it is agreed on all hands that he was a man of capacity and courage; that he had studied and understood the true interests of New France; that he was most indefatigable in promoting them; and that he had a remarkable talent of making himself respected by the French Canadians, and their Indian subjects, or, as they are called, their allies. At the same time, the general faults of almost all American governors entered into his composition. He was positive, haughty, overbearing, susceptible of prepossessions which he could never shake off, and stuck at no means, had they been even so violent, to remove all who opposed, or disputed, his pleasure. But all his faults were counterbalanced, in the eye of his court, by his zeal for the honour of the crown, and the prosperity of Canada.

the Mississippi.

TALON soon understood the true character of Frontenac, and soon after the latter's arrival he applied to the French court for his recal. It was owing to this great minister, that about this time the famous river of Mississippi was discovered. It was known, in general, from the accounts of the savages, that there was such a river towards the southern parts of New France; but the public were ignorant where it discharged itself, whether in the gulph of Mexico, or in the South Sea. Talon thought that the prosecution of this discovery was a matter of so great importance, that he employed father Marquette, and an inhabitant of Quebec, one Joliet, a spirited able adventurer, and well acquainted with those countries, in the attempt (A). Before they set out they drew a map of the countries, through which they supposed they were to pass, from the information of the savages, and laid in their provisions, which consisted of boiled flesh and Indian corn. They then set out for the bay of Puantes, or lake Michigan^d, but found all the people, through which they passed extremely, ignorant and superstitious. Embarking on the river des Renards, they sailed up it, notwithstanding its rapids, and after travelling some days by land they re embarked upon the river Ouisconsin, or Misconsin. The particulars of their voyages and travels, though curious and entertaining, are foreign to this work. It is sufficient to say, that on the 17th of June, 1673, they entered the great river Mississippi, which answered all the high ideas they had conceived of it from the relations of the savages. Having sailed down it a great way, they met with the Illinois, who lived in three townships three leagues below the place where the river Missouri discharges itself into the Mississippi. Those Indians entertained the travellers with great marks of savage politeness, and afterwards, to the number of about eight hundred, conducted them to their canoes. During their stay with the Illinois, they understood that the latter were apprehensive of being invaded by the Iroquois, for whom their nation was no match; and they implored the good offices of the governor-general of Canada in their favour. Marquette and Joliet, then re-embarking, fell down the river till they came to the mouth of the river Ouabouskigou, where they found a numerous, harmless, nation, who inhabited thirty-eight villages, called the Chuoanous, who were greatly harrassed by the Iroquois. Soon after they met with a nation of savages, who had fire-arms, who informed them that they purchased them, and their working utensils from Europeans, who lived to the eastward, and that they were only ten days journey from the sea. Before they reached the great village of Akamfca, they met with another race of savages, not so polished, but friendly. The natives of Akamfca received them with great civility; but some of them were for murdering the father and his companions, from which they were diverted by the authority of their chief. Marquette and Joliet here held a consultation with their companions, who were five Frenchmen, concerning their future proceedings, and observing by their reckoning, that they were within three days journey of the gulph of Mexico, where they could expect nothing but death from the Spaniards, and considering their provisions were now almost spent, they turned back towards Canada. Arriving at Chicagou on the lake Michigan, Marquette remained with the Miamis, and Joliet went to Quebec, where he found Talon preparing to return to France. Marquette was received with great civility by the grand chief of the Miamis. About the same time, the fathers Allouez and Dablon went up the river des Renards, and preached, but without much success, to the Indians, that inhabited to the south of lake Michigan. In

(A) The reader is to observe, that father Hennepin, who has wrote an account of the discoveries we are now to mention, was a kind of a renegade from the Romish religion, and therefore his relation is much discredited by Charlevoix, and other jesuits, in their accounts of New France. Notwithstanding this, and some immaterial inaccuracies he has fallen into, his accounts agree in the main, and in their material substance with what they have themselves related, and it is evident, that in many important particulars relating to the savages and their situations, as well as in their subsequent discoveries and travels, they were greatly indebted to Hennepin's work, in which we find Marquette's journal of the voyage mentioned in the text.

their

a their travels, they met with the fragment of a rock, which, at a certain distance, bore resemblance to a human head, and was worshipped by the savages as an idol. The two fathers had the courage not only to preach against this idolatry, but to tumble the idol from its station; so that neither it, nor its worship, was ever heard of again. In the course of those voyages, it appeared, that the river des Renards or Foxes, after the falls are past, rolls through a most delightful country, where woods and meadows are agreeably inter-persed, while the borders of the river itself, and those of several smaller streams, which fall into it, produce a kind of wild oats, that, in the winter time, attracts a vast quantity of game. In short, nothing but cultivation is wanting to render it one of the most agreeable countries on the globe; for vines producing large grapes grow spontaneously in its b woods, as do plums, apples, and other fruits; which, though wild, are not disagreeable to the taste, but if cultivated, would become delicious.

TOWARDS the south, the missionaries entered the country of the Mascoutins, which, Frontenac's by the similitude of its name to an Indian word, signifying fire, is by some geographers haughty be-called the country of fire; though its real etymology imports, that it is an open country; haviour.
the land there being more free from wood than any in North America. The Kicapous are the neighbours, and constant allies, of the Mascoutins. Here the two missionaries found the Miamis chief at the head of 3000 of his own subjects, Mascoutins and Kicapous, whom the fear of the Iroquois and the Sioux had brought to the field. The missionaries were disappointed in their labours to convert those people. They were indeed received and treated c by them with great civility, but all the fruit they gained from their exhortations, was, that the savages hearing them talk so well, took them for divinities, and inviting them to a great war-feast, petitioned them to grant them the victory over their enemies. Soon after Dablon, to his great regret, was recalled to Quebec, and father Allouez went to reside with the Outagamis, who, at that time, consisted of about 1000 families. As there was no good understanding between them and the French, the Miamis and the Mascoutins, were earnest to dissuade him from venturing himself amongst those savages; but he was deaf to their remonstrances, and proceeded in his mission with much greater success than he had reason to expect.

IN the mean while, every thing was in confusion in the government of Canada. Frond tenac, as we have already seen, was violent and arbitrary, and had imprisoned the abbot of Salignac Fenelon, who belonged to the seminary of St. Sulpice, as well as Monf. Perrot, late governor of Montreal. In short, he not only quarrelled with all the clergy and missionaries, but with Monf. de Chesneau, who had succeeded Talon as intendant of New France. He likewise garbled the upper council, so that it consisted entirely of his own friends and creatures, and he issued more warrants in one year, than had been for sixty before, so that the whole colony was in the utmost confusion. We have already mentioned the settlements of the savage Iroquois at Magdalen's meadow; but experience soon convinced them, that the soil there could not produce that kind of corn that was proper for their subsistence; so that the settlement was in danger of being entirely abandoned.
e The missionaries, to prevent this, applied to the governor for leave to remove to the fall of St. Lewis, and he taking no notice of their request, Chesneau, as intendant-general, granted them the spot they petitioned for; and notwithstanding the resentment of Fronte- nac, which he discovered in a most violent manner, they kept possession of it. About this time the missionaries were driven by the Dutch out of the canton of Agniers, and Canada was threatened by the Iroquois savages with a fresh invasion. Frontenac, to increase his credit at the French court, wrote to that ministry, in such terms, as if he had by his address in gaining over the heads of the Iroquois, saved New France from entire destruction. His intelligence, however, only served to confirm the opinion of the necessity of maintaining the Iroquois settlement at the fall of St. Lewis.

f THE breach now grew every day wider between the governor-general on one part, and the bishop and intendant on the other. Both parties had great friends at court, and those of Frontenac had credit enough to prevent his being recalled, and perhaps punished for his injustice and violences. He engrossed to himself the whole power of the upper council, by acting as its president. By his own authority he banished the procurator-general, and two counsellors, and even disregarded the orders that came from France. That king, had in June 1675, emitted an ordonnance, by which the governor-general was to have the first seat in the council, the bishop the second, and the intendant the third, but that the latter should collect the voices and pronounce the sentences. Frontenac paid no regard to this ordonnance, and even threatened to throw the intendant into prison. His interest, g however, at the French court prevented his most Christian majesty from knowing the whole of his behaviour, and both he and the intendant received reprimands, though that of Frontenac was the most severe, because he had expressly disobeyed the king's ordonnance.
The letters, which brought over those reprimands, established several other regulations, vernor and the particularly, against a set of men called coureurs des bois, or rangers, who carried on an illicit trade, both with the English and the natives, whom they furnished with strong liquors. Frontenac, on the other hand, and his friends with some justice perhaps, pretended, that the strong liquor trade was absolutely necessary for preserving the interest of the French amongst the savages; that the bishop and the jesuits greatly exaggerated the evils attending it; and that their real design was by getting that trade into their own hands, to engross the management of the colony, and the affections of the natives. Colbert himself became at last so much of the same opinion, that he checked Chefsneau for opposing the strong liquor traffic. At last, the matter began to be very serious; but the jesuits carried their point. The opinions of twenty of the principal inhabitants of New France were taken as to the commerce in question, and the whole matter was referred by the king to the archbishop of Paris, and the famous father la Chaise, the king's confessor, and himself a jesuit, who pronounced sentence entirely in favour of the bishop and the missionaries; and the most express orders were given against the traffic, under the most heavy penalties.

An account of la Sale.

ALL this while, by the absence of Talon, and the death of father Marquette, the discovery of the great river Mississippi remained unprosecuted; but it was now resumed by the Sieur la Sale, one of the most extraordinary adventurers of that age. He was a native of Rouen, and, having lived for some years with the jesuits, he forfeited his patrimony. Throwing himself upon fortune, he resolved to do something that might distinguish him in the world. His first scheme was to discover a passage by the north, or the west, of Canada, to Japan, or China. It was with this view that he came from France to Canada, though unprovided with money, and every requisite that could promote his undertaking. Being, however, possessed of great presence of mind, invincible resolution, and a good address, he found friends and protectors, and amongst them the count de Frontenac himself. He was at Montreal at the time when Joliet returned from his discoveries of the Mississippi, la Sale, and after discoursing with him, he resolved to prosecute the discovery, and to sail northward up the same river. Being furnished with all necessary informations and arguments to make good his point, he artfully applied himself to Frontenac, on a subject which he knew was his ruling passion, the improving and fortifying his post at Cataracouy, which, at this time^b, was surrounded only with stakes, pallisadoes, and earthen ramparts. His reasons for making this fort a barrier against the Iroquois, and all the hostile Indians, were so flattering to Frontenac's views, that he agreed la Sale should return to France, where he was to lay before the court his plans, not only for sailing up the Mississippi, but for building, peopling, and garrisoning the fort at Cataracouy, and rendering its neighbourhood a populous and thriving plantation; so as to produce all the necessaries of life, and docks, and materials for building vessels proper for the navigation of lake Ontario. Being furnished with proper credentials from Frontenac, he immediately repaired to France, where he found Colbert dead; but his post of the marine department, occupied by his son, the marquis de Seignelay. After conferring with that minister, la Sale obtained, to the full, all he wanted. Letters of nobility were expedited in his favour. The lordship of Cataracouy was granted him, together with the government of the fort, provided he would build it with stones, and he likewise received full powers for the extension of commerce and prosecuting his intended discoveries. In the course of his solicitations, the prince of Conti became his patron with the French king, and was of vast service to him; while all the acknowledgment he required, was la Sale receiving the chevalier Tonti, an officer of courage and experience, into a command under him. On the 14th of July, 1678, la Sale and Tonti, with thirty other persons, some of whom were pilots, and other workmen, embarked at Rochelle for Quebec, where they arrived on the 15th of September following. After a very short stay there, they repaired to Cataracouy, carrying with them father Hennepin, whom we have already mentioned, and who was a Flemish recollect. This expedition, in which la Sale worked at the fort, and at building a vessel, gave very promising appearance of his future government. As soon as the vessel was ready, he repaired to Niagara, where he formed the design of another fort at the entrance of lake Erie, above the famous fall of Niagara. After that he travelled on foot through all the canton of Tsonnonthouan, lying to the east of Niagara, and returned by land to Cataracouy; all the while carrying on a trade by means of his bark, which was, soon after, wrecked through the negligence of the pilot.

Sale and Tonti.

LA SALE applied himself with great spirit and diligence, as did Tonti likewise, in repairing this loss; and in the mean while both of them visited the different savages in the neighbourhood, with whom they settled a commerce; and about the middle of August, 1679, the vessel being now ready, la Sale embarked on board of it, with forty persons, of a whom three were fathers recollects from Michillimakinac. In his voyage he met with so severe a storm, that most part of his attendants left him; but happening to fall in with the chevalier Tonti, who had taken another route, he persuaded them to return. His vessel then failed to the bay of Puantes, from whence it returned to Niagara, loaded with furs, while he himself went in a canoe to the river St. Joseph, where Tonti joined him. After remaining there a short while, Tonti went to the country of the Illinois, while la Sale returned to Cataracouy, where he received undoubted intelligence, that his new vessel, which was called the Griphon, was lost or destroyed. It is certain that la Sale, who, with all his good qualities, was opinionated and overbearing, did not consult the true rules of policy in launching so large a vessel upon the lakes of Canada. The barbarians considered it as big with their destruction, and his attempts as tending to engross the whole fur trade, and to bring them into a state of entire dependence upon the French. It is thought, not without great probability, that this induced a party of the Iroquois to surprise the bark when it lay at anchor, and had no more than five men on board, and, after plundering it of all its cargo, to set it on fire. Whatever may be in this, it is certain, that the savages in general were at this time extremely averse to the French interest; and the Iroquois defeated the Illinois, whom la Sale chiefly depended on, while Tonti was amongst them. The Algonquin nations, the Outaouais particularly, were now shaken in their allegiance to the French; and even the French themselves at Cataracouy, where la Sale then was, entered into practices against his life, and gave his savage allies very bad impressions of his designs.

c It required all la Sale's firmness and vivacity to withstand so many shocks. He immediately repaired to the country of the Illinois, who, he perceived, received him with a coldness very different from the sentiments in which he had left them. But this, far from discouraging him, determined him to act with an impolitic vigour, that might overawe the barbarians. All he gained, was, that the more some of them admired, the more they hated, him. His French attendants, seeing matters in this situation, conspired to poison him; but, being discovered, they fled. All he could then do, was, to replace the fugitives by an equal number of young Illinois, who were charmed with his intrepidity under his sufferings. He then dispatched father Hennepin with one Dacan, to sail up the Mississippi, d if possible, to its source. The missionary and his companion accordingly embarked at fort Crevecoeur (which had been built by la Sale) on the 28th of February, and advanced up the Mississippi as far as the 46th degree of north latitude. Here they were stopt all of a sudden by a fall extending the whole breadth of the river, which prevented their going farther, and which Hennepin called The Fall of St. Anthony of Padua. According to Hennepin, they found means to be delivered by some French Canadians from the hands of the Sioux, who had made them prisoners; and afterwards they went down the river as far as the sea, from whence they returned to fort Crevecoeur. Charlevoix, however, treats all the remaining part of this voyage, which is related by that recollect, as a mere fiction, and tells us, that he returned to Crevecoeur by the same course he held when he went up to St. Anthony's fall.

Distress of la Sale,

e THIS fort Crevecoeur, or heart-break, had been built by Monf. la Sale in a very uncomfortable country, and under a very miserable situation. After the departure of Hennepin and his companion, he was obliged, by various accidents, to remain at this fort to the month of November. In journeying from thence to Cataracouy, he perceived, upon the river of the Illinois, a spot very proper for a fort. He accordingly planned one there, and leaving the care of building it to his friend Tonti, he proceeded in his journey, or rather voyage; for most travels in North America are performed, partly by land, and partly by water. While Tonti was intent upon building this fort, he received intelligence that the French, whom la Sale had left at fort Crevecoeur, had mutinied, and run off. Tonti f repaired, with great dispatch, thither, and found the news to be true; all of them, excepting seven or eight, having abandoned the fort, and taken with them whatever they could carry. Soon after, the Iroquois, to the number of six hundred warriors, appeared in sight of the Illinois villages; and this encreased the suspicions of the Illinois against the French. All that Tonti could do in so disagreeable a situation, was, to employ two missionaries, who mediated a peace between the two nations; but in such a manner, that it gave the Iroquois very high ideas of their own power and superiority, so that the peace was of very short duration, and hostilities soon recommenced.

at fort Crevecoeur.

g THE court of France appears at this time to have given too much into the romantic projects of la Sale, who had made himself a great number of enemies in New France, by obtaining exclusive privileges of trade; but the English are chiefly blamed by Frontenac for this irruption of the Iroquois. The flourishing state of the colonies of New England and New York enabled them to be very troublesome neighbours to the French, after they had obtained the restitution of Acadia by the treaty of Breda; and the French had neglected tested that country so much, that it again fell into the hands of the English, whose distance from London encouraged them to pay no great regard to the negotiations of that court. As the acquisition of Acadia and the intermediate country was of the utmost consequence to both nations, the American English, more than probably, had encouraged the Iroquois in invading the Illinois. Tonti, who was then at fort Crevecoeur, with no more than five men, and two recollect fathers, saw it was in vain to resist the Iroquois, who were determined to drive the French from all their posts on the river Illinois; and abandoning the fort, made the best retreat he could (B), but not without losing one of the recollects, who was murdered by the savages. La Sale had heard nothing of this retreat, and was surprized when, in the spring of the following year, on his return to fort Crevecoeur, he found it abandoned. He soon reinforced it with a new garrison, and sent workmen to complete the fort he had marked out the year before, and which he named fort St. Lewis. He then marched to Michillimakinac, where he joined Tonti; and about the end of August, after rambling backwards and forwards for three months, they, once more, set out for Cataracouy, to procure fresh supplies of adventurers and provisions. In his way thither he visited his two forts in the county of the Illinois. Every thing was now prepared for la Sale's grand expedition to the Mississippi, which he entered the 2d of February, 1682-3, by the river Illinois. On the 4th of March he formally took possession of the country of the Akansas, and, according to the French accounts, on the 9th of April he came to the mouth of the river, where he took possession anew; and this, according to Charlevoix himself, is all we know of certainty with regard to this famous voyage; he giving no credit to the accounts published of it by Tonti. It is certain, however, that not only la Sale, but the whole French nation, looked upon the discovery and possession of the Mississippi as very great acquisitions, though it is evident that it was known long before by the name of Cucagua by Ferdinand de Soto, whose body was thrown into it after his death, and had even been settled by some English adventurers.

On the 11th of April, la Sale re-imbarked on his return; but falling ill on the 15th of May, he dispatched the chevalier de Tonti before him, to Michillimakinac. Notwithstanding all that is here related, the honour of discovering the Mississippi is vigorously contested with la Sale by Hennepin; who says, That his being the first discoverer excited la Sale's hatred towards him so much, that he was very ill treated by the French court, and obliged to throw himself on the protection of England. As to la Sale himself, after wintering in the bay of Puantes, he arrived at Quebec in the spring of the year 1683, from whence he set sail for France, carrying with him de la Forest, the major of his fort at Cataracouy.

In the mean while, the government of New France had undergone some revolutions; for the misunderstanding between Frontenac and the intendant grew to such a height, that the French court recalled them both. Le Fevre de la Barre succeeded as governor-general of New France, and de Meules as intendant. By their instructions, which are dated in May 1682, they were obliged to correspond in the most cordial manner with Blenac, the governor of the French American islands, as the opening a commerce between them and New France, would be productive of the greatest advantages to both. They were likewise instructed to live in the greatest harmony with one another, but the intendant was always to submit to the governor. It appears that, for some years, New France had been in a declining state; for in 1697 all the French in the colony, exclusive of those in Acadia, whose numbers were very inconsiderable, amounted to no more than 8515 persons. The Iroquois, notwithstanding their barbarity, were now almost as good soldiers as the French Canadians themselves, and well knew the weakness of the colony: they therefore incessantly applied themselves to bring off the other savages from their connections with the French. In this they were greatly assisted by colonel Dongan, the English governor of New York, who gave to the Iroquois much greater prices for their furs and commodities than the French Canadians could afford, on account of the exactions of the new French company. Other accidents contributed to the misunderstanding. De Luth, a French trader and officer, had put to death some savages, who had murdered two Frenchmen near the upper lake, which exasperated their countrymen to the highest degree. In the month of September, 1681, while Frontenac was yet governor of New France, a Tsonnontbouan chief had been killed by an Illinois at Michillimakinac, which belonged to the Kiskacons, from whom the Tsonnontbouan Iroquois demanded satisfaction for the murder. As the Kiskacons were part of the Illinois, and lived in good correspondence with France, the French governor sent a message to persuade the Tsonnontbouans to suspend their resentment till he could have a meeting with them at Cataracouy, to which he invited them, that all differences might a be settled between the two nations. The Tsonnonthouans, instigated, probably, by colonel Dongan, required the governor to give them the meeting in their own country, at the mouth of the river Onnontague. The haughty Frenchman ridiculously looked upon this demand as an insult upon his own and his master's dignity; but though he received it with the utmost indignation, he knew not how to better himself. In vain he practised all arts to retrieve his authority amongst those savages; and he even received intimations, that if he went to their place of rendezvous, he would be murdered. The governor, however, abated nothing of his haughty behaviour towards the savages; and not only took all the Illinois under his protection, but permitted the Kiskacons to build forts for their defence.

b THE missionaries, in the mean while, were not idle; for they had credit enough to bring some of the Iroquois to consent to meet the governor general at Catarocouy. The governor, imagining this condescension to be the effect of fear in the savages, answered, that he would come no farther than Montreal, and that if they did not meet him there by June, he would return to Quebec. This haughtiness exasperated the Iroquois so much, that they returned to their first proposition of meeting him at the mouth of the river Onnontague. The intendant endeavoured to persuade him to go thither, and proposed a method by which he could do it without derogating from his dignity; but it was obstinately rejected by Frontenac, who declared that he would not quit his government to his success. c hood of Montreal, he met la Forest, who had not yet set out for France, and five Iroquois deputies from the five cantons, headed by an Onnontague captain, one Teganifferons, a great partizan of the French. Their purpose was to profess a great friendship to the governor and his allies. On the 11th of September, Frontenac gave them audience, but understanding that the Illinois were to be excepted out of the number of the French allies, he loaded Teganifferons with presents, to induce him, which he promised to do, to prevent the war between the Iroquois and the Illinois. It appeared, however, afterwards, that Teganifferons was not in the secret of his countrymen's real designs.

UPON the governor's leaving Montreal, other deputies arrived from the Kiskacons, the Hurons of Michillimakinac, and the Miamis. The governor took this opportunity of pressing d the Kiskacons to give the Iroquois the satisfaction they demanded on account of the above-mentioned murder, but all in vain. The Kiskacons alledged, that they had sent Hurons with belts of wampum to the Iroquois, which was all the atonement the custom of the country required for a murder that was not committed by themselves; nor could Frontenac's authority or persuasions bring them to any farther concession, though they said they would act only upon the defensive. While matters were in this situation, the new governor and intendant of Canada arrived; and it was discovered, that all the negociation of Teganifferons was intended only as a blind to the French, till the Iroquois could make dispositions for a vigorous war, which had actually begun.

LA BARRE arrived in New France with great prepossessions against the friends of e Frontenac, and la Sale in particular, whom he accused as being the author of the war that was ready to break out between the Iroquois and the French, before the latter were prepared. He likewise complained of father Zenobe, who had accompanied la Sale in his discoveries, which he treated as impostures, or matters of very little consequence. He alledged, that all had been transacted by a dozen or two of vagabond French and savages, who had prostituted his most Christian majesty's authority, and endeavoured to engrois to themselves the commerce of New France. Notwithstanding the evident partiality of Charlevoix in favour of la Sale, La Barre's allegations were far from being groundless. It seems pretty certain, from the testimonies of Tonti and Clerqz, a Frenchman in Canada, that in all f either he or Hennepin had done, they had been directed by the English, who were no strangers to the countries which they pretended to have discovered. Add to this, that la Sale, in the prosecution of his project, had already run himself 30,000 crowns in debt, which he had no other means of discharging than by feeding his creditors up with great expectations from his discoveries.

THE vanity of the French, however, took the part of la Sale. He had, by his letters, prepossessed that ministry, particularly M. de Seignelay, greatly in favour of his discoveries, which he had magnified above those of Peru and Mexico; and when he came to be heard at court he met with a very small reprimand, but great encouragement. La Barre was all this while struggling under infinite difficulties. He saw the poverty of the colony, and the impending war with the Iroquois, without knowing how to remedy the one, or to prevent the other. He followed the wisest course. Being a stranger, he summoned a general assembly of all the principal inhabitants, ecclesiastical, civil, and military, and demanding their advice. Here we have an opportunity of reflecting on the mistaken policy of the French court, which was the true reason why they availed themselves so little as they did of their possession of Canada, and the other fine countries comprehended in New France. a

* See Contest in America between Great Britain and France, p. 90.

Bad policy of
court.

In the first place, intoxicated with the glory of their monarch in Europe, they too much despised the savages, and appointed none for their governors in North America, but men of haughty behaviour and arbitrary principles, who wanted to rule with a rod of iron. This manner might have succeeded; but they did not sufficiently reflect, that the savages were better instructed by the English and Dutch, who taught them to despise the assuming airs of the French and their governors; while the latter, depending upon the connexions formed between France and England, every day expected that the English Americans would be checked by their government; but in this they were deceived. In the next place, though the court of France was zealous for the prosperity of New France, yet the whole of its government was a system of rapacity. About one fourth of the clear product of the fur trade went from the native into the pockets of the New France company; so that the former were under inexpressible disadvantages, of which the English Americans were entirely rid. b

Assembly of New France.

THE assembly of New France was sensible of all this, and laid before their governor a full state of the province. They represented that the colony could not arm above a thousand men; that, even to do that, they must neglect their agriculture; that they were destitute of provisions; in short, that it was impossible to enter, with any prospect of success, upon the war, without assistance from France. That two or three hundred men, at least, sent from thence would be necessary for their frontier garrisons, particularly that of Cataracouy; that the cultivation of their lands, during the absence of the inhabitants in the war, would require 1000 or 1500 additional hands; that they must be furnished with funds to raise magazines, and to build vessels. All those heads, with reasons, shewing that if they were not complied with, the colony must be utterly ruined, were transmitted to France in a memorial from la Barre, and were highly approved of by his most Christian majesty. Orders were given for the immediate embarkation of two hundred regulars for Canada, and letters were sent to the governor, informing him that Dongan (whose character we have already given) had received express orders from the court of England to alter his conduct with regard to the government of New France. The same letters enjoined la Barre to do all he could to prevent the English from settling in Hudson's Bay, the history of which will be found in another part of this work. c

Negotiation
with the savages.

THOSE letters from Europe served only to encrease the presumption and delusion of the French at Canada. In 1683, la Barre had undoubted intelligence, that no fewer than 1500 Iroquois were assembled at the chief village of the Onnontague, and that they intended to march from thence against the Miamis, the Outaouais, and the other allies of the French. La Barre had, as usual, recourse in this danger to the arts of negotiation. He dispatched a messenger, who arrived at the place of rendezvous, to dissuade the savages from entering upon their expedition, and to prevail with them to send deputies to Montreal to treat of an accommodation. They seemed to agree to both propositions; but before the end of June, le Barre had advice that seven or eight hundred of the cantons of Onnontague, Goyogouin, and Onneyouth, had marched to attack the savage allies of France, while the Tsonnonthouans, and another body of the Goyogouins, were to fall upon the colony itself. Le Barre, upon this, dispatched another express to the French ministry, with heavy complaints of the practices of the English, in exciting this cruel war; and requesting that the duke of York should be applied to, to send orders to his governor of New York not to support the Iroquois against the French. e

LA BARRE, while he waited for the result of those dispatches, sent a fresh message to the Iroquois, in hopes of amusing them, desiring to know how soon they would fulfil their promise in sending deputies to Montreal to treat of a peace. The savages answered the messenger with great contempt, that they did not remember their having made any such promise; and that if the governor had any thing to propose, he must repair to them. It appeared, however, that the savages, though resolved upon a war with the French Indians, were not so forward, as they pretended, in coming to a rupture with the colony; for in August, the five cantons sent deputies to Montreal. The French missionaries and traders, who were best acquainted with the character of those nations, endeavoured to put la Barre upon his guard against the practices, which they said were only to gain time, that they might be more sure of their blow. La Barre, prest perhaps by necessity, received the deputies with great civility, and accepted of all their protestations; at the same time, he took possession of fort Cataracouy, which in fact was the private property of la Sale, or his creditors, and likewise of fort Lewis, in the country of the Illinois; all which proceedings created great dissatisfaction in the colony, where he was treated as an old credulous dotard. In the mean

savages,

a mean while, the Iroquois were making dispositions for possessing themselves of both those forts. While a body of them was on their march, they met fourteen French traders, whom they robbed of goods to the value of 15,000 francs. The savages afterwards excused themselves for this robbery, by pretending that they thought the traders belonged to la Sale, whom they were at liberty, by permission of the governor, to plunder.

DE BAUGY, an officer under la Barre, was then commandant at fort Lewis, where Tonti likewise served; and having intelligence of the approach of the barbarians, they were so well prepared to receive them, that they killed a considerable number of them at the first onset, after which they raised the siege. Upon this attempt of the savages, and another against the fort Cataracouy, which likewise failed, la Barre resolved in good earnest upon an offensive war. This being settled, la Durantaye, a captain of the regiment of Carignan, who commanded at Michillimakinac, and Du Luth, who acted as his lieutenant, received orders to raise all the French Indians in those parts to arms, and to invite them to meet him at Niagara, where he was to be with all the force of New France, on the 15th of August; and from thence to proceed to make a vigorous war upon all the Iroquois nations, particularly the Tsonnonthouans. This summons, however, had very little effect, though these savages were more interested, than the French were, in opposing the Iroquois, so low was the reputation of that government sunk in their eyes. Those about the bay of St. Lewis were the most backward, on account of some discouragements they met with in their trade, by order from the governor, who wanted to engross it to himself. Du Luth, before he could succeed in his commission, was obliged to call to his assistance Perrot, whom we have already mentioned, who managed the barbarians so dexterously, that la Durantaye was soon at the head of five hundred French Indians, besides two hundred Canadians. His chief difficulty still remained, which was how to march them to Niagara. While he was deliberating on surmounting this obstacle, and when the savages had actually begun their march, they were filled with unaccountable prepossessions, suggested by their superstitious notions, that their expedition would be unsuccessful; and after Durantaye and his officers had, with infinite difficulty, brought them to Niagara, their worst suspicions were confirmed by their not finding the governor there, and their afterwards understanding that a peace had been made between him and the Iroquois. The three French officers expected to be sacrificed to their resentment; but the savages contented themselves with coolly reproaching them and the governor for having deceived them, and promising that they never should be again at Onnontio's call. The officers, however, found means to appease them, by pretending that their interest had been consulted in the peace, which the dread of them had prevailed upon the Iroquois to sue for; and thus the savages departed peaceably home.

In the mean while, la Barre had ordered the rendezvous of his troops to be held at Montreal. Before he put them in motion, he sent a message to colonel Dongan, requiring him, according to the promise he had made in consequence of the duke of York's orders, not to oppose his expedition against a bloody perfidious nation, who would massacre the English if they had nothing to fear from the French, and inviting him to join him in revenge, ing the death of twenty-six English subjects, who had the preceding winter been murdered by the Tsonnonthouans. After this, la Barre applied to the cantons of Onnontague, Agniers, and Onneyouth, to all whom he sent belts of wampum, informing them that his expedition was only designed against the Tsonnonthouans. He then detached du Tast, one of his captains, at the head of fifty-six picked men, with a grand convoy of provisions, to Cataracouy, and to reinforce the garrison of that fort, where M. D'Orvilliers, a very able officer, was commandant. He had, by la Sale's orders, in the spring reconnoitred the enemy's country upon lake Ontario, and marked out the spot most proper for making the descent. The army then begun its march. It consisted of seven hundred Canadians, a hundred and thirty regulars, and two hundred savages. It was the 9th of July when this army set out in three divisions from Quebec, and on the 21st it reached Montreal, where they were joined by some other troops under D'Orvilliers. The whole body embarked the 26th and 27th; and on the 1st of August, la Barre had undoubted intelligence, that the cantons of Onnontague, Onneyouth, and Goyogouin; had obliged the Tsonnonthouans to accept of their mediation between the French and them, and that they required Le Moyne to manage the negotiation. At the same time, the general received other intelligence, that in the war he was about to wage with the Tsonnonthouans, he could do them very little damage, as they had already retired with all their effects and provisions into their fastnesses, and that the prosecution of the war would serve only to unite all the different tribes of the nation against the French. It was added, that the heads of the Tsonnonthouans had given assurances, that all they required was an indemnity for what had passed; in which case they would perform even more than was required of them, and abstain from all hostilities against the allies of France; but that, if those offers were rejected, colonel Dongan, the governor of New York, had offered to support them in the war with four hundred horse, and as many men. Char- levoix himself is of opinion, that had Dongan's offer been accepted, la Barre must have been in a very indifferent situation; but he seems to think that Dongan's zeal for the duke of York, and his hatred of the French, got the better of his prudence on this occasion. He treated the Iroquois as the subjects of his master the duke of York, and even ordered them to set up his arms; throughout all their cantons. He likewise, at the same time, required them not to treat with the French without his participation, and sent a messenger to the five cantons, exhorting them to avail themselves of the assistance he offered them, and all at once to get rid of the French. One Arnold was his messenger on this occasion, and went in the quality of his envoy to the Onnontague, who, in the quarrel, considered themselves only as mediators, but, as such, in an independent capacity.

Bad policy of
envoy.

ARNOLD, seeing them startled on delivering his commission, very foolishly asked them, whether they refused to obey their lawful prince, the duke of York? This discourse shocked the Onnontague, who called heaven to witness, that Arnold came only to trouble their land. One of their chiefs then addressed the envoy in the following remarkable strain of savage, yet powerful and rational, eloquence. "Know, said he, that the Onnontague places himself between his father Ononbio, and his brother Tsonnonthouan to keep them from fighting with each other. I thought that Corlar (for so the savages called the governor of New York) would have stood behind me, and cried, Well done, Onnontague, let not the father and the son come to blows together! I am greatly surprized that his envoy should speak a very different language, and oppose my disarming both of them. Arnold, I cannot think Corlar's disposition to be so bad as thou representest it. Ononbio did me great honour in being willing to treat of peace in my cabin. Should the son dishonour the father? Corlar attend to my voice, Ononbio has adopted me for a son; he treated and apparelled me, as such, at Montreal. There have we planted the tree of peace. We have likewise planted it at Onnontague, whither my father commonly sends his ambassadors, because the Tsonnonthouans are dull of apprehension; his predecessors did the same, and both parties found their account in it. I have two arms; I extend the one towards Montreal, there to support the tree of peace, and the other towards Corlar, who has been long my brother. Ononbio has been for these ten years my father, Corlar has been long my brother, with my own good-will; but neither the one nor the other is my master. He who made the world gave me the land I possess. I am free; I respect them both, but no man has a right to command me; and none ought to take amiss my endeavouring, all that I can, that this land shall not be troubled. To conclude, I can no longer delay repairing to my father, who has taken the pains to come to my very gate, and who has no terms to propose, but what are reasonable."

The savages
treat with la Barre.

THIS discourse probably was dictated by le Moyne, who had got the start of Arnold in that canton, and who had the merit of conducting thither Tsonnonthouan, who had been long a prisoner, and had been put into his hands by la Barre. This interview was followed by a letter sent from the savages to the governor of New York, representing Arnold's behaviour, and that they did not believe he had faithfully executed his commission. It is certain, that the good fortune of the French Canadians, and the imprudence of the English governor, saved New France on this occasion. La Barre's army, which was now on its march, during this negotiation had been reduced to the most deplorable condition; and, through the mismanagement of their general, the troops were so destitute of provisions, and so sickly at the same time, that they were preparing to return, when the welcome news of the treaty arrived. La Barre's joy at this was so great, that the savages easily perceived to what difficulties he had been reduced; and the deputies of their cantons, who came to mediate, treated him with an air of superiority. They found him encamped upon a tongue of land near lake Ontario, but in such distress for provisions, that the spot has since been called Famine. Garakontbie and Oureouati, the two chiefs so friendly to the French, were two of the deputies; but the Tsonnonthouan deputy behaved with as great insolence as la Barre did with meanness; for, upon the Tsonnonthouan's declaring that his nation would hear of no peace with the Illinois, la Barre said, that he hoped the hatchet lifted up against the Illinois would not fall upon the French in their country. When the Tsonnonthouan had agreed to this, the peace was made. The Onnontague deputies engaged that the Tsonnonthouans should make good the losses of the Frenchmen who had been robbed; but la Barre, at the same time, was obliged to decamp next day.

The savages
despise the French,

THIS dishonourable peace, tho' better by far than the governor had a right to expect, sunk the credit of the French lower than ever in the eyes of the Iroquois. The court of France appears all this time to have continued under its delusion; as if the affairs of Canada would in the end terminate in the glory of his most Christian majesty provided his governor there was supplied with as many soldiers as he could afford to throw away in a morning skirmish in Germany or Flanders. Scarcely was la Barre returned to Quebec from his inglorious expedition, when he received a reinforcement of troops under two officers, Montortier and Desnos. Together with this reinforcement, he received a royal mandate, giving a those gentlemen a kind of power independent of himself, and appointing them to command in the most advanced and important posts in the colony; a sufficient intimation that the French court thought that la Barre's great age disqualified him from, at least, the more active parts of his government. Another letter arrived about the same time, which shews the haughty unchristian spirit of the French court, in that age; for la Barre was there ordered to make as many of the Iroquois as he could prisoners; because, being strong and robust, they were very proper to serve on board the French galleys.

ABOUT this time, Perrot, who was now governor of Montreal, having some differences with the fraternity of St. Sulpice, who were his superiors, and being proprietors of the island, the French king gave him the government of Acadia, and he was succeeded in that of Montreal by the chevalier de Callieres, the boundary of whose government was marked at lake St. Peter, in the river St. Laurence. All this while, the Iroquois, probably over-awed by the reinforcement lately come from France, remained quiet: though it was apprehended they would not long continue so. They never had agreed to comprehend the French savage allies, especially the Illinois, in the peace; and it was of the utmost importance for the French to protect those people. Towards the end of July, 1685, la Barre received letters from Lamberville, missionary at Onnontague, informing him that the Tsonnonhouans had, during all the preceding winter, abstained from hunting, fearing lest the French should invade their canton in their absence; that they complained of the Mascontins and the Miamis, who, encouraged by the protection of Ononchio, had taken and killed, and even burnt, some of their nation; and that the Mascontins alledged in their justification, the instructions they had received from the governor of New France. It was added, that the five cantons of the Iroquois had lately renewed their confederacy; that the Mahiagans were to assist them with 1200 men, and the English with more arms and ammunition of all kinds; that the Iroquois were actually in motion against the Miamis; and the Tsonnonhouans, though they were known lately to have carried 10,000 beaver skins to New York, refused, on pretence of poverty, to pay the thousand beaver skins they had promised for indemnifying the Frenchmen who had been robbed. As to their not repairing to Quebec to consult with the governor-general, they excused themselves on account of the badness of the roads, and because a young Iroquois, on his return from Quebec, had, for fear of his life, run into the woods, where he died of famine; but the French, who were the occasion of his death, had neither mourned for him, nor covered him; that is, they had made no presents to his family upon his death.

A. D. 1685.

A new governor of New France.

It appears that the Onnontague were, at this time, so well disposed towards the French, as to do all they could to prevent a rupture; but could receive no other answer from the Iroquois, than that they were at liberty to do as they pleased. The news of the late dishonourable peace being carried to France, it was easily foreseen there, that it could be of no long continuance; and his most Christian majesty named Denonville to be governor of New France. He arrived with a fresh reinforcement of troops at Quebec, soon after la Barre had received Lamberville's letter, after a very fatiguing passage, and his first step was to visit Catarocouy. La Forest had, by order from the court, been replaced in the command of that fort; but understanding that his principal, M. la Sale, was amongst the Illinois, he repaired thither, and D'Orvilliers commanded in his absence. During Denonville's residence at Catarocouy, he easily saw the necessity of checking the Iroquois; but he found the affairs of the colony in general in a deplorable situation, and that the government of Old France had formed very false ideas with regard to New France. They had, above all things, recommended to their governors, that they should frenchify (for that was the term) the savages; but Denonville found that the savages continued savages still, and that the French townships in the heart of the colony, which he complained was quite open. By this he meant, that the inhabitants continued for their private purposes to build their houses at such a distance from one another, that they could not, upon any sudden attack from the Indians, assemble in a body to defend themselves. The more the governor knew of the state of the colony, and the nature of the Iroquois, he was the more convinced, that those savages never could be reconciled to the colony; and that, let the consequence be what it would, it was necessary to attempt their reduction by force of arms. Denonville was perhaps not a little encouraged in this resolution by his being a bigot to popery; the progress of which, amongst the Indians, he attributed entirely to the opposition it met with from the Iroquois. All Acadia and its neighbourhood were exposed to the incursions of the English, and the northern commerce was, in a manner, shut up from the French. In the west, the Tsonnonhouans had drawn the English towards Niagara, from whence they were enabled through the lakes, the communication of which they secured, to make inroads to Michillimakinac. They had even established there an interest among the Indians, and had greatly prejudiced the fur trade of the French.

State of the colony.

IN this situation of affairs, it was easy to perceive there could be no safety for the French,^a but by cutting off from the English all communication by the lakes, and particularly to secure that of Ontario on the West, as well as the East, by building a strong fort of stone, capable to contain five or six hundred men at Niagara. This the French government thought was a certain and infallible method to prevent the Iroquois from trading with the English, who, they computed, gained about 30,000 l. a year by furs. All this was represented to the French court by Denonville, who pressed the building such a fort with the greatest assiduity, in which he was seconded by the merchants of New France; and he even laid down the proper funds to defray the expences, by establishing an exclusive commerce at that post, in which it was easy to foresee all the trade of Canada must soon center. For this privilege the Quebec traders offered 30,000 livres a year. This project was not so secretly carried on as not to come to the knowledge of colonel Dongan, who remonstrated strongly against the building any fort at Niagara, which, he said, was the duke of York's property, and likewise against the vast magazines of provisions and arms that were amassing at Cataracouy, and gave great umbrage to the Iroquois. Denonville answered Dongan's remonstrances, by recriminating upon the Iroquois; and endeavoured to shew, that there was no real ground for their suspicions, and that Niagara and its neighbourhood had been taken possession of by the French, long before the English were settled in New York.^b

As the English had succeeded to all the rights of the Dutch in those parts of North America, Dongan's reasoning was certainly just, though, at this time, a discussion of it is immaterial. All his attachment by religion and principle to his master, who was now on the throne of England, did not divert him from acting the part of a vigilant and honest governor.^c He saw that James was, in a manner, the slave of France, and he treated all the orders he received in favour of the French in North America, and which generally were communicated to him by the governor general of New France, as having been extorted from his master, and therefore he paid them very little, or no regard. He even summoned a meeting of the Iroquois cantons, and laid before them their danger from the French, and that their best course would be to prevent the blow meditated against them, by being the aggressors. This assembly, and the purpose of it, came to the knowledge of Lamberville, the French missionary, by means of certain Iroquois papists, with whom he had great interest; and he prevailed with the chief heads of the Onnontague to promise that they would take no step in the war, till he should return from Quebec, and report the opinion of the French governor-general.^d Dongan had some suspicion of Lamberville's intention, and demanded that James Lamberville, brother to the missionary, who had been left at Onnontague by way of hostage, should be put into his hands. He then applied to the popish Iroquois, who had been seated near the fall of St. Lewis, and in the high lands, to whom he offered a far more desirable situation than what they enjoyed under the French government, together with full liberty of conscience in the profession of the Roman catholic religion; his master, the king of England, as he told them, being of the same faith. All he could do made no impression either upon the converted or unconverted Iroquois, and the Onnontague canton refused to deliver up Lamberville.^e

DONGAN then addressed himself to the savages of Michillimakinac, by means of certain traders, who convinced them of the superior advantages they might have by dealing with the English, instead of the French; and, in this he had all the success he could desire. Durantaye was then absent from Michillimakinac; but returning thither just as the English traders had left it, he set out in pursuit of them. The English, however, had foreseen this, and had prevailed with the Hurons settled at St. Mary's fall, to give them a large escort, who convoyed them to the country of the Tsonnonthouans. Denonville saw the danger of the Tsonnonthouans joining with the English, and was confirmed in his resolution to make war upon them. For that purpose, he found it necessary to throw a strong garrison into fort Cataracouy, and to send a considerable detachment by Sorel river, to over-awe the Agniers, and to alarm colonel Dongan. He likewise erected large magazines of provisions all over the country. Upon a review of the forces of the province, he found he could muster no more than eight hundred men, and that he could have very little dependence on the regulars, who were entire strangers to the Indian way of making war. All he could do was to gain time by amusing the English, and their allies, till he could receive the reinforcements which he daily expected from France; but, in the mean time, he found it absolutely necessary to send back the missionary Lamberville to the Onnontague canton. Dongan, during the absence of that father, had succeeded in persuading the savages that the French were ready to fall upon them; for which reason Lamberville never would again trust himself in their hands, and some of their warriors had, in that belief, taken the field. The appearance of Lamberville with a number of valuable presents, sent by him from Denonville, to the chief of the Onnontague, entirely altered the situation of affairs. The warriors, who had taken the field, were recalled; negotiations were entered into for an exchange of^f a of prisoners, and the Hurons, with the Outaouais of Michillimakinac, were prevailed on to give the French governor-general a meeting at Cataracouy. Towards the end of September, Lamberville returned to Quebec to inform Denonville of his proceedings with the Iroquois, particularly with the canton of the Onnontagueſe, who had returned their prisoners; but the Tſonnonthouans had refused to follow their example, pretending that their captives chose to continue where they were. Lamberville was strongly prepossessed in favour of the savages of all denominations, whom he thought to be reclaimable by humouring and using them well; which made Denonville, who saw his weak side, resolve to conceal from him his intention of taking the first opportunity to push the war against the Tſonnonthouans, who had actually entered into hostilities against the Illinois, and a very brisk war was carried on between the two people.

b In the mean while, colonel Dongan, who acted as governor-general of New England as well as New York, had found means to dispossess the French of their settlement at St. Therese, upon Hudson's Bay. The court of Versailles ordered Barrillon, their ambassador at London, to make a strong remonstrance upon this dispossession; but it is remarkable that neither Charles II. nor James II. had authority enough over their American subjects to oblige them to make restitution, which they were most sincerely disposed to do. The French were amazed to the last degree that subjects should dispute the will of their sovereign; but the northern company, who were the proprietors of fort St. Therese, perceiving they could not succeed by applying to the court, resolved to do themselves justice, and demanded assistance from Denonville to repossess themselves of the fort. He granted eighty soldiers, with the chevalier de Troye at their head, and on the 20th of June, 1686, they arrived at the bottom of Hudson's Bay. They first stormed the fort Monſipi upon the river Monſoni, and made the garrison, consisting of sixty men, prisoners of war, seizing at the same time a considerable quantity of ammunition and provisions. Iberville, one of the French officers, then took a small vessel, in which was the governor of the bay; and at last fort Rupert upon the river Nemiscan, which had been lately rebuilt, but remained still unfortified, fell into their hands. They then, with the prizes they had made, proceeded against Quititchouen, where the English had their principal magazines, which they likewise made themselves masters of. Here they found furs to the value only of 50,000 crowns, which made the French conclude that the English did not carry on a great traffic with the savages of those parts, and the garrison was sent in a vessel to Port Nelson. This invasion of the English settlements in Hudson's Bay was certainly a most infamous proceeding, and was far from being justified by the English having dispossessed the French of fort St. Therese, which was built on ground belonging to British subjects. Such, however, was the influence of French counsels at the court of England, that it was agreed Port Nelson should be common for both nations to trade at. But the spirit of the English could not submit to the meanness of their court; and Denonville sent strong remonstrances upon the danger of suffering the French malecontents to have an asylum at Port Nelson, where they could carry on a trade not only independent of their mother-country, but prejudicial to her interests. He represented that the English, by giving much greater prices than the French could afford, were masters of the fur trade; and that Port Nelson was of more consequence to the French than all the forts they had taken from the English upon that bay.

Hostilities upon Hudson's Bay.

In the beginning of the year 1687, the French court, by the ascendancy they had over that of England, aimed a blow that bade fair to destroy all the British interest in North America. Barrillon had prevailed with king James to agree to a neutrality between the subjects of France and England in North America, which left the French in possession of all their usurped claims. The fourteenth and fifteenth articles of the treaty empowered the governors of both nations to treat as pirates all privateers who were not commissioned by proper authority. This had a direct tendency to the ruin of the English subjects, as their court agreed to every claim which the French were pleased to set up. The unsettled state of affairs in England, and the manifest strides which her court was then making towards popery, defeated the intention of this treaty. The English paid so little regard to it, that they attacked fort Quititchouen in Hudson's Bay; but they were repulsed with some loss by Iberville; and in September Denonville declared war against the Iroquois, or rather against the English. This was in the year 1686, but the warlike operations did not commence till June, 1687, when Denonville, having received all the reinforcements he expected from France, took the field with 2000 French and 600 savages. He was, however, on this occasion guilty of a treachery, at which barbarians themselves would have blushed; for, under pretext of the orders his predecessor had received to send all the Iroquois he could make prisoners to the French gallies, before he declared war, he decoyed their chiefs to a conference at Cataracouy, where he most perfidiously put them in irons, and sent them to Quebec to be transported from thence to Europe. This infamous step did no service to the French interest. It sunk the credit of Lamberville and Milet, the two missionaries, in the eyes of the savages.

A. D. 1687.

Treaty to the disadvantage of the English.

ges. Many of the natives, who had repaired to Cataracouy, were the best friends the French had upon that continent, but were now rendered their irreconcilable enemies; as indeed was the whole nation of the Iroquois. Denonville perceived the injustice of the step he had taken, and disavowed it, which only served to render him more odious and despicable to the natives, and to unite them more closely with the English.

A missionary saved.

MILET fell into the hands of the Onneycuths, who immediately condemned him to the flames, and obliged him to suffer all the preliminary torments of that fiery trial; but when he was on the point of being executed, an Indian matron adopted him, and saved his life by carrying him into her cabin. As to Lamberville, who remained in the canton of Onnontague, no sooner had Denonville's treachery appeared, than the chiefs of the canton, with a moderation that would have done honour to the most polished people, sent for him to their assembly, and expostulated with him in the warmest terms upon what had happened. He had, however, the good fortune to be greatly in the graces of the savages, who acquitted him entirely of having any share in the perfidious proceedings of Denonville, but acquainted him that it was utterly improper he should remain any longer amongst them; not on their, but his own account; because if the war-song was once begun, he might be sacrificed by their young warriors without their elders having it in their power to save him.

tinues.

It is reasonable, with Charlevoix, to suppose, that the favour shewn on this occasion to Lamberville was, in a great measure, owing to Garakonthie, who still preserved his credit in his nation. Notwithstanding the sentence of this missionary, the savages were generous enough to assign him a guard, who escorted him out of all danger; and the father himself always afterwards acknowledged Garakonthie to be his deliverer. Denonville was more a barbarian than the savages he was about to fight with. Knowing that matters were now brought to extremities between him and the Indians, he omitted nothing that could make the campaign prosperous on his side. De Tonti, who had travelled as far as the mouth of the Mississippi to obtain some tidings of la Sale, and who had returned to Montreal, was ordered to repair to the country of the Illinois, there to publish the war; and, after assembling them in a body, as soon as possible, to conduct them towards the Tsonnonthouans, laying on the Ohio river; from whence he was to detach parties, to cut off the retreat of their women and children; a circumstance of great importance in a war with the savages. Those in the neighbourhood of the bay of St. Lewis were irreconcilably exasperated against the Iroquois, who had the preceding summer carried off some of their women. Devonzille improved this circumstance to his own advantage, by desiring them to join du Luth, who was intrenched at the straits of lake Huron; a spot that was pitched on by him as most proper for the general rendezvous of his troops. Perrot and another officer, Boisguillot, were ordered to repair to Michillimakinac with all the French they could assemble consistently with the safety of their effects, and to signify to the Sioux, that they should have cause to repent, if they should disturb the French allies during the war. Durantaye, who still commanded at Michillimakinac, and, on account of his good qualities, was highly acceptable to the savages, was ordered, at the same time, to collect all the force he could, and to proceed to Niagara; but in his march, to harass the Indians who were enemies to the French, only taking care to make prisoners of as many of the *Onnontague*se as he could, not only because they were the most harmless of all the Indian savages at war with the French, but that the governor-general should have captives in his hands to exchange (if there was occasion) for the missionaries.

DE TONTI could bring to the field no more than eighty Illinois, though he had reckoned upon five or six hundred. Having intelligence that the Tsonnonthouans were preparing to fall upon their villages, they had put themselves in motion to invade them; but understanding from colonel Dongan, that the French were about to make themselves masters of the Illinois canton, they returned home to defend their own country, and de Tonti joined du Luth at the entry of the strait of lake Huron. The missionaries, on this occasion, saved the French in New France from destruction. The natives, savage as they were, perceived that the French intended to enslave them; and all the authority of Durantaye and du Luth could not bring the Hurons and the Outaouais to join them. They even entered into a treaty with the Iroquois, when the missionaries found means to gain over their two chiefs, and sent them to treat with Denonville, who, on this occasion, acknowledged to his court the important service of the missionaries, and engaged the chiefs in his interest. The Iroquois all this while, notwithstanding the advices they had from colonel Dongan, did not dream that they were on the eve of a war with Denonville. They continued quite indifferent as to the preparations of the French, and the rather as Lamberville still remained amongst them, and exercised the office of his mission. The designs of Denonville were no secrets to Dongan, and it was with the utmost difficulty that he, at last, prevailed with the Iroquois to suspect the truth. All the effect even that had he was only to induce them to send deputies to fort Cataracouy, where Denonville was, and to talk to him in a menacing manner.

But

^a But by this time Denonville was in readiness to enter upon action. He was encamped at the little isle of St. Helen opposite Montreal, where on the 7th of June, 1687, he was joined by de Champigni Noroi, who had succeeded de Meules as intendant of New France, and by Vaudreuil, who was appointed to command the troops. On the 11th of the same month, the army embarked on board two hundred boats and as many canoes of the savages. The whole consisted of 832 regulars, 1000 Canadians, and about 300 savages. The good understanding between the governor-general and the new intendant, not only supplied this army with abundance of provisions, but inspired them with confidence in their leaders. After three days sail, Champigni, with thirty men, detached himself from the main body to dispose every thing at Cataracouy for forwarding the expedition. There Denonville received a letter from col. Dongan, reproaching him with his intention of making war upon the subjects of Great Britain, (for so he called the Iroquois) and putting him in mind of a concert that had been entered between his predecessor de Barre, and himself, Dongan; by which it was stipulated, that neither party should attack the Indians without communicating his intention to the other. Denonville, seeing himself at the head of an army, answered this letter in a very haughty stile; and Durantaye attacked and plundered, upon lake Huron, sixty English traders, who were bound to Michillimakinac, under pretence that such a trade was contraband, and contrary to the orders of the two courts.

DURANTAYE, having distributed the spoils acquired from the English by this robbery amongst the savages, joined du Luth and de Tonti at the entry of the strait, and marched directly to Niagara, where they received an order from the governor-general to repair to the river Sable, in the country of the Tsonnonthouans, by the 10th of the month; which they accordingly did, and there they found Denonville and his whole army. The first measure was to throw up an intrenchment, in which they lodged their magazines; and which, being finished in two days, D'Orvilliers was left to guard with four hundred men. The main body of the French army then marched into the country of the Tsonnonthouans, where they were attacked, and must have been defeated by 800 of those savages, had not their own savages made head against them. Here they lost father Aniebran, a jesuit, one of the most active missionaries, as he was fighting against the savages in the foremost ranks. The loss of the Tsonnonthouans amounted to forty-five killed, and sixty wounded. Denonville, in his account of this action, which he sent to court, acknowledged that his Outaouais immediately cut the dead bodies of the former in pieces, and devoured them. It is, however, acknowledged by Charlevoix, that not only the Canadians, but the savages behaved in this expedition better than the regulars. On the 14th, the French army encamped in one of the four great villages that composed the canton of the Tsonnonthouans, and which they burnt to the ground; but it is highly remarkable, that during ten days, which they spent in ravaging and traversing the country, they did not find in it a living soul; one part of the natives having fled to the country of the Goyagouins, and the others to New York, where they were kindly received, and furnished with arms and ammunition by colonel Dongan. If we are to believe Charlevoix, that gentleman was so sensible of the practices of the French, that he even sent back to England a person who had arrived at New York, with a commission from his court to see an exact neutrality observed between the English and the French.

THE latter, while their army remained in the country of the Tsonnonthouans, were guilty of the most horrible ravages, destroying all the provisions and corn wherever they came; particularly a vast number of pigs, the eating of which introduced pestilential disorders amongst their troops. This, with the dreadful fatigues of their marches, and the hourly mutinyings of the savages, who appear to have been the most useful body of this expedition, obliged the French general to leave the country of the Tsonnonthouans, and to march towards Niagara, which he did after a most disgraceful and unmanly expedition, in which he met with little or no opposition, and employed his arms entirely on the defenceless houses and stores of the inhabitants. Notwithstanding the inutility of this campaign, Denonville thought he could close it by an important service in building a fort at Niagara, where the chevalier de la Troye was left with a garrison of a hundred men; but being soon after attacked by epidemical diseases, they all died. This misfortune was attributed to the badness of the air; but it was more probably owing to that of their provisions; because another fort was built almost in the same place soon after, where the garrison lived very healthy. The governor of New York, notwithstanding the orders he received to the contrary from his court, continued the irreconcilable enemy of the French. He prevailed with the Iroquois cantons to resolve to give over all communication with Cataracouy, and even to send back the prisoners which they had taken from the Hurons, and the Outaouais of Michillimakinac, that he might ingratiate himself with those savages. After this, he ac-acquainted the Iroquois highlanders, and those of the fall of St. Lewis, that if they would join him, he would furnish them with English missionaries, and give them a much more agreeable spot than that which they possessed, to settle in. Those proceedings on the part of Dongan gave Denonville infinite disquiet, and he sent an Agnier chief from the fall of St. Lewis to the country of the Agniers, to know in what disposition they stood with regard to the French. The chief, in passing lake Champlain, met with sixty Agniers, who had been sent out by colonel Dongan on an expedition, and he had the address to bring them all over to the French interest, and to persuade four of them to follow him to the fall of St. Lewis. The same savage, who was in vast credit with his countrymen, afterwards sent his nephew and another Indian to the cantons of Onneyoutb and Onnontague; where being powerfully seconded by Garakontbie's interest, they broke off their connexions with the governor of New York, and preserved them in friendship with the French.

The French neglect Acadia.

ALL those little advantages, though magnified by the French writers, were in the main very inconsiderable. The mistaken notions of the court of France continued still to favour the English in the Canadian fur trade; the only commerce by which their government could possibly indemnify itself for its expence in supporting the colony. De Meules had endeavoured to open the eyes of that government with respect to Acadia, which, he said, was the only settlement that could support Canada; but all his suggestions were in vain, and the fisheries, as well as the fur trade, of that province, remained neglected; insomuch that all the French settled in that profitable country did not this year amount to above nine hundred men. The English knew the weakness of the French in that quarter, and not only carried on an open war with them there, but encouraged the Tsonnonthouans, notwithstanding the late chastisement, to resume all their hostile intentions against the French. This determined Denonville to make another expedition against the Tsonnonthouans, who, by this time, had formed a secret intelligence with the Indians of Michillimakinac, the most useful allies the French had amongst the savages. Denonville, however, was somewhat embarrassed in executing his resolution, by the orders he received from his court to give no umbrage to the English. The truth is, whatever private virtues, or whatever good intentions, he might have towards his sovereign and his country, he appears even by the report of his panegyrist Charlevoix, to have been a very improper governor for New France. His having built a fort at Niagara, and suffering all the garrison with their commander to perish through the badness of their provisions, gave the savages, as well as the French, no high opinion of his resolution; nor did any part of his conduct serve to increase it. The mortality at Cataracouy, as well as in other parts of Canada, fell little short of that at Niagara; while the aversion which Denonville had, at treating with the savages, or even bearing the sight of them, encreased the miseries of the colony. But his presumption led him to despise the Indians he could not conquer. He still depended on the pacific orders Dongan received from the court of England, and on the terror with which the savages were struck by his late expedition against the Tsonnonthouans. He was deceived, for, on the 3d of November, fort Chambly was all of a sudden besieged by a large detachment of Agniers and Mahingans; who, tho' they were obliged next day to abandon their enterprize, succeeded so far as to burn several plantations, and to carry off a number of prisoners. The French did not fail to attribute this attempt to Dongan, and raised him so many enemies among their savages, that he was obliged to keep in pay a body of 1200 Iroquois during all the winter, to cover his government.

Misconduct of their government.

THE reflections thrown out on occasion of those hostilities against the English, are highly absurd, when we consider the infamous conduct of the French governor in arresting the Iroquois chiefs at fort Cataracouy, and sending them in chains to serve as slaves in his master's galleys. This base conduct well accounted, without the intervention of the English, for all the hostilities of the savages. Forty of the Onnontague had taken a French lady and three French soldiers near fort Cataracouy, and the missionary Lamberville undertook to recover them. They accordingly gave him the meeting, and upon his reproaching them with their proceeding, while there was no war between the French and any other Indian nation but the Tsonnonthouans; they frankly acknowledged, that what they had done was by way of reprisal for Onontbio's having surprized their countrymen. Lamberville made a very weak apology for Denonville's conduct, but presented them with two belts of wampum, the one to induce them to treat their prisoners well, and the other to prevail with them not to take part with the Tsonnonthouans in the war; but both those belts were immediately sent to colonel Dongan, who soon after dispatched a messenger to know the meaning of their having been presented by Lamberville to the Onnontague (C). Denonville sent father Vailiant & Gueslis with his answer, but, in fact, to be a spy upon Dongan; who, after some conver-

(C) Charlevoix seems to acknowledge the infamy of Denonville's proceeding in this affair; and that even Lamberville was kept in the dark; for he assured the Onnontague, that their countrymen were still at Quebec though, in fact, they had been sent to Europe.

a sation, told him in plain terms, that the French in Canada could never hope to be at peace with the Iroquois, but upon four conditions. The first was, the returning their countrymen whom they had sent to the galleys; the second, that they should oblige the Iroquois Christians, who had been settled at the fall of St. Lewis and in the highlands, to return to their native cantons; the third, that the forts at Cataracouy and Niagara should be demolished; and the fourth, that the Tsannonthouans should be indemnified for all their losses during the late expedition. Dongan, after this plain declaration, dismissed the missionary, without suffering him to have any communication with the savages.

Soon after Dongan had a meeting with the chiefs of the five Iroquois cantons, whom he summoned to meet him at New Orange. He acquainted them with the terms he had proposed to the French missionary; but told them, at the same time, that though he counselled them to hide their hatchets for a while, he was far from desiring them to bury them; and that though the king his master had ordered him not to furnish them with arms or ammunition against the French, yet if the latter should reject his terms, he would supply them with both at his own expence. He concluded by advising them, at all events, to keep themselves in readiness, if they saw occasion, to fall upon the French by fort Cataracouy and lake Champlain. The savages took Dongan's advice, by remaining quiet all the remainder of the winter; but early in the spring of 1688, a party of them surprised and killed some of a French convoy in their return from fort Cataracouy to Montreal. This was a sufficient intimation that the savages were determined on a war with the French; but the colony of New France was so weak, that Denonville knew not how to check them. All he could do was to employ Lamberville, if possible, to bring off the Onnontague from their union with the other Iroquois cantons. By this time, the missionary Vaillant was returned to fort Cataracouy, attended by two savages, whom colonel Dongan had appointed as his guard, to prevent his conversing with the Agniers. Lamberville had the address to gain over one of those savages, and to persuade him to repair to the country of the Onnontague, where he was to lay before them the interested views of colonel Dongan in bringing them to break with the French. The savage found all the cantons assembled, and an army of one thousand men ready to take the field against the French, at whom they were greatly exasperated. He succeeded, however, so far as to induce them to send deputies to treat with Denonville; but he could not prevent a resolution which five hundred of their warriors took, to attend those deputies as safeguards. When they arrived near Cataracouy, Haaskouaun, one of the deputies, attended by six savages, left the main body; and entering the fort, he required D'Orvilliers, the commandant, to send one of his officers to conduct them to Montreal. A lieutenant, one la Perelle, was by D'Orvilliers ordered to this disagreeable office; for he was both surprised and terrified at seeing himself received in the nature of a prisoner by six hundred well-armed savages, who, when they arrived at lake St. Francis, were joined by as many more. There, the whole body stopt, while the deputies alone went forward to Montreal, where they found Denonville.

Dongan gains over the savages.

HAASKOUAUN was the mouth of the deputation, and treated the Frenchman with an indifferent, if not an imperious, air. He laid before him the miserable state of the colony, with the strength of the Iroquois, and endeavoured to make him sensible with what ease the latter could drive all the French out of Canada. He then, in a deriding manner, made a merit of his having persuaded his countrymen to advertise Ononthe of his danger, and to give him four days time to deliberate whether he would or would not accept of the terms proposed to him by Corlar, (meaning colonel Dongan). Nothing could be more mortifying than the situation of the French colony at this time. Twelve hundred savages were ready to attack Montreal. The French inhabitants between Sorel river and Magdalen meadow durst not stir abroad for fear of being surprised by the savages; an account had come of the extinction of the garrison of fort Niagara, and there was danger lest the last resource of the colony, the negotiation with the Onnontague, should be cut off by the governor's entering into hostilities with the savages. This negotiation was so far advanced, that Denonville had released all the Onnontague prisoners, and had intimated to them the conditions on which he was willing to enter into an alliance with them. By this time, eight hundred of the savages had besieged the fort of Cataracouy; lake Ontario was covered with their canoes; and they destroyed all the French settlements on its borders. Fortunately for the French, the Onnontague captives, whom Denonville had freed, arrived on their return to their own country at Cataracouy, almost at the instant when the fort was about to be surrendered. One of the prisoners happening to be nephew to the chief who commanded the siege, his kinsman's deliverance made such an impression upon him, that he immediately drew off his troops; and, on the 8th of June following, deputies from the Onnontague, the Onneyouths, and the Goyogouins, arrived at Montreal to treat of peace. Those two events, so favourable to the colony, were considered by the French as little less than miraculous; and, after some treaty, peace was concluded upon the following terms: First, that all the French allies should

Their haughty embassy to the French,

who narrowly escape being ruined.

should be comprehended in the treaty; secondly, that the cantons of Agnier and Tsonnon-thouan should send their deputies for the same purpose; thirdly, that all hostilities should cease on both parts; and fourthly, that the French should have liberty to revictual fort Cataracouy. There appears, however, to have been some separate articles in this treaty, not greatly to the honour of the French. Denonville agreed that the fort of Niagara should be demolished; and he dispatched a messenger to the French court, requesting that the Iroquois who had been sent to the galleys, might be delivered up to one Serigny, a young gentleman who was perfectly well acquainted with the language of the savages, and entirely agreeable to them. Such were the terms on which this peace was concluded, and it was confirmed by colonel Dongan sending to the governor the French lady who had been made prisoner at Cataracouy, with twelve other French prisoners. Dongan acquainted Denonville, at the same time, that he had received fresh orders from the king his master to observe the neutrality that had been concluded between him and his most Christian majesty; and that he had actually given orders for delivering all the French prisoners who should be found amongst the Iroquois.

Hostilities again break out.

THOSE fair appearances were not followed by proportionable effects. A convoy of provisions was ordered for fort Cataracouy; but the Iroquois plundered one of the canoes, tho' they had left five hostages for the security of the convoy. Soon after, the Iroquois appeared in arms in several of the most defenceless possessions of the French. The governor-general, that he might early check those proceedings, took the field with all the force he could raise; and coming up with the savages at lake Sacrament, he killed several of the Mabingans, and took prisoners some Agniers, who, according to Charlevoix, had been prevailed upon by colonel Dongan, who had furnished them with arms and ammunition, to commit those infractions of the late treaty. This vigorous proceeding procured some respite to the colony from the incursion of the Iroquois; but Denonville attributed his deliverance, and that of the other colony, to the superior wisdom and address of the jesuits, particularly father Lamberville. It is, however, probable, that the management of those fathers must have been but a poor resource to the colony, had not colonel Dongan been recalled from his government of New York, and succeeded by Andros, who was a protestant, and then trod in his predecessor's footsteps.

Disorders of the French colony.

By the letters of Denonville to Seignelay, the French minister at this time, he appears to have had great abuses to struggle with. He complained of a total neglect of authority and discipline in the colony; that the rangers, or travelling chapmen, had by their behaviour sunk the price of French commodities, and raised that of furs; and that they were guilty of such meannesses towards the savages, as rendered the latter intolerably haughty. He complained, at the same time, of the consequences of the misunderstanding that had happened between la Barre and la Sale; and that the savages laid hold of la Barre's orders against la Sale as a pretext for pillaging the French in general. He concluded with advising the ministry to give orders for building more forts, and informed them that it was impossible to preserve the colony without having 4000 soldiers on foot, and 4 or 500 boats on the lakes. Above all things, he enforced the necessity of suppressing the rangers, who, he said, were so numerous, that the principal settlements of the country were almost unpeopled. Tho' the court of France paid very little regard to Denonville's remonstrances, and though many of the Canadians themselves were of opinion that he aggravated matters too much, yet the continuance of the evils soon justified his complaints. The savages, even those who were otherwise attached to the French, every day more and more despised them, for having had a peace, in a manner, forced upon them by the Iroquois.

Fidelity of the Abenaguas to them.

THE Abenaguas, however, are to be excepted from this number, as were the Iroquois of the fall of St. Lewis and the highlands, with the Hurons of Michillimakinac. The Abenaguas, while Denonville was treating with the other savages, took the field, and marching towards the river Sorel, there surprised and killed some of the Mabingans and Iroquois; and then advancing towards the English settlements, they brought from thence a number of scalps, while the Iroquois of the fall and the highlands, did the same in their parts of the country. The Hurons of Michillimakinac were still more averse to the peace, and the dislike both of them and the other savages we have mentioned towards the treaty between Denonville and the Iroquois, undoubtedly arose from their believing that the Iroquois wanted only to amuse the French governor into a treaty, that they might with the greater ease fall upon his allies. One Kondiaronk, surnamed the Rat, was at the head of the Michillimakinac Hurons, and he is represented as having been a savage of more than common resolution and accomplishments. Putting himself at the head of a chosen band, he marched from Michillimakinac towards Cataracouy, where the French governor informed him of the treaty depending between Denonville and the Iroquois, which he said was so far advanced, that the governor-general was waiting at Montreal for the ambassadors and hostages of that nation; adding, that he could not do more acceptable service to the French, than by returning home without offering the smallest violence to the Iroquois.

Conduct of the Rat chief,

a THE Rat heard this discourse without discovering the smallest emotion or dislike; but leaving the fort, he ambushed his company at a place by which he knew the ambassadors and the hostages must pass; and watching his opportunity, he killed some of them, and took others prisoners, of which last number was Teganifforens, whom we have already mentioned, and who was one of the ambassadors. The Rat after this, is said to have returned to Cataracouy, and to have boasted, that he "had killed the peace." He, however, discovered no particulars, till the arrival of a wounded Onnontague, who had escaped from the Hurons, and who related the whole of the Rat's conduct. When the latter returned to his company, which he had left at Point Famine, he was upbraided by Teganifforens, for having violated his good faith, by making captive an ambassador. The Rat seemed to be greatly surprised, and pretending that he had been put upon the exploit by the French themselves, which perhaps was not greatly wide of the truth, he immediately released the ambassador, and all his companions, excepting one, whom he pretended to keep to replace one of his own men, who had been killed. He then returned to Michillimakinac, where, to render the breach still more irreparable, he imposed so far upon Durantaye the French commandant, as to put the miserable prisoner immediately to death, without any regard to his plea of the Rat's treachery, and himself being an ambassador. After this, the Rat set at liberty an old Iroquois, who had been for some time prisoner at Michillimakinac, enjoining him to return to his own canton; and to acquaint his countrymen, that while the French were amusing the natives with sham negotiations, they were daily putting them to death. This master-piece of dissimulation had all the effect the Rat could desire, by furnishing the turbulent Iroquois with a plausible pretext for breaking off the negotiations. The more moderate amongst them, however, prevailed with their countrymen to name fresh deputies to treat with Denonville, when there came letters from Andros, the governor of New York, enjoining them to break off all treaty with the French, but with the participation of his Britannic majesty, who, considering them as his own children, would suffer them to want for nothing. He, at the same time, informed Denonville by writing, that he was not to expect any peace with the Iroquois, but upon the terms that had been proposed by his predecessor; though, at the same time, he acquainted him that he was so well disposed towards a good understanding with the French, that he had ordered all the English subjects within his governments not to molest the inhabitants of New France.

b It is more than probable that Andros, when he wrote in this strain, followed the dictates of his own avarice. The French alledge, that he plundered their settlements in Acadia and Chedabouctou, on pretence that they did not lie within the limits of New France; and that the whole of his conduct till the revolution took place in England, was one continued scene of perfidy. The English subjects, on the other hand, with great justice pleaded that they had the same right, as the French had, to trade with the northern savages, who furnished the best furs. As to the savages themselves, they found great advantages in dealing with the English preferably to the French, who could not afford them the same prices, nor indeed the same commodities. The numbers of French, towards the end of the year 1688, settled in New France, amounted to 11,249 persons; but so ignorant was the French government of the true interests of Canada, that the colonists, about this time, gave over almost all thoughts of the fur trade, and applied themselves entirely to their fisheries; especially on the south side of the river St. Laurence, where appeared great quantities of whales, as well as white fish. We understand, however, from Charlevoix, that the volatile dispositions of his countrymen prevented their improving their fisheries either on the river St. Laurence, or upon the coasts of Nova Scotia, where they were still more promising. The Abenaguais, in this deplorable state of trade, were the only natives whom the French could depend upon. The English had again and again endeavoured to bring them over; but the jesuit missionaries had laboured so effectually, that all their attempts were to no purpose; and the Abenaguais remained still the barrier between New England and New France.

c DESPAIR, at last, suggested to the French the project of conquering New York from the English; and Callieres, with Denonville's consent, took shipping for France, to propose it to that court. He accordingly presented a memorial to the ministry, setting forth the necessity of such an enterprize, as it was impossible for the French colony to subsist while the Iroquois were so much attached, as they were, to the English. He then disclosed the means which he proposed for effecting this perfidious measure; which, he said, was justified by necessity. He demanded to be put at the head of 1300 regulars, and 300 Canadians. With this force he was to go up the river Sorel to lake Champlain, under pretence of making war upon the Iroquois, but in reality to fall upon New York, the conquest of which he thought was very practicable. He then represented, that the revolution having taken place in England, the inhabitants of New York, who most of them were Dutch, would infallibly take part with the prince of Orange against king James, which still strengthened the necessity of subduing them. This memorial was approved of by the French king and his ministry; ministry; but Denonville was recalled from his government, and the count de Frontenac had interest enough to be declared his successor, being thought the most proper man in France for managing the savages, while the conquest of New York was attempting. This nomination of de Frontenac was the more approved of at court, as he appeared now to be very advisable, and to have profited by his past experience. In the instructions he received, which were dated the 7th of June, he was ordered to dispossess the English from all their posts in Hudson's Bay, and likewise from their fort at Pentagoet. It is remarkable that those instructions were given while a negotiation was actually depending, for amicably adjusting all the claims of the two nations in America.

THE armament intended for the proposed conquest was fitted out at Rockfort, and the command of it was given to Cassiniere, who was instructed to follow count Frontenac's orders, the plan of the conquest being as follows: Frontenac was immediately to sail with the squadron for the entry of the gulph of St. Laurence, from whence he was to repair to the bay of Canso in Acadia, and then to Quebec; while Cassiniere remained on the coasts of Acadia, where he was to make prizes of all the English ships he met with. Callieres was to be dispatched before-hand, the moment the squadron entered the gulph of St. Laurence, where he was to make preparations for the expedition against New York; but concealing his real object under different pretexts. As the greatest diligence was necessary, and as the enterprize could be executed in no other season but the autumn, Frontenac, on his arrival at Quebec, was to set out with the batteaux or boats, attended by de Callieres, who was to act as lieutenant-general, and, at the same time, to dispatch an express in cypher, ordering Cassiniere with his squadron to sail directly to Manhatta in New York. As the time when the sea and land-forces could join was uncertain, the squadron was to wait at Manhatta, and to give a diversion to the capital of the province, while Frontenac was beginning his operations on the first parts of that colony. During Frontenac's absence, Vaudreuil was to act as his lieutenant in New France. When New York was subdued, Frontenac was to require from the English catholics an oath of fidelity to his most Christian majesty, and to suffer them to remain in their possessions. The tradesmen and artizans were to be distributed; that is, they were to become slaves to the French that were to be settled at New York, and all the useless mouths were to be sent to New England or Pensylvania. De Callieres was to act as governor of New York, under the governor general of New France. All the Iroquois villages near Manhatta, or the city of New York, were to be destroyed, and the others put under contribution. All the principal English inhabitants were to be reserved for ransom.

Remarks on the barbarity of the French plan
of operations.

HAD not those orders been transmitted to us by so unexceptionable an authority, as that of father Charlevoix, some difficulty might have been raised in believing that a court calling itself Christian could have acted with so much presumption and injustice: and they will for ever be standing evidences of the difference between the French and English government in matters of conquest, as may be seen by the conduct of the latter, when they conquered almost all the possessions of France in America, and the capitulations they granted to the vanquished. The French court were arrogant enough to imagine, that this plan of conquest must infallibly answer their expectations; but the execution of it depended on so many accidents, that they were totally disappointed. It was the 12th of September before the French squadron arrived at Chedabouctou, and the 18th before they were joined by the merchant-ships, which had been very roughly handled by storms on the banks of Newfoundland. Next day, Frontenac embarked on board a merchant-ship for Quebec, but with very little hopes of being able, through the lateness of the season, to succeed against New York. Before he parted, he left a set of instructions for Cassiniere's conduct; one of which was to erect magazines at Port Royal, of provisions of all kinds out of the English prizes he should make, to be ready for the French troops next year, in case the expedition should be delayed till then. Cassiniere took a great many ships: but found it impossible to touch at Port Royal through contrary winds; and the case of Frontenac, in his voyage to the Pierced Island, was pretty much the same, it being the 12th of October before he could reach Quebec, and the 27th before he arrived at Montreal.

Descent of the Iroquois upon
Montreal.

DENONVILLE continued to be governor of New France till Frontenac's arrival; but when the latter joined him at Montreal, he found the affairs of the colony in a deplorable situation. On the 25th of August preceding, while the inhabitants of that island thought themselves perfectly secure, 1500 Iroquois in the night-time, fell upon la Chine, a settlement which lies three leagues farther up the river than the town of Montreal. The savages, finding the inhabitants asleep, massacred all the men they could find, and then setting fire to the houses, the remaining wretched inhabitants fell into their hands. The cruelties exercised on the prisoners are inexpressible. They ripped up the bellies of women with-child, and obliged mothers to roast their own infants before fires. In short, two hundred persons expired in less than an hour, under those dreadful torments. They then

- a then proceeded towards Montreal, committing the like ravages and cruelties all the way, and carried off two hundred prisoners, whom they burnt. Denonville, being then at Montreal, ordered an officer to take possession of a fort, which he was afraid the savages might seize. The fort was immediately invested, and its garrison being every man of them, but the officer who was desperately wounded, killed in defending it, the fort fell into the hands of the savages, who thereby became masters of all the open part of the island, which they continued to ravage in a most inhuman manner, without opposition. They remained there till the middle of October, and then, by their retreat to their own country, gave the harrassed garrison some time to breathe. De Luth, and another officer, Mantet, having been sent out to reconnoitre, fell in with a party of twenty-two Iroquois, of whom they killed eighteen, and took three, who were resigned to the flames of the French savages.

- Such was the condition of Montreal at the arrival of Frontenac on the 22d of November, 1689. A French savage, who had been made prisoner, and, after being cruelly tormented, had escaped to Montreal, gave intelligence that the enemy intended to return in the winter, and, being joined by a body of English and Mahingans, to make themselves masters of the town of Montreal, in the spring; from thence to pass by Trois Rivières to Quebec, where they expected to be joined by an English squadron, and that they were in hopes by the end of the campaign, no Frenchman should be left alive in Canada. Frontenac was sensible that all those calamities were owing to his not being able to arrive three months sooner at Montreal. The consternation of the whole colony had been such, that Denonville sent orders to Valrenes, who commanded at Cataracouy, to abandon that post, to blow up the fortifications, and to destroy all the provisions he could not carry off, in case he received no reinforcement before November. Frontenac hearing of those orders, opposed them strongly; but Denonville justified them from the inutility of the fort in answering the purposes for which it was built, and the vast expences it occasioned both of men and money to maintain it. Frontenac, besides his having been the founder and father of the fort, alledged many reasons for preserving it; and, particularly, the vast conveniency of its situation for the French traders. But this last happened, in fact, to be one of the strongest motives which Denonville and the intendant Champigny had for its demolition; because they said it had encouraged smuggling, to the prejudice of the public revenue. Frontenac had no regard to their representations, and, notwithstanding Denonville was in so high credit at the French court, that he had been nominated sub-governor to the princes of France, he did all he could to expedite a strong reinforcement both of French and savages, which might arrive time enough to prevent the demolition of the fort. But it was the 6th of November before he arrived with this reinforcement at la Chine, where Valrenes joined him in two hours after with the remains of his garrison, consisting of forty-five men, six having been drowned on their march. Frontenac understood from Valrenes, that he punctually obeyed the orders he had received from Denonville; that he had undermined the bastions and walls of the fort, and had left them with lighted matches fixed to them, adding that he did not doubt, from the noise he heard while he was upon his march, of their having taken effect, and blown up the place. This news afflicted Frontenac beyond expression; but the necessity of conquering New York became every day more apparent, though it could not be attempted that season. For this purpose, Callieres proposed two new plans of operations; the first and most preferable was to attack the city of New York with 1200 men, on board six vessels, while the Canadians should attack New Orange by land. The other plan was for proceeding by land entirely. It is probable, that one or other of those plans would have been executed, had not Frontenac received intelligence that the English were before-hand with him, and were actually in motion to attempt the conquest of Canada. When Callieres sent those plans to the French court, they were deemed to be impracticable, in the then situation of affairs. De Seignelay signified to Frontenac and Champigny, that his master being engaged in a war against all the greatest powers in Europe, he could spare neither ships nor troops to send to Canada, however important, or even necessary, the conquest of New York was. The minister, therefore, recommended it to Frontenac to act upon the defensive; and renewed his instructions for obliging the French inhabitants to build their houses more contiguous to one another, and to fortify their settlements.

Farther designs against the French colony.

Fort Cataracouy demolished.

Proceeding of Frontenac with the Iroquois cantons.

- FRONTENAC* had brought with him from France the Iroquois savages who had been sent to the galleys, and had flattered himself with the hopes of being able, by setting them free, and other measures which he knew were agreeable to the savages, to gain the Iroquois to his side. Above all, he had a great reliance upon the high esteem which they had expressed for his person during his first government. The chief of the released savages was Oureoubaré, a Goyogouin, and Frontenac had, during his voyage, been at great pains to bring him over to his views. When he arrived at Montreal, he there found Gagniation, negaton, an Iroquois deputy, offering some mortifying proposals to Denonville. Oureoubaré, upon this, persuaded Frontenac to send back with the deputy four of the released savages, that they might proclaim to all the nation the deliverance of their brethren. Oureoubaré instructed the savages, at the same time, to magnify the great goodness of their ancient father (meaning Frontenac) to their brethren, which they could not but acknowledge, in point of gratitude, by sending deputies to return him thanks. They were likewise to assure their countrymen, as from himself, that the governor had so great a tenderness for all of his nation, that he would not even return to his own country, if they did not send to demand him. The deputies punctually executed all they had in charge. Their cantons met, and sent back an ambassador with their answer, which reached Montreal the 9th of March, 1690. By that time Frontenac and Oureoubaré had returned to Quebec, and Callieres, who received the ambassador, though he treated him with great condescensions, could not for several days draw from him the subject of his embassy. At last, however, the savage presented him with six belts. The first was by way of apology for the embassy coming so late, on account of the arrival of the Outeuais at Tsonnonthouan. Gagniegaton, who had been sent back on this occasion, intimated that a negociation was on foot between those two people, which was to be concluded next June at an appointed place, exclusive of all strangers; and that the governor general ought to have, as he was invited, treated in person at Onnontague, in which case an accommodation long before had been concluded. The second belt signified the pleasure with which the English subjects of Orange, as well as the Iroquois, heard of their chief Oureoubaré's return. The third belt demanded, by the canton of Onnontague, in the name of the other cantons, all the Iroquois who had returned from France; and the ambassador added, that all the French prisoners throughout their cantons had been assembled where the governor was expected, that measures might be taken according as Oureoubaré should advise. The fourth and fifth belts related to the invasion of the Tsonnonthouan canton by Denonville, and to the demolition of fort Cataracouy; and that when satisfaction was made for those matters, Teganifforens would come and treat of peace with Ononchio. By the sixth belt, Gagniegaton signified that ever since the preceding October, a body of Iroquois had been in the field, but that they would not enter upon action till the melting of the snows; and that then, if they made any prisoners, they should be well treated; desiring that the French might do the same by their prisoners. "In your defeat at la Chine, continued he, I had eight prisoners; I ate one half of them, and I saved the other. You are more cruel than me; for when you shot twelve Tsonnonthouans dead, you ought to have at least spared one or two. I ate my four prisoners by way of reprisal for your barbarity."

Proceedings of the French
with the natives.

DÉ CALLIERES endeavoured to learn something farther of the ambassador with regard to the dispositions of the other savages; but received only untrue or evasive answers. This determined him to send the ambassador and his retinue to the governor, who refused to admit Gagniegaton to his presence, on account of his former insolent behaviour; but was civil to those of his retinue, and treated with them through Oureoubaré, who appeared always to act in his own name. When the rivers were navigable, they had leave to depart, and Oureoubaré presented them with eight belts, telling them at the same time how pleased Ononchio was at the treaty between the Outaouais and the Tsonnonthouans; and at the resolution the Iroquois had come to not to put their French prisoners to death, and that Ononchio would act in the same manner, till he received an answer from the five cantons to the propositions he was to make. As to himself, he repeated that he was resolved not to leave Ononchio, till his countrymen should send an honourable deputation to reclaim him. He then exhorted them to shake off the yoke of the Flemings (meaning the English of New York) to take no concern in the quarrel between Ononchio and them, as they had dethroned their lawful sovereign, whom the French king protected; and that they might go, with the officer ordered to attend them, with the greatest safety to Montreal. This officer was the chevalier D'Eau, a reformed captain, who was to act by way of spy upon the conduct of the *Onnontague*se. During the dependence of this negociation, an account came of some advantages which a party of French and Indians had obtained over the English upon the frontiers of New York. The news of this success, though trifling in itself, was the true inducement of Frontenac to act as he did by the Iroquois ambassador.

Negotiations
between the Outaouais and
the Iroquois.

THIS agreeable account, however, was qualified by the negotiation between the Outaouais and the Iroquois, without the governor's intervention. This, in fact, was occasioned chiefly by the natural propensity those two people had to trade with the English rather than the French, and it had been the constant endeavours of the French governors to set those savages at variance with one another. But the pusillanimous conduct of some of those governors, the low condition of Canada, and the losses that colony had lately sustained, had determined the Outaouais, whom the French had always considered as their most faithful a faithful allies, to treat of an accommodation with the Iroquois, from whom they had little to hope, but every thing to fear. Nothing had prevented the execution of this before, but the activity of Durantaye, who still continued to command at Michillimakinac, and the zeal of the missionaries there. But some of the Outaouais happening to be at la Chine during the massacre there, returned to their own country with so contemptible a report of the French power, that the canton finally resolved upon the accommodation without the least participation of the French. To succeed the better, they sent back all the Tsonnonthouan prisoners they had, as a preliminary to the intended conference in June. Their resolutions, however secret, could not escape the vigilance of Durantaye and the missionaries, who were informed of every thing; but, the winter being far advanced, it was found difficult to procure a messenger who would undertake to travel near 1200 miles through almost impassable roads, till the sieur Joliet offered himself, and arrived at Quebec, with a letter from the missionary Carheil to Frontenac, in the end of the year 1689. This letter very freely laid open to the count the desperate state of the French interest amongst the Outaouais, and the contemptible figure his nation made in the eyes of those savages^a.

FRONTENAC was far from being displeased with the contents of this letter, because they reflected dishonour upon some of his predecessors, particularly in the affair of demolishing fort Cataracouy, and evinced the necessity of building a new one there; and likewise of executing his great plan of detaching the Iroquois from the interest of the English, to facilitate the conquest of New York. In answer to Carheil's letter, he ordered Durantaye to assure the Hurons and Outaouais at Michillimakinac, that they should soon see an alteration of affairs. He then laid down his dispositions for attacking the English. A company of a hundred and ten men, French and savages, was raised at Montreal, under the command of two lieutenants, who had their choice of the posts which they were to attack, and they determined on that of Orange. In this resolution they were vigorously opposed by the savages, and they marched, without coming to any resolution, till they arrived at a place where the road separated into two; one leading to Orange, and the other to Corlar, which the savages agreed to attack. This resolution being fixed, they proceeded in a most fatiguing march for nine days to Corlar. Being arrived within two leagues of it, the chief of the Iroquois settlement at the fall of St. Lewis, who was commonly called the Grand Agnier, in a formal language, which he made to the whole party in a strain of frantic enthusiasm, inveighed against the English, as being enemies to God. Soon after they were informed by four savage women, whom they met, in all they wanted to know about the strength and situation of the place, which, upon their arrival at it, they found open, even its gates not being shut; and they entered it in the night. The accounts given of this boasted expedition by Charlevoix, and other French authors, represent it as a master-piece of courage in warlike operations; whereas, in fact, it was as cowardly as it was inhuman. The party entering the place without resistance, butchered men, women, and children, till, tired with murder, they gave quarter to forty of the English, whom they carried into slavery. One Coudray, the governor, who, very possibly, was in concert with them, was saved, and all his property; as was the house of a woman, to which one of the wounded lieutenants was carried. All the rest of the town was burned down. It is not unreasonable, however, to suppose, with Charlevoix, that the success and barbarity of the expedition was of service to the French in the eyes of the savages.

Frontenac's sentiments of their coalition.

Inhuman expedition of the French against Corlar.

Upon the return of this inhuman party to Montreal, two French officers, one of whom had been present at the butchery of Corlar, raised a party of popish Iroquois, and gave the command of it to the Grand Agnier, to make excursions against the Iroquois. In this expedition, they took forty-two prisoners, among whom were eight English. Hearing that a hundred Makingans were waiting for them, and their number being far inferior to that, they marched towards the Salmon river, which they reached upon the 4th of June; and here they began to make new canoes; they having left their own at a great distance. While they were busy at this employment, they were discovered by a party of Algonquins and Abenaguais, who, taking them for English, with whom they likewise were at war, attacked them before day, and the Grand Agnier was killed the first onset, as were six other Iroquois. The mistake was soon discovered by the prisoners each party made; but the French Iroquois, in resentment of their chief's death, refused to deliver up their captives. This produced a difference between the two parties, though both of them were popish, which all the art and authority of Frontenac could not, for some time, compose. At last, it was agreed that the aggressors should send deputies with a belt to the fall of St. Lewis, expressing their sorrow for what had happened. As to the Grand Agnier, though he was capitally concerned in the massacre at Corlar, yet he is by Charlevoix^b celebrated as being a living saint, and his conversion to popery as the immediate and miraculous work of God. He even thought, that, if he had survived, he would have converted his whole canton to popery.

Two expeditions against the English.

BESIDES the irruption of the French and their savages into New York, by the way of Corlar, Frontenac had planned two other expeditions; one from Trois Rivières, and the other from Quebec, that a spirit of emulation might be raised all over the colony. Trois Rivières could raise no more than fifty-five men; of whom twenty-five were Algonquins and Sokokis, and the command of the whole was given to an officer named Hertel. After a long and fatiguing march, he came to an English settlement, which Charlevoix names Sementel, at six leagues distance from Piscataqua in New England. The French surprized this settlement, and cut in pieces all they found in it, excepting fifty-four persons, whom they carried off captives; and, after burning all the houses, and sheep and cattle in the stables, they were preparing to make their retreat, for fear it should be cut off by the inhabitants of Piscataqua. It was accordingly attempted; but Hertel, by the advantage of his situation, repulsed the assailants. After which he retreated, though with some loss, but was obliged to leave his eldest son, who was wounded in the knee, to the care of the savages.

Casco Bay
taken.

By this time, the Quebec party had taken the field under one Portneuf; and Hertel, upon his return, understanding that he was within two days march of them, dispatched his nephew with an account of his success to the governor-general, and set out to join the Quebec party, within four leagues of Casco Bay, which they were determined to attack; tho', according to Charlevoix, the place mounted eight cannon, and was well provided with every thing necessary for a defence. Four savages, and two French, were employed to alarm the fort, which they did by raising the Indian cry; and having killed an Englishman, fifty of the garrison marched out, and received the fire of the French, who lay in ambush, and who afterwards attacking the English party with swords and hatchets, killed them all but four, who regained the fort, but all of them wounded. Towards the evening, Portneuf summoned the governor of Casco Bay to surrender; but was answered by the latter, that he would defend his fort to the last. This startled Portneuf, whose commission from Frontenac only bore that he should ravage the open country; but, determining to equal Hertel's exploit at Sementel, and his men demanding to be led to the assault, he resolved to risk every thing. The French writers say, that besides the main fort at Casco Bay, four others had been raised, but all of them were evacuated, in order to reinforce the principal garrison. Those forts, however, appear to have been only the defenceless houses of the inhabitants; and the main fort, notwithstanding all the French writers, who had their information only from those who had an interest in magnifying their own exploits, was little better than defenceless. The reply the French commandant made to the answer of the English governor was, that he must surrender the fort, with all the provisions and ammunition within it: and, though the English demanded six days to consider, they were allowed only one night. The defenceless state of the fort obliged the garrison to capitulate; but Portneuf would give the governor no other terms, but those of surrendering himself and his garrison prisoners of war, which they accordingly did, being reduced to the last extremity. The English accounts say, that the number of effective men in the fort did not amount to above twenty-six; the French make them double the number, exclusive of women and children. Scarcely was the place evacuated, when an English squadron appeared to relieve it; but its commander, not seeing the English colours flying, concluded that the fort had been taken, and being confirmed in his opinion by none of his signals being answered, he returned back; while Portneuf not only plundered and demolished the fort, but all the houses in its neighbourhood. The prisoners, among whom was the governor, whose name was Dennis, and some of his relations, were carried to Quebec. This inconsiderable conquest, though magnified by the French, was not, however, thought sufficient to answer their main purpose; which was that of bringing their savage allies into a state of independence upon the English. To effect this, Frontenac, about a month after Portneuf's return to Quebec, sent de la Porte Louvigny, a reformed captain, and Perrot, with a strong convoy from Montreal to Michillimakinac, charged with presents from the governor-general to the savages, and a commission to supersede Durantaye in that station. This removal of an officer, whose services had been so eminent as those of Durantaye were, was attributed to the jealousy of Frontenac, who had a secret dislike to the jesuits, with whom he thought Durantaye was too closely connected. Envy of his great merits, perhaps, did not a little contribute to Durantaye's removal; and this envy seems to have pursued him through life, for, being obliged to quit the profession of arms for that of the law, he died in indigence at Quebec.

Durantaye superseded in his command.

LOUVIGNY was attended, in going to take possession of his new command, by a hundred and forty-three French; many of whom had large quantities of fur at Michillimakinac, a makinac, which they could not before carry off for fear of the savages. They were escorted by two French officers, and six savages; but on the 23d of May, being the day after they embarked, they discovered two Iroquois canoes. Upon this, Louvigny detached thirty of his retinue in canoes, and sixty by land, to surround the enemy, who were suspected to be very numerous, though they did not appear. The canoe men fell into an ambuscade of the Iroquois, who killed by far the greatest part of them. At first, Perrot, under whose command Louvigny was during the journey, would not suffer the latter to march against the savages; but, at last, he gave him leave, and Louvigny, at the head of fifty or sixty French, killed about thirty of the Iroquois, wounded a greater number, and made some prisoners, the remainder of the savages escaping with great difficulty to their canoes.

The Iroquois defeated.

b THE two officers, who headed the convoy, returning soon after to Montreal, sent one of the prisoners they had made to Frontenac, who put him into the hands of Oureoubaré; another was carried to Michillimakinac, and given up to the Outaouais, who beginning to conceive now a better opinion of the French courage than they had entertained before, committed him to the flames, as an evidence that they had no intention to make peace with the Iroquois. At this time the Outaouais ambassadors were on the point of setting out from Michillimakinac to conclude a definitive treaty with the Iroquois; but the sight of the French, the news of their victories, and the magnificent presents they brought, gave a new turn to their sentiments; which Perrot improved with so much address, that they entered with more zeal than ever into the French interest. A hundred and ten canoes, loaded with furs and skins, to the value of 100,000 crowns, under the convoy of three hundred northern savages, immediately set out for Montreal, where they found the count de Frontenac.

Consequence of their defeat.

c THE chevalier D'Eau, who had been sent as ambassador and spy to Onnontague, and all the French in his retinue, had been put in confinement by the savages, notwithstanding all the fair professions of Frontenac, that he had sent that officer to evince the great confidence he had in their nation, and to do them honour. Not contented with this, they sent him prisoner to Manbatta, to prove their aversion to any peace with the French, and went so far, according to Charlevoix, who probably in many respects exaggerates matters against the English, as even to burn two Frenchmen of his retinue. Frontenac, upon this, ordered two detachments of his best troops, one under the command of the chevalier de Clermont, to guard the southern parts of the colony from Montreal, to the river Sorel; and the other, under the command of the chevalier de la Motte, was to secure it from Montreal to Quebec. Many actions, which, though attended with bloodshed and barbarity, are too inconsiderable to be transmitted to history, followed upon this, and the French pretend, that the Iroquois massacred without distinction all the captives who fell into their hands.

Hostilities of the Iroquois.

d THOSE hostilities produced very disagreeable effects, as the colonists of Canada durst not venture abroad, either to cultivate their lands, or cut down their harvests; so that the colony itself was threatened with famine. On the 18th of August, de la Chassaigne, commandant at fort la Chine, was informed, that a great number of canoes were seen upon lake St. Lewis. Frontenac, who was then at Montreal, immediately concluding that they were filled with Iroquois, gave orders for a vigorous defence, but he soon understood that they were no other than the grand convoy from Michillimakinac, which we have already mentioned. The joy of the French at understanding this, exceeded, if possible, their consternation before; and the convoy was received under peals of acclamations from the inhabitants. On the 22d of the same month, Frontenac gave audience to all the chiefs of the convoy, who appeared to be well disposed, on the part of their nation, to continue firm in the French interest. Mean while, an Iroquois, who was nephew to the grand Agner, and who had been sent out to reconnoitre towards Orange, had, in his return, discovered, that a large body of men were employed in making canoes upon lake Sacrament. This Iroquois was so much attached to the French, that the truth of his report, with many circumstances attending it, to do honour to himself, was so far from being questioned by Frontenac, that he immediately gave orders for putting the town and island of Montreal in a proper posture of defence. He called together all his savage allies who were upon the spot, and after feasting them with great profusion, he informed them, that he was resolved never to make peace with the Iroquois, till he should reduce them to beg it upon terms as advantageous to his allies as to the French, and that he considered both as being equally his children. He then very artfully exhorted them to fidelity, and, without losing the least of his dignity, he chanted a war-song in their own manner, to shew them that he intended to head them in person, and to share with them in all their dangers. Frontenac's behaviour charmed the savages to a degree of enthusiasm for his person, and he was answered with peals of universal acclamation. Next day, upon advice that great numbers of canoes canoes were seen on lake Champlain, signals were given for assembling the regulars and the militia; and on the 31st of August, Frontenac upon Magdalen Mead reviewed the savages, who were so eager for the service, that all of them appeared under arms, without their leaving a man to take care of their merchandizes. Next day the army was found to consist of 1200 men.

Arrival of the Michillimakinac convoy.

Transactions
with the savages.

SOME of the savages of the fall of St. Lewis took this opportunity to invite all the chiefs of the other cantons to go to Onontbio's quarters. There being assembled, one Lewis Atheribata, a popish chief of Lewis's fall, very artfully addressed himself to the company, but more particularly to the Outaouais, whom he advised to lay before their father Onontbio, their inmost sentiments, and to disclose the true reasons of their late treaty with the Iroquois. The spokesman of the Outaouais, upon this, apologized in the best manner he could for his countrymen, and gave the reasons for their conduct, which we have already seen; but promised an inviolable fidelity to Onontbio in time to come, in which he was seconded by all the other chiefs present. Frontenac very properly thought, that some altercations might arise if the company continued longer together; and after thanking Lewis Atheribata for so seasonable an interview, he promised him another meeting as soon as the enemy should be repulsed.

The French
surprized by the savages.

NEXT day, the scouts reported, that they could discover no enemy, nor any footsteps of one; upon which, the army was dismissed till farther orders, and the inhabitants fell to their harvest-work, which was the main object of their concern. Two days after, a party of Iroquois surprized a defenceless number of the French inhabitants and soldiers, carelessly at work in the field, and killed or took prisoners six soldiers, eleven inhabitants, and four women, besides putting to death a number of horned cattle, and burning the neighbouring houses and storehouses; but upon an appearance of some troops approaching, the savages retired to the woods. Frontenac was vexed that this check had happened while the savage chiefs were with him. They had already earnestly desired him to dismiss them, which, at last, he did in a very gracious manner, after exhorting them to follow his example in carrying on perpetual war with the English and the Iroquois, till they were humbled. A few days after their departure, the Iroquois again surprized the French, who thought them at a great distance, in many places of the colony; and killed the commandant of fort de Chateaugue, above the fall of St. Lewis, with several other officers and persons. Frontenac, incensed with those frequent surprizals, reproached Oureoubaré with the insensibility of his countrymen, as to all the kindnesses he had done to him and them. The savage made the best apology he could for their behaviour; and so entirely disarmed Frontenac of all resentment towards himself, that that governor resolved to trust and employ him, more than ever, in compassing his favourite views.

Canada invaded by the English.

On the 10th of October, while Frontenac was preparing to return to Quebec, an officer from thence brought him two letters from Prevot, who commanded there during the governor's absence. The first, dated the 5th, gave him advice, that he had been informed by an Abenauais of thirty ships having left Boston, in order to besiege Quebec. The savage, who brought this intelligence, had travelled in twelve days from Piscataqua to Quebec, and assured Prevot, that the English fleet had been for six weeks at sea. The second letter gave advice of twenty-four English ships, some of which were large, having appeared off Tadoussac. Upon this alarming account, Frontenac and Champigny immediately embarked on board a small vessel for Quebec; and soon after another courier came from Perrot, with advice that two French ladies had been taken by a fleet of thirty-four sail, which, at the time of his writing, might be at the isle of Condres or Hazels. This intelligence, which now appeared certain, was the more astonishing to the governor, not only because he never had the smallest intimation of any ships being fitting out at Boston, but because he imagined, that the English were sufficiently humbled by their late checks; which brings us to the events that happened in other parts of his government.

Success of Sir William Phipps, who reduces Acadia

WE have already mentioned, that an English squadron appeared off Casco Bay, but did not come time enough to prevent its falling into the hands of the French; upon which they sailed to Port Royal, and appeared before the harbour of that place the 20th of May 1690. This fleet was commanded by Sir William Phipps, and consisted of a frigate of forty guns, a sloop of sixteen, one of eight, and four ketches; the fort being commanded by Manneval, a Frenchman of some abilities and experience. The English commodore immediately summoned the fort to surrender at discretion, which Manneval, who was destitute of all the means of defence, refused to do, but sent out one Petit, an ecclesiastic, to treat with Phipps. After some altercation it was agreed, that the fort should be surrendered, on condition that the governor and the garrison, which is said to have been very weak, should be carried to Quebec; that the inhabitants should be secured in their effects, and the exercise of the Roman catholic religion. The Frenchman insisted upon this capi-

a tulation being put in writing, which Phipps absolutely refused to comply with, on pretence that his word, as a general, was to be depended on more than all the writings in the world. The capitulation, however, if we are to believe Charlevoix, was afterwards verbally confirmed with Manneval himself; but broken by Phipps on pretence that the soldiers and inhabitants had pillaged a magazine, that by the capitulation ought to have belonged to the king of England. Upon this, he disarmed the soldiers, put Manneval under arrest, and gave up the place, and even the churches, to be plundered. Such is the relation the French give us of this expedition; but it ought to be read with great caution, because Phipps could have no good reason for refusing to sign a capitulation, but the weak state of the place, and the same pretext, if it was one, that is said to have induced him to break, would have served his turn equally well, had the capitulation been written, as it was verbal. Be this as it will, it is certain that Phipps carried off with him Manneval, a serjeant, and thirty-eight soldiers; that he obliged the inhabitants to take an oath of fidelity to king William and queen Mary, and that he had left his first serjeant to command Port Royal, appointing six of the principal inhabitants to be of his council for administering justice. From Port Royal, Phipps sailed to Chedabouctou, where he summoned Montorgeruil to surrender it. Though that officer had^b no more than fourteen men in garrison, he made so brave a defence, that Phipps was obliged to set fire to the place before he would listen to a capitulation, which was at last granted him upon honourable terms; and he and his garrison were conducted in safety to Placentia; which gives us a fresh presumption, that the French have misrepresented the conduct of Phipps at Port Royal.

Upon the whole, there is a ridiculous, and, indeed, improbable vein of amplifying every thing for the glory of their own nation, and depreciating the English, that runs thro' all French relations of America; witness what Charlevoix himself tells us of sixty French Abenaguais having attacked and defeated six hundred English, with the loss of no more than three men. In the mean while, the chevalier de Villebon arrived from France to take upon him the command in Acadia; but finding how matters stood at Port Royal, he resolved to retire to the fort of St. John; which he proposed to make the rendezvous of all the French forces and Indians in Acadia; but he was pursued so close by two English pirates, that he was obliged to take to a canoe, in which he and his officers escaped, while his ship the Union, which had brought him from Europe, was taken by the enemy. By this time, Villebon had reached the fort of Gemsec, but soon understood the pirates had not only taken the Union, but two ketches, into which her cargo had been put. Villebon assembled a body of Abenaguais, and marched with them to the sea-coast, where they endeavoured, but in vain, to surprize the pirates, who fell upon Port Royal, where they committed great inhumanities. Villebon upon this returned to Gemsec, where he dismissed, in the winter, all his faithful Abenaguais. He then went to Quebec, from whence he returned in a French vessel to Port Royal, and from thence he sailed to France, where, after representing to that ministry the state of Canada, he undertook to drive the English out of it, even without the assistance of the French, if he was suffered to put himself at the head of the Abenaguais.

Vanity of the French.

It would be amazing, that the English court should all this while express little or no concern for so fine and so well situated a country as that part of Canada is, did we not consider that king William and the English government had at this time on their hands two great wars in Europe, one in Ireland, and one in Flanders, and that whatever had been done against the French in New France, was effected by the New England forces, without any assistance from Old England, farther than that the king and ministry there signed commissions, and sometimes lent their names to what was going on. In fact, Acadia, at this time, was equally the property of the French as the English; the latter being strongest by sea; but the former was favoured by the natives. Villebon's request was granted; and he was sent back to Quebec with all possible encouragement, and a commission to command the Abenaguais, who, in the mean while, were promised all kind of supplies and encouragement from the French, till such time as the latter were in a condition to establish their affairs at Port Royal. At the same time, commissions were made out for some of the French Canadians to act as officers under Villebon. He returned to Quebec in the beginning of July 1691.

Villebon governor of Acadia.

ALL those events, so prejudicial to the French interest in Canada seem either to have been unknown to Frontenac before his arrival at Quebec, or slighted by him; and indeed caution and mistrust did not enter into his character. He had remained so long at Montreal, that had not the English fleet under Phipps been very severely treated by the weather in its approach to Quebec, that capital must have been lost before its governor could have heard of its being attacked. The first measure Frontenac took, after receiving Perrot's second dispatch, was to send Ramezay, the governor of Trois Rivières, to Callières, with orders for him to leave only a small garrison at Montreal, and to come directly down to Quebec with all the force he could raise, either there or elsewhere in the colony. It was the evening of the 14th of October before Frontenac entered Quebec, where he found his deputy had put every thing in excellent order for defence, and that the English fleet was advanced as far as the isle of Orleans. The place was defended, not only by its ordinary garrison, but by a great number of the neighbouring inhabitants, whom the commandant had ordered into the city, and who worked with so much alacrity at the fortifications, that in five days they repaired them, so as to be secure against any sudden attack. Frontenac, however, gave directions for some new intrenchments to be thrown up, and sent orders to the militia commanders of Beaupré, Beauport, the isle of Orleans, and on the side of Lauson, not to quit their posts till they saw the enemy land, and actually attack the place; and then they were to march as he should direct. At the same time, Longueville, a French partizan, at the head of a body of Hurons and Abenaguais, watched the motions of the fleet, and the lower posts, on both sides the river, were so well guarded, that the English could not send even a long-boat ashore. All this time, militia men were arriving daily at Quebec, and shewed as much alacrity as its inhabitants themselves did for its defence. On the 15th the chevalier de Vaudreuil went out at the head of one hundred regulars to reconnoitre the enemy, and to oppose them if they should attempt to land. About the same time, Frontenac, who expected some ships from France, fearing they might fall into the enemy's hands, sent off by the little canal of the isle of Orleans, two canoes, with orders to sail down the river as far as they could, and to inform the ships of the state of affairs. At the same time, he erected a battery of eight pieces of cannon upon an eminence adjoining to the fort, which completed the fortifications of the city. In short, he omitted nothing that could contribute to a vigorous and an effectual defence. On the 16th, Vaudreuil returned to Quebec, and that morning the English fleet was discovered off the heights of that place, consisting of thirty-four ships of different burthens, and carrying, as was said, 3000 land forces. In advancing, the largest ships kept the middle channel, and at 10 o'clock came to an anchor. The admiral then sent out a long-boat with a flag of truce.

Preparations to defend Quebec,

which is besieged by the English.

THE reader is here to observe, that Phipps had taken prisoner one Grandville, a French officer, who had been dispatched by Prevot to observe the motions of the English, and who, on his examination, frankly owned what he thought was the truth, that Quebec had neither fortifications, troops, nor a general, to defend it. This account encouraged Phipps so much, that he boasted he should lie in the governor of Quebec's palace that very night. Frontenac seeing the long-boat, with the messenger, who was a trumpet, put off from the fleet, sent an officer, who met him half way, and muffing his eyes, carried him round all the fortifications, where the soldiers and inhabitants purposely increased the noise of military hurry all round him, and, at last, carried him to the great-hall. He was astonished, when unblinded, to find himself before the governor-general, the bishop, the intendant, and a large body of officers, all of them with looks of defiance and resolution. This was so much the reverse of what he expected, that he trembled when he presented the manifesto of the English admiral. It reproached the French and their savages with the cruelties which they had committed upon the subjects of England; demanded all the prisoners that they had should be delivered up; that the governor, garrison, and inhabitants should surrender themselves at discretion, and concluded by giving the governor-general only one hour to consider of his answer. This summons being read aloud, created great indignation in the Frenchmen, which was redoubled when the trumpet, pulling out a watch, said he could not stay after 11 o'clock.

Frontenac's answer to the English summons.

VALRENE'S immediately called out, that the trumpet ought to be treated as belonging to a pirate, who was in arms against his lawful sovereign, and who had acted as a true pirate, by breaking the capitulation he had made at Port Royal with Manneval. Frontenac answered the trumpet, by reproaching Phipps, and the English, for their rebellion against their lawful sovereign, in whose right he said he acted. He likewise mentioned the affair of Manneval with great indignation, and concluded by saying, that he would give no other answer to the insolent summons, but by the mouth of his cannon. He then ordered the trumpet to be again blindfolded, and re-conducted to the place where he was taken up. We have, in the history of New England, given some account of Sir William Phipps, who must be acknowledged to have been utterly incapable of commanding in an expedition of this importance; being a man neither of education nor abilities. His astonishment, at the report of the messenger, was inexpressible; but he was quite dismayed, when the French, beginning to play from their batteries, gave him to understand, that, in order to reduce the place, he must form a regular siege; for which he was no way prepared.

a prepared (D). It must be acknowledged, that never did English subjects make a worse figure than they did in this expedition. A long-boat attempted to land, but, through the unskilfulness of the pilot, could not. On the 18th, about noon, almost all the long boats of the fleet, filled with soldiers, made good their landing at Beauport, where they drew up in order of battle, to the number of 1500. As the ground was utterly improper for a regular engagement, the French and their Indians harrassed them by bush-fighting, in which they had vast advantages; so that three hundred Canadians, by skipping from rock to rock, and firing from trees and bushes, not only concealed their numbers, but gave their enemy no opportunity of attacking them, so as to do much execution. In short, the English, having, according to the French, lost^a one hundred and fifty men, were obliged to retire before a small handful of the enemy, whom they took for Indians; being heard to say in their retreat, that they believed there was an Indian behind every tree. The loss of the French consisted of three gentlemen volunteers, and of eight or ten common men, who were wounded. Frontenac, to conceal his numbers, ordered a battalion of regulars to secure the retreat of the Canadians.

UPON the afternoon of this defeat four of the largest English ships, laying their sides to the place, began to cannonade the upper town; and a very hot fire ensued on both sides. The English are said to have directed their guns particularly against the college of the jesuits, whom they considered as being the authors of all their countrymens sufferings; but whatever may be in this, it is certain that their cannonading did little or no damage to the city; and that they only killed one man, and wounded two. About eight in the evening the firing ceased on both sides; but next day it was renewed, and with such success from the battery called the Mariner's Gate, that both the admiral and rear-admiral of the English were obliged, not greatly to the reputation either of their courage, or their skill, to draw off, after receiving vast damage in their ships, and losing a great number of their soldiers and sailors. The other two ships continued their cannonading for some time, but were at last obliged to draw off likewise. This day produced no operations by land; but the English, who continued to be encamped near Beauport, early next morning drew out in line of battle, and about two in the afternoon they marched in good order towards Quebec. They had not gone far when they were attacked by St. Helene, one of the best Canadian officers, at the head of two hundred men, in the bush-fighting manner, who obliged the English to take shelter in a small wood; from whence they made so vigorous a fire, that they forced the enemy to retreat, and mortally wounded St. Helene. In the mean while, Frontenac advanced in person at the head of three battalions to support his Canadians; but the action by that time was over, and the English suffered their enemies, whose loss, according to their own accounts, was very inconsiderable, only two of their men being killed, and four wounded, to retreat to the city, while the loss of the English is represented to have been greater than in the former engagement. The truth seems to have been, that this day's action was little more than a foraging adventure; for upon the retreat of the French into the city, they carried off all their cattle to re-victual their ships, which were in vast distress for fresh provisions. This circumstance, which is admitted by the French themselves, is sufficient evidence of their partiality as to all they relate concerning this expedition; since we cannot suppose, that a victorious army would, before their own eyes, have suffered such a depredation. The following night the admiral having sent to the land-troops, unknown to the besieged, five six-pounders, the English began their march, intending to batter the town in breach. The French officers were so vigilant, that they disposed themselves into small ambush-parties, so as not to be discovered by the English, all over the ground through which the latter were to pass. Thus the English in their march fell into one ambush, while they were thinking to escape another, three or four several times, and though they every where repulsed the French, yet the latter had so much the advantage over them in the bush-fighting manner, that they could do little execution, while the English fell in numbers. The French at last, as had been concerted, disposed their retreat so, that their several parties united behind a pallisadoed entrenchment, from which they made so dreadful a fire, that they stopped the march of the whole English army. The latter now brought up their field-pieces (for their cannon, with which they were to batter in breach, appeared to be no better) but they were soon silenced by a battery on the bank of the little river, which killed them so many men, that they began first to retreat, and then to fly. According to the French accounts, all the execution they did at the pallisadoed entrenchments, was to kill one ranger, and wound a savage; so very ill was the fire, both of their cannon and musketry, supplied. We are told, a likewise, that the reason why they betook themselves to flight, was, because hearing the found of the great bell of Quebec, they imagined that the governor and all his horse were coming upon them (E).

(D) The French fire carried away his flag, which some of the Canadians brought on shore; and it was hung up in the great church, where it remained, as a trophy, till the English took the place in the late war.

feated.*

DURING this engagement, the two English vessels that had not been disabled by the cannonade, renewed it, but with no effect, while the English troops at Beauport took the opportunity of a dark wet night to break up their camp, and to return to their long boats, most scandalously leaving behind them all their cannon, powder, and bullets. Their retreat was known early, by means of some savages, and the Canadians seizing the spoils, defended them against thirty three long-boats, who came to carry them off; but their crews durst not land, so terrible was the fire of the French. The honour of this action was due b to a private gentleman, one Carré, who commanded the militia of Beauport, Beaupré, and the isle of Orleans; and who behaved, on this occasion, as well as veteran regulars could have done. Frontenac, as a reward for their valour, presented them with two pieces of the cannon they had taken.

WE have already mentioned, that Frontenac had, by a savage, received intelligence, that a body of Indians was encamped upon lake St. Sacrament. According to Charlevoix b this was a body of 3000 English, Iroquois, and Mahingans, who were destined for the conquest of Montreal, while that of Quebec was attempting. As to the credibility of this expedition, it rests principally, if not wholly, upon the faith of the French themselves; for little or no mention of it is made in the English accounts. It is not, however, at all im- c probable, that such an expedition was planned, because it was evidently conducive to the main design of the English, and even according to the French themselves, the disappointment of it was owing not to them, but to natural causes. While the English and the Mahingans were marching to join the Iroquois, they were seized with the infection of the small-pox, a disease peculiarly dreadful to the savages; and they who recovered of it carried the marks of it upon their faces and bodies when they came to the place of rendezvous. The loathsome appearance they made rendered the Iroquois, who were before impatient, quite intolerable; and they reproached their allies with coming to poison them. In fact, about eight hundred of the Iroquois died of that distemper; upon which the army immediately d separated.

PHIPPS, or rather the English colonies, was greatly disconcerted at the miscarriage of so promising a plan of operations, by which Frontenac had, unexpectedly even to himself, been enabled to draw the whole force of New France to the defence of Quebec. We shall not here enter upon the ridiculous accounts and reflections of French memorialists, as if the English had carried along with them poisoned shirts, which they intended should become the prey of the French, and as if the separation of the army had been owing to the policy of the Iroquois, lest the English should become too powerful. The manner in which it is accounted for is natural; because it is well known that the plague in other countries does not do more speedy and dreadful execution than the small-pox does upon the natives e of North America. Phipps receiving the certainty of this event, gave over all thoughts of any farther attempt upon Quebec, and resolved entirely to raise the siege. The French are perhaps very moderate, when they say that the last three actions cost their enemies six hundred men; for the English themselves allow, that they lost upon the whole above 1000 of their bravest fellow-subjects, during the expedition. It is certain, that when they came to a resolution to raise the siege they had not a single cannon-ball left, and that they were for some days before obliged to charge with pieces of old iron and such materials. On the 23d two French captains, D'Orvillieres and Subercase threw themselves, with about one hundred men, into the isle of Orleans, as did another officer, one Vilieu, to prevent any descent from the English in the retreat of their fleet. On the 24th it came to an anchor, and mademoiselle de la Lande, who, with several other French persons of considera f tion of both sexes, remained prisoners in the hands of the English, proposed an exchange of prisoners; to which Phipps readily agreeing, she was sent for that purpose to Quebec, and the number of prisoners on both sides being pretty equal, the cartel was easily settled.

English.*

THUS ended this ill-concerted expedition, to the loss of national honour on the part of the English; nor indeed can it easily be pronounced, how far the people of New England were authorized by their government at home in the undertaking. It is at least certain,

^b CHARLEVOIX, vol. iii. p. 128.

(E) This is another inconsistency, which goes far to destroy the credit of the French relations of this siege in many circumstances, though they undoubtedly are but too true in the main, for if the very apprehension of being attacked by the governor-general produced such an effect, why did not the thing really happen?

a that the greatest part, if not the whole of the expence, fell upon the province of New England. The capital failure of the English seems to have consisted in their not being provided with proper pilots to supply their ignorance of the navigation of St. Laurence river, and with a sufficient store of cannon and ammunition. The English fleet in its return, in passing by the isle of Orleans, lost no fewer than nine ships for want of hands to navigate them; most of their crews being dead, and the whole fleet was, at the same time, in the most imminent danger of perishing. This miscarriage produced some advantageous propositions on the part of the government of New England to the Abenaguais, and the other French savages, which were rejected on their part, and served to encrease their contempt and hatred for the English. In the mean while, the messengers which Frontenac had sent out to apprise the ships he expected from Old France of the descent of the English, b had been so fortunate as to meet with them, and they had concealed themselves in the river Saguenay, till the English fleet passed them on its return homewards. When they appeared before Quebec, the joy of the inhabitants at seeing them was greatly damped, by their being unprovided of every thing; nor could they be supplied in a country which was itself equally distressed, as the fear of the savages had prevented the colony from either sowing or reaping. The governor-general knew no other way to remedy this evil, but by quartering the soldiers, who were newly arrived, upon the most wealthy inhabitants of the province, who received and entertained them with a cheerfulness which perhaps none but Frenchmen could express after the prodigious fatigues and dangers they had undergone during the preceding course of the campaign. This event of the deliverance of Quebec was c thought to be of such moment at the French court; that a medal was struck on the occasion by order of his most Christian majesty.

In March 1691 new deputies arrived at Quebec from the Abenaguais nations, who brought intelligence, that no more than four ships of all the English fleet, that had laid siege to that capital, had returned to Boston; many of them having gone in pursuit of the French fishing-vessels on the banks of Newfoundland. They likewise informed the governor-general of several fresh cruelties committed by the Onontagues against the French; and that their countrymen, with the Canibas, had so greatly harrassed the province of New England, that it was in as much distress for want of provision as that of New France was. d Great part of this information was afterwards found to be false, and Frontenac pretended, that the whole was a contrivance of the English to amuse him, while the Iroquois, the Agniers especially, were executing new barbarities against the French. In fact, a hundred and forty Agniers, together with some Dutch subjects of England, had invaded the Iroquois of St. Lewis fall; many of whom they killed, and carried others into captivity. Soon after, three deputies of the Agniers came to the same fall with those prisoners, but without arms, declaring that they came to beg peace from their father Onontbio; and to petition him for a piece of ground in the neighbourhood of the fall of St. Lewis, where they might settle near their brethren. They added, that eight hundred Iroquois had taken the field, and were ready to enter New France between Montreal and Trois Rivières, and that the English e had been the principal instigators and directors of all the barbarities committed by the savages upon the French. Frontenac did not fail to give advice of all this intelligence to Pontchartrain, who had succeeded Seignelay in his department, and represented that he thought it improper absolutely to reject the request of the Agniers, but that it would be highly for the honour and interest of the colony, if some attempt was made upon the English settlements, especially that of New York; which would take from the Iroquois all hopes of protection from the English. That Acadia ought immediately to be recovered, and three or four frigates sent to cruise every year between Cape Sable and the northernmost parts of the island of Newfoundland to secure to the French the absolute possession of the great bank, which would be of more value to their mother-country, than even f the conquest of the Indies, as it would bring in a revenue of above twenty millions of livres a-year.

In the mean while, the great body of the Iroquois, that had been mentioned by the Agnier deputies, to the number of a thousand, appeared, about the beginning of May, near Montreal, and fixed their head-quarters towards the mouth of the river Outaouais. From thence, they sent two detachments, one of six score men northwards, and another of two hundred towards the south. The former attacked Point Tremble, in the isle of Montreal, where they burnt about thirty houses, and took some inhabitants, whom they treated with the greatest inhumanity. The second detachment had in it twenty English with some Makingans; and surprized twelve savages at the fall of St. Lewis, between g Chambly and Magdalen's Meadow. Next day, however, the Agniers, who were of the party, carried back the prisoners to their own habitations, and declared that their chief intention was to treat of peace. It was discovered, that their real design was to debauch the inhabitants of St. Lewis fall, in which they did not succeed: A party of eighty, at the

the same time, made an irruption upon the christian Iroquois of the highlands; of whom they carried off about thirty-five women and children. The remaining savages spread themselves in small parties from Repentigny to the isles of Richelieu, where they laid waste all the open country, meeting with no resistance; the French finding it impossible to keep the field for want of subsistence.

Differences between the French governor and the jesuits.

At last, Vaudreuil, at the head of about a hundred or a hundred and twenty soldiers, went from house to house to collect provisions; and, having got as much as was sufficient to subsist them for some days, they joined la Mine, another officer, who had taken the field, and discovered a party of the Onneyouths, who lay at St. Sulpice. Vaudreuil immediately resolved upon attacking them, and surprized fifteen, whom they cut in pieces; the savages not dreaming that the French were in the field. The natives, who were in a lone house, being alarmed with the cries of the dying and wounded, defended themselves so vigorously, that they killed Bienville, a French officer of note; and they must have made their party good, though they were no more in number than twelve, had not Vaudreuil set fire to the house, which obliged the savages to quit it, all of whom were killed, or most inhumanly sacrificed by the French in the flames. Amongst the officers who distinguished themselves on this occasion, was the chevalier de Crisafy, who, with his brother the marquis of the same name, was a Sicilian, and having unsuccessfully endeavoured to raise a rebellion in that island, against the king of Spain, in favour of the French king, they were obliged to fly to his protection; but he gave them no other reward for their treason, than each of them a company in Canada, where they behaved with great courage and fidelity to the interest they espoused. Before the action, in which Bienville lost his life, he had, at the head of two hundred picked men, partly French, and partly French Iroquois, surprized a party, to the number of sixty, of Goyogouins and Agniers. While the savages were on the point of surrendering, the Agniers demanded a conference with the Iroquois of St. Lewis fall, who obstinately persisted in agreeing to the same. The Agniers professed a great desire of peace, and promised to send deputies to Montreal, to treat concerning it with Callieres. Their word was taken, and both they and the Goyogouins were suffered to escape. This complaisance of the savages of St. Lewis fall towards their enemies gave great umbrage to Frontenac, who complained to the French ministry of an underhand management between the savages of the fall and the Agniers, many of whom were relations to the others; not without some very severe reflections against the jesuit missionaries, who, he said, were more employed in making the savages christians, than in making them Frenchmen. The jesuits, on the other hand, seem to have recriminated on the governor-general, for they insisted that to make a savage a Frenchman, was to lose him to the community; a manner of arguing which none but interested jesuits could have made use of.

Conspiracy of the savages against the French.

THE Onnontague canton, on pretence of deploring the death of St. Helene, son to le Moyne, whose family they had adopted, sent him a belt of wampum, together with two female mountaineers, who had been for some time prisoners in their canton. Those women were intrusted with two belts of wampum, one of which they were secretly to give to one of the principal inhabitants of the villages of the mountain; and the other to Lewis Atherihata, who had the honour to be godson to his most Christian majesty, and was the principal inhabitant of the fall of St. Lewis. The intention of those belts was to invite them to return, with as many of their friends and relations as they could bring with them, to their mother-country, that they might avoid being involved in the general massacre that was intended against all the French. The belts were accordingly delivered; but the savages, to whom they were intrusted, carried them directly to Callieres, the governor of Montreal, to whom they swore an inviolable fidelity. He understood, at the same time, from the two female savages, who had brought the belts, that a large body of the Iroquois had taken post upon the river Outaouais, at a place called the Long Fall; where they proposed to murder all the French who were going to or returning from Michillimakinac, and then to fall upon the out-settlements. By this time, Vaudreuil, having intelligence of this conspiracy, had raised some troops to attack the savages at Long Fall; but the latter, either perceiving that their designs were discovered, or being in danger of having their own country destroyed by the French savages, broke up their camp. This was a lucky incident for the inhabitants of New France, and was greatly owing to the attachment of the Outaouais and Hurons, who remained in arms during the whole winter, and were perpetually harrassing the Onnontague and the other Iroquois. Early in the spring, two French officers, Courtemanche and Repentigny, after a most amazing journey through almost all the Iroquois, who lay round Montreal, reached Michillimakinac with ten men, and carried to the savages of that post the news of the miscarriage of the English fleet before Quebec. This account, which no doubt received some embellishments from the delivery, gave vast spirit to the French savages there, and Courtemanche was ordered to take a take upon him the command of the Miamis, and to make head against the incursions of the Iroquois.

On the 1st of July, the inhabitants of Quebec were overjoyed at the accounts they received by a small French ship of a large armament, consisting of fourteen vessels of different burthens, bound to Canada from Old France, and which soon after arrived under the command of M. du Tast. This fleet had been fitted out chiefly at the expence of the French northern company, and its real destination was to retake port Nelson upon Hudson's Bay from the English. Nothing followed the arrival of this great armament but a delay, under pretence that the season was too far advanced to undertake any thing in those seas. The true reason was, that the northern company was to reap almost the whole of the profits, and part of the glory of the expedition; which Iberville, who commanded for them, foresaw would infallibly render it unsuccessful. The royal orders were directed to Frontenac, who found them so peremptory, that he immediately called a meeting of all who had any interest in the northern company, or any knowledge of those seas; and du Tast gave his opinion against attempting any thing farther that season; nor did Frontenac and Champigny, the intendant, think proper to contradict him. That du Tast might not seem to decline the expedition through indolence, he undertook to clear the river St. Laurence of a vast number of English privateers, who ruined the French trade there.

Reinforcements arrive at Quebec.

In the mean while, Phipps was so earnest in soliciting at the court of England to be put at the head of a new armament against Quebec, that the French government of Canada took the alarm; and the preparations amongst the English colonists were so great, that had not Phipps lost all his credit by his late miscarriage, they probably would have been successful. In the province of New York alone, five hundred men were raised, of whom a hundred and eighty were English, and the rest Agniers and Mahingans, and prepared to attack Montreal. Callieres, who still commanded there, discovering their intention, assembled seven or eight hundred men at Magdalen's Meadow; and, by sending out parties, he soon discovered that the true intention of the English was to attack fort Chambly, which Callieres immediately reinforced with two hundred men, under Valrenes. The orders of the latter were to watch the motions of the English, and actually to enter the fort, if it should be attacked; but if the enemy should pass onwards, to follow them and to fall upon their rear, while he himself was to attack them in front. This party was followed by a large body of savages, and other inhabitants, who likewise took post near Chambly, under an officer called Le Bert du Chefne. Amongst the French savages were three chiefs of great reputation: the first was Oureoubaré, whom we have already mentioned, and who commanded the Hurons of Loretto; the next was one Paul, who was at the head of the Iroquois of St. Lewis fall; and the third was one la Routine, an Algonquin leader. After encamping for three days on Magdalen's Mead, the badness of the weather forced them to take shelter in the fort, where Callieres was in person, but confined to his bed by a fever. This happened about the 11th of August; and, in a day or two after, the enemy surprised a French party, posted at a mill, from which they drove the militia with some loss; and took possession of it. This alarmed St. Cyrque, who commanded there during the disposition of Callieres; and, ignorant that the post was in the possession of the enemy, advancing too unguardedly, he and some other officers were killed; but another detachment of the French coming up, the English were obliged to retreat, which they did in good order, after performing considerable execution upon the French and their allies. The Iroquois, in their retreat towards the wood, were harassed by a French party under one Domergue, whom they drew on so artfully, that they fell into an ambuscade, and were all cut in pieces. This success gave such encouragement to the Iroquois, that they returned to the charge, but were encountered by Valrenes, who was likewise on the point of being defeated, had he not entrenched himself behind some large trees that had been felled, which gave him time to make such dispositions, as to charge the English party, who fought with inconceivable resolution, but could not maintain the advantages they had gained. Upon the whole, it appears by the relation of the French themselves, that they had no cause to boast of any victory; for the English and their allies retreated without molestation, after killing sixty French, and wounding as many. Amongst the killed was Le Bert du Chefne, and Paul the Iroquois chief of St. Lewis fall. The French accounts pretend that in this action the English party had six score killed, and as many wounded. It cannot, after all, be denied, that the French were the greatest gainers, as the retreat of the English and their savages gave them an opportunity of getting in their harvest, and thereby being relieved from a most dismal situation.

The war continues between the French and English.

Advantages of the French.

FRONTENAC, on the first news of the English invasion, repaired to Montreal, where he heard of the enemy's being repulied; upon which he returned to Quebec. Soon after, he received letters from the governor of New England, demanding the prisoners, which

Actions of Ourcouharé.

the French savages had made, to be restored; and proposing a neutrality between the subjects of the two crowns in North America. While Frontenac was deliberating upon an answer to those propositions, he received a memorial from the baron St. Cassin, who was settled in the Abenaguais country, and had even married a woman of that nation, informing him that the proposition made by the English for the exchange of prisoners was only made with a view to debauch the Abenaguais from the French interest, and to prevail with them to discontinue their inroads upon the English. Frontenac, on this, made answer to the English governor, that, as soon as the chevalier d'Eau and Mannerwal were released from their captivity, he would enter into treaty, but not before. At the same time, he represented to Pontchartrain, how easy it was to make a conquest of New York, on account of the differences between the Dutch and English inhabitants there. The answer to this representation was, as usual, that his most Christian majesty could spare no troops out of Europe; and that all he proposed was to preserve New France from being conquered by the English, as the multiplicity of his wars in Europe did not admit of his acting upon the offensive.

The unsuccessful expedition of the French.

ALL this while, the French in Canada were so much harrassed by the Iroquois, that they were obliged to get in their harvest with arms in their hands. A body of those savages had made an inroad upon the river of the meadows, but were repulsed by Ourcouharé, who was, at that time, the great champion of the French amongst the savages. Soon after, he paid a visit to Frontenac at Quebec, where he was treated with so great distinction and presents, that he declared, though many nations offered to chuse him for their chief, that he was determined to dedicate the remaining part of his days to the service of his father Onontio. All that Frontenac had hitherto been able to do was to act on the defensive, and to defeat a few English and their savages in their attempts upon his government. According to Charlevoix^c, he now attempted to act upon the offensive, and sent five or six hundred men to invade the country of the Agniers, but without success; owing partly to the advanced season, and partly to the badness of the roads. At this time, Iberville arrived from Hudson's Bay, with two ships loaded with between 80 and 90,000 franks worth of beaver and other furs, which was some consolation to the colony under its late disappointment.

Port Royal repossessed by the French.

IBERVILLE, after staying some time at Quebec, sailed for France to quicken the preparations against Port Nelson, which he knew that court had greatly at heart. In the mean while, the Abenaguais continued to be very active against the English; and the French had taken two English gentlemen prisoners, who had been sent to Quebec, where they were entertained with great civility by Frontenac. By the same ship which took them, the chevalier Villebon arrived in New France, having been named governor of Acadia, the conquest of which from the English he still represented as being very practicable. Pontchartrain, upon this representation, dispatched him in June, 1691, to New France, there to receive orders from Frontenac for the re-conquest of Port Royal, by means of the Abenaguais, whom he was to command, and who were to be disciplined by himself, and other French officers sent along with them, or to be named by the governor-general. Villebon arrived at Quebec in a ship called the African Sun, esteemed then to be the swiftest sailer of any in the world. The situation of Canada, with regard to the English, was such at this time, that Frontenac resolved to avail himself of the African Sun, which he detained till the 6th of September, when thinking he had nothing farther to fear from the English, he suffered Villebon to depart for Port Royal, which he did not reach before the 26th of November. There going on board his long-boat with fifty soldiers, and two engineers, he saw the English flag flying, but met with no Englishmen in the place, on which he pulled it down, and ordering the French flag to be hoisted in its stead, he summoned the inhabitants, and once more took possession of Acadia in the name of the king his master. One des Goutins, who acted as his commissary, took this opportunity of informing the assembly, that, when the place was taken by Phipps, he had buried 1300 livres in a certain spot, which being accordingly dug, the money, which belonged to the king, was found, and faithfully applied by the officer to the service of the public; an act of integrity, the remembrance of which afterwards procured his acquittal without trial, when a charge of malversation was brought against him.

New intelligence arrives at Montreal.

ABOUT the beginning of November, two female savages, who had escaped from the Iroquois, informed the governor of Montreal, that two parties of those savages, each consisting of three hundred and fifty, were in the field with an intent to surprize the fall of St. Lewis. The governor, upon this, reinforced that settlement with part of the troops he had at Montreal; and, with the remaining part, he strengthened the forts of the neighbourhood, and entrusted the charge of the town itself to the inhabitants. Some days

- a after, one of those parties appeared, but, finding that the settlement was on its guard, they retired after some sharp skirmishes had passed. The second party, which was composed of Agniers, Mabingans, and Onneyouths, appeared near lake Champlain, but understanding the disappointment of the first party, they advanced no farther; and all they did was to pick up some stragglers, which the precautions of the government could not keep from dispersing themselves in the fields. All the rest of this year passed in perpetual skirmishes between the French and their savages near the fall of St. Lewis on the one part, and the Iroquois on the other, which cost many lives, quarter being seldom given on either side. Early in the year 1692, Frontenac sent orders to Callieres to assemble a body of men, whom he was to march to the peninsula where the river of the Outaouais joins that of St. Lawrence; the common hunting-place of the Iroquois nations in the winter-time. Callieres accordingly assembled three hundred French and savages, and gave the command of them to d'Orvilliers, who, meeting with an accident on the road, was obliged to return to Montreal, but was succeeded in his command by one captain Beaucourt. This officer marched his men to the ile of Toniataka, where he met with fifty Tsonnontbouans, who had taken the field to surprize the French straggling settlements in those parts, and to prevent the settlers from sowing their lands. He immediately attacked them, killed twenty-five, took sixteen, and delivered one La Plante, a French officer, who had been a prisoner for three years amongst the savages, and who narrowly escaped being killed, his countrymen mistaking him for a native Iroquois. From the prisoners Beaucourt learned, that a hundred Tsonnontbouans were hunting at a place called the Fall of the Cauldron, upon the river Outaouais, where they intended to settle as soon as the snow was melted, and where they were to be joined by two hundred Ommontagueuse, under the command of one of their bravest leaders, called the Black Cauldron. He farther understood that they were to continue there during a whole summer, in order to intercept all the French passengers travelling to or from Michillimakinac. Callieres sent notice of this information to Frontenac, demanding his instructions how to behave, as he himself could spare no more men; and large cargoes of furs, which required escorts, were daily expected from the west and the north. Frontenac ordered him to send to Michillimakinac forty Canadians, under the command of an officer, one Michel, escorted by three well-armed canoes, who were to attend him above the fall of the Cauldron. This order was obeyed, and the escort that had convoyed the Canadians to the place of its destination returned. A few days after, Michel discovered some footsteps of savages, and two Iroquois, which made him apprehend that the Black Cauldron and his party could not be far off; upon which he returned to Montreal.

Instructions of Frontenac to Callieres.

- FRONTENAC* happened to be there at this time, and commanded Michel immediately to resume his march at the head of thirty French and thirty savages. At the same time, he dispatched one Tilly, another officer, by the Hare river, which discharges itself into that of the Outaouais, five leagues below the fall of the Cauldron; and gave him a duplicate of the order which Michel was carrying to Louvigny at Michillimakinac. When Michel came to a place called the carrying place of the Cats, he again saw the two Iroquois scouts, and a great number of canoes in the water; upon which he returned once more to Montreal, where sixty French savages three days after arrived with their cargoes of furs, and brought word that they met Tilly past all danger. The savages, having disposed of their furs, demanded an escort back to a certain place, where they were to separate. Michel offered to accompany them; and an escort, consisting of thirty men, was accordingly appointed. When they arrived at the Long Fall on the river St. Laurence, where they met with a carrying-place, they received a smart discharge of musketry, without perceiving from whom it came, which made all the savages disappear, and killed and wounded a great many of the French; upon which the savages rushing from their ambuscade, fell with the utmost fury upon the few survivors. Michel, La Gemberaye, and the Hertels, two ensigns, who were brothers, defended themselves with great valour, and would have fought their way thro' the Iroquois, had they not been abandoned by their own savages, by which Michel, and the two Hertels, were taken prisoners; but Gemberaye and some soldiers escaped to Montreal in their canoes.

Michel sent to
kinac.

- AFTER this, the Iroquois continued for some time quiet, and Frontenac, who every day expected a reinforcement of troops from Old France, returned to Quebec. But on the 15th of June, the Black Cauldron, all of a sudden, made a descent upon Montreal at Chefnaye; from whence he carried off fourteen French and some savages. Callieres immediately sent out against him a hundred soldiers, under the command of captain Du Plessys Faber, who was supported by Vaudreuil, at the head of two hundred more. The savages, perceiving themselves attacked by so superior a force, fired with precipitation into the woods, leaving their canoes and baggage in possession of the French; who, not offering to pursue them, gave them an opportunity of making new canoes, in which they fell again down the river St. Laurence. But soon after, Vaudreuil, having called in all the scouting parties, followed them with so much quickness, that he came up with their rear, of whom he killed some, and retook several prisoners. Some days after, Lusignan, a French captain, was surprized and killed near the isles of Richelieu by the savages; but the party he commanded was, with great difficulty, brought off by his lieutenant. All those, and many other, tragical events convinced Frontenac, that the inhabitants of Montreal were to expect no safety against the savages, but by being supported with a superior power. He, therefore, in the beginning of August, returned to Montreal with three hundred men, to protect the inhabitants in getting in their harvest. He there found two hundred Outaouais, whom hunger had driven thither, notwithstanding all the dangers they ran from the Black Cauldron, whom they understood to be still in the river. Though those Outaouais had not ventured to bring along with them any furs or skins, yet Frontenac treated them with great civilities, and proposed to them an expedition against their common enemy the Iroquois. The Outaouais declined this expedition, either because they thought it was dangerous, or because they had no opportunity of consulting their elders upon the proposal. Soon after, Frontenac, understanding that the French ships were arrived at Quebec, returned thither, where the chevalier d'Eau arrived about the same time.

Affairs of
land;

THE war was, all this while, going on between the English and French in Acadia, and Frontenac had undoubted intelligence, that Sir William Phipps was again preparing to attack New France. Having imparted this advice, with the proofs on which it was founded, to his court, orders were given to send a squadron of ships into the river St. Laurence, which was to serve two purposes: the first, to fight the English fleet, if they should enter that river; and the next was to retake all the posts that were held by the English in Newfoundland. The command of this squadron was given to the chevalier du Palais, who sailed directly to Spanish Bay; from whence he dispatched a vessel to look into the mouth of the river St. Laurence, and to return to him if any English ships were discovered. This ship, after cruising a long time in the gulph, and at the mouth of the river, without seeing any English vessels, sailed back for Spanish Bay; but by stress of weather was disabled from rejoining the French squadron, and was obliged to return to France. Du Palais, all this time, remained in Spanish Bay, waiting for the return of his ship; but, being disappointed, he lost the season of acting, and of executing the orders of his court; so that the English squadron, which was far inferior to his, escaped him.

English are unsuccessful,

THE fleet of French merchant-men, who were fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, being ready to return to France, Brouillan, who was then the French governor of Placentia, received advice on the 14th of September, that a French squadron was anchored within five miles of that port; and next morning the same squadron was seen at an anchor in Placentia road, but without the reach of cannon. On this the governor immediately dispatched the baron La Hontan (F), who was then a reformed captain, and had been sent from Quebec to act as the French king's lieutenant at Placentia. He took post, with sixty men, at the place where it was most probable the English would attempt their landing, in order to get possession of an eminence which commanded the batteries of the fort. The latter, however, did nothing all that day but sound in the road. On the 17th of September, the English manned all their long-boats in order to land; but discovering La Hontan, they altered their course, and landed at another place, where they set fire to some wood, hoping to shelter themselves by the smoke, while they reconnoitred the fort. Brouillan, in the mean while, erected a battery of four pieces of cannon upon the eminence we have mentioned, and another at the entry of the basin, across which a boom was drawn. About noon that same day, the governor discovered a boat with a flag of truce, and a serjeant was sent out, who brought the officer who carried it blindfolded into the fort; where he informed the governor, that he came from Mr. Williams, who was the English commodore, with his compliments, and to beg he would send an officer on board his ship, to whom he would explain his intentions, and treat with him concerning the release of certain French seamen, who were prisoners on board the English fleet. The governor agreed to this request, and sent La Hontan, and another officer, one Pastour, to confer with the commodore; and, in the mean while, the officer, who carried the flag of truce, summoned the governor, in the names of king William and queen Mary, to surrender the place, and all that the French had in the bay; which was refused in resolute terms.

WHEN La Hontan and Pastour returned, they reported that the English squadron consisted of the St. Albans, a sixty gun ship; of two others, the Plymouth, and a galley of

- a pretty much the same force; of a frigate, and a twenty gun ship; but their opinion was, by the manner of working this squadron, it was but indifferently furnished with men. Next day, the English found that, instead of one, they had three forts to take; and soon after the cannonading began, which, for some time, was very brisk; but the governor at last saw the commodore draw out of the line, though the French at that time were reduced to their last charge of powder and shot, and were obliged to return the English balls, which they picked up. All this while, the French merchant-ships furnished hands for the defence of the batteries and the fort, and were of prodigious service in repairing the breaches made by the English artillery; but, towards the evening of the 19th, the English ships, which still continued the cannonading, drew off, which was occasioned by a kind of mutiny in the squadron, on account, probably, of the bad conduct of their commanders, which obliged the latter, at last, entirely to abandon the attempt. All that the English then could do was to fall upon Point Verte, lying at the entrance of Placentia road, where the French could not prevent their burning some houses, or rather cabins. In this expedition, it is hard to say which nation was guilty of the most gross mismanagement; the English, in attacking a place without knowing its strength, or the French, whose ships lay idle in Spanish Bay, though greatly superior to the English, who thereby escaped them. and retreat.

- THE operations on the other coasts of New France were pretty much of the same nature. Phipps still persisted in his resolution, if possible, to attack Quebec; while Villebon, the French commandant in Acadia, fortified himself at Fort St. John, till he could be enabled, by succours sent him from Old France, to retake Port Royal. In order to dislodge him, an English ship of forty-eight guns and two brigantines, the whole having four hundred men on board, was sent out by Phipps. Villebon marched down a party of the French and savages, which made so good an appearance, that the English durst not venture to land, and made off towards fort Pemmaquid. Villebon represented to Frontenac the necessity of demolishing this fort, which was an incessant thorn in the side of the French interest towards New England. By this time, Iberville, who had a commission from the French court to dispossess the English of Port Nelson on Hudson's Bay, was arrived at Quebec in the Envioux, a French ship of war, and he was there to be joined by the Poli, another, with two other vessels that were to be furnished by the northern company. As Iberville did not arrive at Quebec before the 18th of October, when it was too late in the year to make any attempt upon Hudson's Bay, Frontenac proposed that he should employ his squadron, which was commanded by one Bonaventure, against fort Pemmaquid. The proposal was readily accepted of, and it was agreed, that the two royal ships should attack the fort by sea, while Villebon should besiege it by land, at the head of his savages. When the ships arrived before the fort, they discovered, at a distance, an English ship of war at anchor under its cannon. The French ships, having no coasting pilot on board, did not think proper to make any attempt upon the fort, and returned to the vast discontent of the savages, who had assembled in great numbers, and were in high expectation of becoming masters of the fort. It was afterwards discovered that Iberville, who, in other respects, was an excellent officer, had trusted too much to surprizing the fort; and that an English gentleman, one Nelson, who was then prisoner at Quebec, had bribed two French soldiers, who gave intelligence to the English at Pemmaquid, and who were therefore on their guard, which had induced Iberville to abandon his enterprize. unsuccessful.

- NEW FRANCE is said to have been at this time in a more desirable situation, through the activity of Frontenac, than it had been for some years before; but he was accused of great defects in his government. He threw too great a share of the war upon the trading inhabitants, to the ruin of commerce, while the officers and soldiers lived too much at their ease. He is said to have still been more blameable by indulging the savages in the use of spirituous liquors; but this last charge against him was perhaps chiefly owing to the jesuits, who wanted to monopolize that trade, and could not endure that the civil power should give the natives any indulgence, without their consent, participation, and even allowance. We accordingly find, that they filled the court of France, by means of their friends there, with charges on that account against Frontenac, whom they accused of all the robberies and murders that happened in consequence of the savages getting drunk. In the mean while, Frontenac began to more than suspect that the enterprize against fort Pemmaquid had been defeated by Nelson's practices; and that the frequent desertions, which every day happened, were owing to the same cause. All the governor's representations had produced no effectual succours from France; and there was reason to believe that the English were now but too well acquainted with the weakness of the French colony. He endeavoured, but in vain, to put a stop to the desertions; and, in a short time, intelligence came that eight hundred Iroquois were in motion on the borders of New York, to attack Canada. Those savages divided themselves into two parties. The one marched marched by lake Champlain; the other by lake François, intending to join near the fall of St. Lewis, where they were to entrench themselves, to decoy all the inhabitants they could into their hands, and then to murder them. This news threw Frontenac into great disquietudes, as he was uncertain on what quarter the storm might burst, and therefore it was dangerous for him to act upon the offensive. All he could do was, by the advice of Callicres, to reinforce the marquis de Crisafy, who continued to command at the fall of St. Lewis, together with the forts Chambly and Scrcl, and to issue strict orders for all the officers and the inhabitants to keep themselves in readiness, without abandoning either their houses or their posts. The Iroquois, who marched by lake François, appearing in sight of the settlement at the fall of St. Lewis, finding the inhabitants on their guard, did no more than exchange a few shot with them, and retired in the evening. The other party, which marched by the way of lake Champlain, left behind them, in an island there, three hundred men, ready to have fallen upon the same settlement, had they seen an opportunity: but the second party, who appeared in view, doing no more than the first, retired likewise; and the savages, in general, perceiving the settlers at the fall of St. Lewis to be upon their guard, gave over all thoughts of their enterprize, and returned home.

Expedition
against the Agniers

THE governor-general of New France attributed all the malignancy of this last attempt to the canton of the Agniers, and therefore resolved to be revenged. For this purpose, he sent two hundred Canadians, with a body of Abenaguais, Algonquins, and Sokokis, to Montreal, where they were to be joined by a hundred more Canadians, a hundred regulars, and a number of Iroquois of the fall and the highlands; the whole to form a body under Callicres, and to make a brisk irruption into the Agnier canton. Callicres entrusted the execution of this expedition, which was composed of six hundred men, to three lieutenants, Mantet, Courtemanche, and la Neuë; and, on the fifth of January, all the army embarked at Montreal. The orders given on this occasion plainly prove the French to have been the converts of the savages, and to have even exceeded them in the practices of inhumanity. They barbarously resolved upon the utter extinction of the Agnier canton, and being habitually, as well as naturally, presumptuous, they thought themselves so secure of this blow, that the general orders were not to spare any male capable of bearing arms, but to put every one of them to the sword, and to carry off all the women and children captives to people the French Indian settlements. The barbarity of those orders is the more remarkable, as the canton, thus doomed to massacre, had hitherto done nothing to provoke the French, but in following that natural affection which is so deeply implanted in the breasts of those barbarians, and endeavouring to regain to their ancient settlements their countrymen who were settled at the fall of St. Lewis.

THE French army reached the Agnier canton without being discovered, on the sixth of February. They found the savages living in three townships, each defended with a kind of fort. La Neuë, with little or no resistance, attacked and destroyed the first, and all the provisions in it, while Mantet and Courtemanche did the same by the second; but the general's orders were not observed, for many prisoners were made, and committed to the custody of Courtemanche. The third fort gave them some trouble. Forty Agniers were preparing to march out of it to join a party of the English; and when la Neuë and Mantet attacked it, the savages, though they had heard nothing of the destruction of the other two forts, and therefore were unprovided for a defence, fought very bravely; but, after losing twenty men and some women, two hundred and fifty of them were taken prisoners. So many prisoners being made in contravention of the French governor's orders, was owing to the natural affection we have just now mentioned of the savages for their countrymen, and is a farther proof of the detestable barbarity of the French: for though the Christian Iroquois of the fall of St. Lewis, and the other French Indian settlements, had promised the French governor to obey his inhuman orders, yet when they came to be executed, they could not resist their feelings for their countrymen, and even obliged the French to save their male prisoners. This compassion is, at the same time, an evidence, that nothing but force, enthusiasm, and the arts of the jesuits, could have again prevented their incorporating themselves in their native cantons.

proves unfortunate in the end.

AFTER finishing their ravages amongst the Agniers, perceiving that they had saved only provisions barely sufficient for carrying them back to Montreal, and understanding that their enemies were in pursuit of them, they were returning as fast as they could, when their savages of the fall of St. Lewis obliged them to throw up an intrenchment, and to wait for their pursuers for two days. The latter, at last, appeared, and proved to be Onneyouths. A smart encounter followed with some loss on both parties; and the Onneyouths, who seem to have known their business much better than the French did, retreated, while their enemies continued their march. The Onneyouths followed them in sight, and obliged the French to keep in a body; but scarcity of provision and badness of roads every day increasing, a increasing, they were forced to separate; by which means all their prisoners but sixty-four escaped, and the few remains of this victorious army, at last, reached Montreal in a most deplorable condition, with a fresh alarm, which they had caught from their prisoners, of a new expedition, even stronger than the last, designed by the English against Quebec both by sea and land. This news was confirmed to Frontenac by Iberville, who commanded in Acadia, and by some French, who had escaped from the English. The latter even went so far as to say, that the English governors of North America had held a congress amongst themselves, and were resolved to raise 10,000 men, who were to rendezvous at Boston; and that 6000 of them were to be employed against Quebec. Neither Frontenac nor Callieres in the least doubted the truth of this intelligence; and the forts Chambly and Sorel were immediately repaired; and all dispositions were made, both at Quebec and Montreal, for rendering the descent of the English ineffectual.

THOSE dispositions required so many men to execute them, that Frontenac could spare none for escorting a large magazine of furs, that were laid up at Michillimakinac, and which, if brought down to St. Laurence river, might be of infinite service to the colony. At last, D'Argenteuil, a reformed lieutenant, and brother to Mantet, undertook the dangerous journey, and eighteen Canadians were with great difficulty persuaded to attend him; while another officer with twenty men, and a party of Iroquois Christians, were ordered to escort them past the most dangerous part of the way. The instructions, which, on this occasion, were sent to Louvigny at Michillimakinac, were, that he should send to Montreal and Quebec all the French but those who were necessary for guarding his most important posts. D'Argenteuil performed his journey; but Valtrie, the officer who commanded the escort, in his return, was defeated and killed by a party of the Iroquois near Montreal. On the 10th of June, when such a visit was least expected, one Tareba, an Onneyouth captain, arrived at Montreal, attended by a Frenchman, who had been four years prisoner in that canton, and whom he proposed to exchange for a nephew of his own, who was in the hands of the French. Tareba, at the same time, presented Callieres with a letter of recommendation from Milet the missionary, who was still detained at Onneyouth. Callieres sent Tareba to the governor-general, who readily agreed to the exchange, and won so far upon the Onneyouth, that the latter presented him with belts from the most considerable families of the canton, in token of their being disposed for peace; but he counselled the governor of the same to be upon his guard, especially during the harvest season. In short, Tareba omitted nothing to convince Frontenac of his good disposition, and that of his nation towards the French. Frontenac's long experience had taught him how to deal with those savages; and he neither opened himself to Tareba, nor discouraged him from bringing on a negotiation, provided the cantons from whence he came would, before the end of September (after which time he would not wait) send him deputies; upon this Tareba, after promising to return by that time, took leave of the general.

A convoy from Michillimakinac.

A FEW days after, Frontenac received intelligence, that the English fleet had sailed from Boston; and Michel, who (the reader may remember) the year before had been taken prisoner by the savages, having made his escape to save himself from the flames, arrived at Quebec. He reported, that the English in the principal village of Onnontague, had erected a strong capacious fort for receiving all the women and children of the canton, in case they were surprized as that of Agnier had been by the French; that Tareba's intelligence might be true, but it was certain, that the Iroquois nation in general never was less disposed than they were, at that time, to live in friendship with them. While Michel was making this report, intelligence came, that eight hundred Iroquois had taken the field, and were advanced almost as far as lake St. Lewis. This happened on the 21st of June, when Vaudreuil, with five companies of regulars, and one hundred and fifty recruits, just arrived from France, was dispatched from Quebec; and Callieres went in person, at the head of seven or eight hundred men, towards the cascades of St. Lewis, where the savages were said to be assembled; but neither of the parties were able to discover any, they having decamped some time before. The accounts of the great preparations made at Boston by the English, were true; but a false place of destination had been industriously given out to amuse Frontenac. The armament was, in fact, designed against Martinico; but that expedition miscarrying, and three ships arriving from Old France at Quebec, the Iroquois, who had come to the Cascades of St. Lewis, and who appear to have had very good intelligence, not only returned home, but suffered the French to get in their harvest without molestation; and the colony for some time enjoyed tranquillity, to increase its good fortune. D'Argenteuil, on the 4th of August, brought from Michillimakinac to Montreal two hundred canoes laden with furs and skins, and the principal chiefs of the northern and western savages were likewise on board. As those chiefs were of Huron extraction, Frontenac immediately gave them a formal meeting at Montreal, attended by the leaders of his own savages. The Huron orator entertained him with a long detail of the exploits of his nation against the Iroquois and the enemies of France, and the other chiefs made him their compliments in the most respectful manner, but petitioned for the best prices that could be afforded for their commodities. The governor observing that no deputy was there from the Miamis, was informed that they had been gained over by the English; who had sent them presents by the Mabingans, and had opened a trade with them by the river St. Joseph. This account gave Frontenac no little disquiet, and he resolved, at all events, to break off the commerce. As he had a particular art in gaining over the savages, they returned home charmed with his manner of receiving and entertaining them; and soon after they were followed by a number of French headed by Tonti, who still commanded on the Illinois river, but happened, at that time, to be at Quebec. Tonti was attended by Courtemanche, Mantet, Perrot, D'Argenteuil, and other officers; and they had it in commission from the governor-general to break off, either by persuasion or force, all communication between the Miamis and the English. One le Sueur was charged with the care of making an establishment at Chagouamigon, and renewing the alliance with the Sieux, and the inhabitants of the Falls.

A savage lady comes to Quebec.

WHEN Frontenac was preparing to return to Montreal, he received intelligence that the English had made themselves masters of fort St. Anne, lying at the bottom of Hudson's Bay. We are not entirely to give credit to all that Charlevoix says concerning a noble defence made against one hundred English by three Frenchmen, which was all the garrison this fort had; and who, after all, made their escape to Quebec. It was very possible for three men, which indeed appears to have been the truth, to slip away in a canoe; and no doubt they magnified their own valour to the governor-general, whom they found at Quebec, greatly vexed that the French reinforcements had again come so late in the year, that he could make no attempt upon fort Nelson. He was, at this time, in no pain concerning any expedition of the English against his government, their fleet having returned in a most miserable condition from its unsuccessful expedition to Martinico. About the end of September, Tareba, according to his promise, returned to Quebec, attended by an Onneyouth female, whom the fame of count Frontenac had drawn to pay him a visit. This lady had been extremely kind to the French, particularly to father Milet, who were prisoners amongst the Onneyouths; and the Frenchman's vanity was highly pleased with her visit. Her having saved many of the French from the flames, gave her a particular title to his regard, and she was baptized by the name of Susan (G). The presence of this female contributed not a little to Frontenac's civil reception of Tareba, notwithstanding the odious proposals he brought from his canton. He threw upon the English all the blame of his countrymen not having sent their deputies, as the governor had desired; and he even proposed that the governor should send deputies to Orange, there to treat under the mediation of the English.

savages.

FRONTENAC, though nettled to the quick at those proposals, dissembled his indignation; and after making Tareba some presents, he dismissed him; but not without severely reproaching the insolence and treachery of his countrymen, whom he threatened speedily to chastize, if they did not soon make amends for their behaviour. By this time Tonti, and the other French officers, had brought the Illinois and the Miamis to make a brisk war upon the Iroquois; and Frontenac was not without hopes of still gaining over some of the Iroquois cantons, by means of his secret agents there. Oureoubaré, who had been so faithful to the French interest, and still continued so, though residing amongst the Iroquois Christians in the highlands, paid frequent visits to his countrymen, whom he endeavoured, all he could, to dispose in favour of the French. Garakontbie, though extremely old, resided still amongst the Onnontague, where he was yet in great authority; and it was owing to his services, that the English were disappointed in many plans they had formed with those savages for the destruction of the colony. Tegarifforens, likewise, was alive, and busy with his good offices to the French. Frontenac knew the dependence he could have upon those three chiefs, and very wisely, at this period of his government, he depended upon them, rather than his own arms, for baffling the efforts of the English. But all they could do could not effect an open breach between them in favour of the French. The latter and their allies continued still to be harrassed by the Iroquois incursions, and the English still found means to animate those savages by treating them well, and promising, from time to time, to fit out an armament that should be sufficient to destroy the colony (H). But whatever reproaches Charlevoix and other French writers may throw out against the English on this head, their own words furnish us with abundance of motives why the Iroquois

(G) She was living at the fall of St. Lewis, where Charlevoix saw, in 1708.

(H) Charlevoix, in this part of his history, is at great pains to represent the English as being much better politicians than their own countrymen will allow them to have been; for the conduct of the English towards those savages has been generally blamed, and that of the French recommended by the English writers upon American affairs.

a should prefer the friendship of the English to that of the French. As we have already seen in the history of New England, the savages residing there lived with comfort and in plenty, and provided with all the necessaries, and many of the conveniences of life, while the French savages were generally poor and despicable. Add to this, that the benefits the savages reaped from the English trade were much greater than those from the French; so great was the discouragement which the commerce of the latter laboured under from the taxes and imposts laid upon them.

NOTWITHSTANDING all this, it must be acknowledged that the French government was much better served than that of England was by their officers in North America. The governors and officers there, though of the military cast, were men of capacity and education, and thought their services abundantly rewarded, when they could promote what they called their master's glory; though it must be confessed, that they did not always do it by means that were either justifiable or humane. Even their natural vanity contributed to inspire their Christian savages with high ideas of the French name and nation; while the jesuits and missionaries were equally assiduous in fettering their minds with superstition and ignorance. Frontenac was sensible where the weak part of his government lay. He knew the small proportion of property which the French colonists enjoyed, compared to those of the English, and the superior industry of the latter over his countrymen and the Canadians. He endeavoured to repair all those disadvantages by his address and management. The agents he entertained, even amongst the English Iroquois, every day were making propositions of peace, which were sent to him, and which he encouraged or rejected, as he saw proper; but, upon the main, he seldom failed to retrieve some French prisoners out of their hands, and, what was still more important, to gain time; by which the subjects of his government had leisure to sow their fields, and to get in their harvests. Above all, he always obtained a great point, when an Iroquois deputy was admitted to his presence, so artful he was at assimilating himself to their manners.

Reflections on the government of France and England in North America.

It was now the beginning of the year 1694, when two *Onnontague*se came from their canton to Montreal to know from Callieres whether their deputies, who, they said, were upon the road to treat of peace, would be well received by their father Onnonthio. Callieres promised that they should have a hearing, but seemed to doubt much whether they would arrive, upon which the two *Onnontague*se returned, and nothing was heard from their canton for two months, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of Callieres to gain intelligence as to their true motives of acting. On the 23d of March following two Agniers came to Montreal; and in the name of Teganifforens, who was to have been the head of the deputation, threw all the blame of its retardment upon the English. Frontenac pretended that he had reason to distrust those Agniers; that he had been informed by the savages of Acadia that their intention was to draw both him and Callieres to a conference near Montreal, to which they were to repair in great numbers; and having there assassinated them both, to call in their countrymen, who were to be ambushed at hand, and after destroying the colony to put the place in the possession of the English. Nothing could be more ridiculous than those pretexts; but they were treated by Frontenac as realities, and he affected to be greatly upon his guard. In May, Teganifforens, attended by eight deputies, arrived at Quebec; and as the French inhabitants were then sowing their lands, Frontenac gave them a civil, but a very solemn, reception. Great compliments on both parts passed in public and in private; Teganifforens presented the governor-general with belts of friendship from Garakonthie. Though Frontenac was entirely convinced of this chief's good intentions towards the French, yet he knew that neither he nor Teganifforens were in the secret of such of their countrymen as were in concert with the English; but he received Garakonthie's belts with great acknowledgments of friendship, and made handsome presents both to him and Teganifforens. He then found means to prolong the abode of the deputies at Quebec, till the inhabitants had finished their seed-time. Mean while, the Iroquois laboured to persuade the eastern and western savages, who were the allies of the French towards Michillimakinac, that the French were betraying them, and wanted to sacrifice them to their own interests. This alarmed Louigny, the French governor in those parts; but all he could effect was, to bring those savages to send deputies to Quebec, where they arrived two days after the departure of the Iroquois deputies. Frontenac, understanding the purport of their commission, dispatched an express after Teganifforens, which instantly brought him back; and he dealt so effectually with the deputies, that they became fully sensible of the practices of the Iroquois against the French.

A. D. 1694:

Negotiation with the Onnontaguese.

FRONTENAC, all this while, had greatly at heart the re-establishment of his fort at Cataracouy; and being encouraged to it by Teganifforens, he directly fitted out a large convoy, which was to carry a garrison, workmen, and all kinds of necessaries for re-establishing that post, which he said was the bulwark of the colony against the savages. The command of the operations was at first bestowed upon the chevalier de Crisafy; but he

he was laid aside upon the arrival at Montreal, where Frontenac then was, of Sesigny, brother to Iberville, who brought a commission from court, authorizing him and his brother to superintend the rebuilding of that fort. As the business could admit of no delay, Sesigny proceeded to Cataracouy with the convoy that had been appointed for Crisafy, with six score Canadians, and some savages of St. Lewis's fall. Soon after two Frenchmen, who had been prisoners in the canton of Onnontague, arrived at Montreal, and informed Frontenac that he could expect no peace with the Iroquois. He gave no credit to this intelligence, because those savages had suffered a large convoy of furs, under the conduct of Louvigny himself, to pass unmolested to Montreal; and fifteen days after, Oureoubaré arrived with thirteen French prisoners, amongst whom were the two Hertels, who had been taken two years before, and were thought to be dead. No other deputies attended Oureoubaré but those of Goyogouin and Tsonmonthouan; but Frontenac ordered the chiefs of the other savages to be present at their audience, in which Oureoubaré gave him the strongest assurances of the attachment of his countrymen to the interests of the French, and presented him with belts, as evidences of what he asserted; offering, at the same time, to enter into an immediate negotiation for a peace. Frontenac demanded whether he had authority to comprehend all the other Iroquois nations in the treaty. The deputies were not a little confounded at this question; but, after various evasions, Frontenac declared, that he would send back all the belts he had received, excepting those sent by their own two cantons, unless he had a satisfactory answer to all that he had concerted with Teganissorens, and that he was prepared instantly to enter upon action. He then entertained the deputies in his usual affable manner, and endeavoured to persuade those from Goyogouin and Onnontague that he wished for peace, but rather upon their account than his own, as they were his children, and he was sorry to be obliged to chastise them. Dismissing them for that time, he re-assembled them, and testified his displeasure at the intercourse between the Iroquois cantons and the English, threatening to renew the war with more vigour than ever. Upon this the deputies, with an art which perhaps was taught them by the French themselves, endeavoured to render him distrustful of his allies, who had given him wrong impressions of their countrymen; but he assured them he never would depart from befriending and trusting them. Some high words then happened between the Iroquois and the Hurons who were in company, which requiring the interposition of the governor-general, he imposed silence on both parties, but not without some threats against the Iroquois, in case they should continue longer refractory: after this, he made presents to all the assembly, and dismissed them. Towards the end of October, father Milet, after remaining five years in a most disagreeable state of captivity amongst the Onneyouths, arrived at Montreal, as in a few days after did Tareba with deputies from the same canton, whom Frontenac threatened to treat as spies; but seemed to be afterwards somewhat mollified in their favour upon the representations of father Milet, to whom Tareba had done essential services. Perhaps Frontenac's true motive in this was to prolong the repose of the colony. In fact, he could not have chastized the Onneyouths without declaring war against all the Iroquois who were in alliance with the English, and whom he had not forces sufficient to reduce.

Weakness of the government of New France.

It is surprising, that, notwithstanding the expence which the government of New France had cost to its mother-country, all the force which Frontenac could muster up this year, did not amount to above 2000 men, even including the militia and the French savages. This was a number in no respect comparable to the force which the English and the Iroquois could have brought into the field; so that Frontenac acted with wonderful address in still keeping the savages in awe, and yet amusing them so as to prevent their bringing into the field any great bodies of men, the consequence of which must have been fatal to the colony. As to the English, he was at this time in no great apprehension of an invasion from them. He knew that their fleet at Boston was in too bad a condition to undertake any naval expedition, and that they could do nothing at land but by the assistance of the Iroquois. Very different was the character (as we have already hinted) of Sir William Phipps, who remained still governor of New England. He could do nothing but by the mere dint of power, of which he made put a poor use. It is true, after building the fort of Pemmaquid, some of the Abenauais had formally submitted themselves to the crown of England; but their submission neither was sincere, nor were the tribes, who submitted, of any great importance. Charlevoix ^d is, perhaps with some reason, of opinion, that even this partial submission could not have taken place, had not the government of New France depended so much on the affection of those savages, as to leave them unprotected; and many of their countrymen being prisoners at Boston, their deliverance was a strong motive for the submission of the others. The same author says, that this submission was not near so formal or absolute as we have, upon the authority

^d CHARLEVOIX, vol. iii. p. 211.

- a authority of English writers, represented it. But though we are inclined to believe him in some particulars not given by the English accounts, it seems pretty certain, that the treaty we have mentioned in the history of New England, was actually concluded, and that the breach of it was owing to the treachery of the French. According to him, while Sir William Phipps was at fort Pemmaquid, to put the last hand to the peace, a French officer, Villieu, and Thury, a missionary in those parts, found means to bring over to the French interest Mataouando, the head of the Malecite savages, who was to have been a party in the treaty, and raised a body of two hundred and fifty savages near Pemmaquid and upon the river St. John. Villieu, soon after, was joined by other Abenakis; and, though attended only by another Frenchman, he led them through the middle of the English settlements upon the river Piscataqua to within twelve leagues of Boston, where two English forts stood. The one was attacked and taken by the Abenakis, and the other by Villieu and the other savages. Two hundred and thirty English were killed on this occasion, and about sixty houses burnt, with the loss of only one man to the savages.

THOUGH this account is not only exaggerated, but romantic, yet it is certain that the French had great advantages at this time in New England, owing chiefly to the unpopularity and mismanagement of Sir William Phipps. The head of the Abenakis was one Taxus, one of the bravest and most active savages in America. He is said to have put himself at the head of forty of his lightest followers, and to have attacked and carried a fort near Boston, though it was bravely defended by the English, who killed his nephew, and he himself had twelve musket-balls shot through his cloaths: after this he extended his ravages to the very gates of Boston. Those calamities happened at a time when Phipps was pretending was sufficient security to the colony. The people were so exasperated at this, that, according to Charlevoix, though no mention is made of it in the English accounts, they rose against him, and obliged him to retire to fort Pemmaquid, where he proposed to resume his negotiation with the savages. For this purpose, he threatened to be revenged on such of them as had assisted the French in taking the English forts, and upon such of their nation as were either hostages or prisoners at Boston. This message startled the savages the more, as they had been disappointed of the succours which had been long promised them from France, and, after various deliberations, they resolved to give satisfaction to the English governor; but they were dissuaded from it by Thury, who represented the English in so diabolical a light, as deterred the savages from trusting them. His advice was, that they should employ the time which had been allowed them by Phipps for coming to a resolution, in getting in their harvest, and then retire to places where they could not be attacked by the English. Villieu, at the same time, engaged their chiefs to accompany him to Quebec, where they presented to Frontenac the scalps of the English they had killed, and renewed their protestations of eternal fidelity to the French.

Mismanagement of the English there.

- On the 24th of September this year, Iberville and Sesigny arrived at the mouth of the river St. Therese in two ships, the Poli and the Salamander, where they debarked the day of their arrival; and, the following night, fort Nelson, which commands the port of the same name, was invested on the land side by forty Canadians. On the 27th every thing proper for carrying on the siege was put on board the Salamander, which could not for a whole month come near enough to the fort to besiege it, and was daily in danger of being wrecked by the vast shoals of ice in the bay. At length, on the 28th of October, the Salamander came to an anchor a mile above the fort, which was a very weak one, built of wood, and garrisoned by only fifty-three men, under the command of a trader who never had seen fire. Every thing being disposed for the siege, the governor was summoned to surrender the fort; and a capitulation was accordingly settled, by which the officers were to remain in the fort during the winter, with full security to their persons and effects, and, when the seas were open, to be carried to France, from whence they might pass over to England. When the French took possession of the fort, they found in it abundance of provision, of which they stood in great need. On this occasion Charlevoix very sensibly remarks, and the same observation is often equally applicable to the English, that the miscarriages of all the French attempts in America were owing to the lateness of the season in which the expeditions were fitted out; for had the two French officers arrived sooner before Fort Nelson, they would have got a great booty in skins and furs, which had some weeks before been sent off to England. The party which made this uncomfortable conquest was attacked by the scurvy, which carried off many of them; but in June one hundred and fifty canoes, laden with furs, arrived at Fort Nelson, to which the French gave the name of Fort Bourbon, as an earnest of the vast advantage, of the trade they were likely to reap from that bay. But as their two ships were preparing to sail with their cargoes, they were not only stopped by the ice, but upon a muster it was found, that the crews of both were reduced to one hundred and fifteen men, many of whom were unserviceable through sickness.

Fort Nelson, in Hudson's Bay, taken.

ness and other causes, and the scurvy was daily gaining ground amongst them. At last, the season permitting them to sail, after a most tedious and dangerous voyage, they returned to France, which they reached the 9th of October. La Ferret being left governor of Fort Bourbon, with a garrison of sixty-eight Canadians, and six savages of St. Lewis's Fall.

A. D. 1695.
State of North America.

In the beginning of the year 1695, matters in Canada were much on the same footing as during the preceding. Frontenac was using all his arts on the one part to bring the Iroquois to an absolute submission, but without venturing to use force, and the New England men were as assiduous on the other, in encouraging them to hold out against the French. As to the Iroquois themselves, they cannot be said to have been attached to the English so much by inclination as by interest. They thought that their keeping a proper balance between the English and the French, was the only means of securing their own independency, which must be lost the moment one of those nations could conquer the other. They saw the superiority which the French had amongst the Iurons, the Outaouais, and the other northern and western savages; and this linked them the more to the English. The latter, on the other hand, perceived by experience, that the Iroquois of the highlands, and the fall of St. Lewis, were the most useful subjects the French had in America, and assisted the Iroquois in the various solicitations they made to bring those savages back to their ancient habitations, and in which they were more than once on the point of succeeding, when they were disappointed by the intrigues of the missionaries. The court of France was duly informed by Frontenac of all that happened within his government, but could by no means enter into his motives for not acting with the utmost vigour against the Iroquois. Pontchartrain, in his dispatches, reproached Frontenac on this head, but at the same time promised that he should be supported from France in doing something decisive. Callieres at Montreal about this time discovered an agent from the Iroquois residing at the fall of St. Lewis, practising upon his countrymen to bring them back to their canton, and drove him out of the settlement. La Motte Cadillac, who had succeeded Louvigny in the post of Michillimakinac, animated the savages in his neighbourhood against the Iroquois, who seemed determined either to gain them over, or to root them out, and lost no opportunity of cutting them off, even within reach of the cannon of the French forts. At last, the Iroquois proposed to Frontenac a cessation of arms, both with regard to themselves and the English; but demanded, at the same time, with an air of haughtiness, if he wanted a peace, that he should send deputies to treat of it with them in their own country. The French, in Canada, of all denominations, were surprised that a man of Frontenac's character, after meeting with such insolence, did not instantly assemble the whole force of Canada to chastise them. But he had his reasons for his forbearance. He had never lost sight of his favourite project to re-establish fort Catarocouy, and he was now more intent upon it than ever, as being the only means of subduing the Iroquois without risking the strength of the colony. As the Iroquois themselves had often solicited the re-establishment of that fort, Champigny, and the other French officers in Canada, were amazed at the governor's resolution, and remonstrated strongly upon its inutility, as well as the indignity of complying with the desires of a barbarous enemy, when they might be subdued by the regulars, and the militia, who must be employed in rebuilding the fort. All the answer they received to their remonstrances from Frontenac, was, that, though he was single in his opinion, he still persisted in it; adding, for a reason, that the protection of the fort would encourage the Outaouais to make incursions upon the Iroquois. This obstinacy was better founded than all the specious reasonings of his officers, who even applied for an express order from the court of France, for his desisting from his design. The knowledge of this had no effect upon him, and seemed only to hasten his preparations for it, which were indeed very extraordinary. On the 8th of July he arrived at Montreal, and employed no fewer than seven hundred men; of which two hundred were savages, in rebuilding the fort, the direction of which was given to the chevalier Crisafy, who discharged his commission to great perfection, and with incredible dispatch; for he went up the river, though full of falls, for sixscore leagues, and rebuilt the fort all in fifteen days. When the fort was finished he sent out eighty savages, divided into small companies, to reconnoitre the country. Forty of those savages had taken the road of Ommontague, and some of them, who had advanced as far as the river Chouguen, perceived thirty-four canoes coming down it full of Iroquois, who, by their discourse, appeared to be bound for the fall of St. Lewis; and the other parties discovered that a great number of other Iroquois had taken the field for the same purpose; upon which, all of them set out without loss of time for Montreal, to put that government upon its guard, by which seasonable intelligence Frontenac had leisure to assemble eight hundred men in the isle of Perrot near Montreal, towards the south west point.

Fort Frontenac repaired.

The Iroquois
defeated.

- a THE enemies accordingly made their descent, but they found that the governor general had distributed his army into small parties to cover the inhabitants, who were getting in their harvest. This precaution entirely disconcerted them. All they could do was to murder some straggling settlers; but one of their most considerable parties was cut in pieces by Durantaye. And thus, by the vigilance of Crisefy, this invasion, which threatened the colony with the very worst consequences, by being aimed at its vitals, was defeated. In the western parts of the colony, Cadillac had been so successful in animating the inhabitants against the Iroquois, that besides those they killed, they brought a considerable number of them prisoners to Michillimakinac. This exasperated the Iroquois so much, that they marched in a body either to force the Miamis to declare for them, or to drive them from their principal settlement upon the river St. Joseph. Courtemanche happening with some Canadians to be at that village when the Iroquois appeared; and, joining with the Miamis, he attacked and defeated them. A Huron captain, one le Baron, but one of those Hurons who were irreconcilable to the French, was then at Michillimakinac, where he had prevailed with the Hurons of that post not to be so forward as the other savages there were in making war against the Iroquois. But all his exhortations to this purpose were managed in private, and he acted with such impenetrable dissimulation, that when he went with the other deputies to compliment the governor-general, he sent his son with thirty warriors, all of them devoted to his service, to the country of the Tsenmonthouans. There they concluded a treaty, in which the Outaouais were comprehended, and which was so firmly made, that Cadillac, even when it was discovered, could not break it, though he found means to delay for some time the execution of it on the part of the Outaouais. By this time, Baron had dropt the mask, and Cadillac perceived that his wisest course would be to temporize; but this he found a very difficult task. The savages, even such of them as were most attached to the French in his district, had often complained to him of the dearth of the French commodities, and the necessity they were under on that account of trading with the English. Though Cadillac could give them no relief on that head, yet he advised the deputies, who were then going to treat with Frontenac on another account, and of whom le Baron was one, to present him with a belt of wampum, as an intimation that their countrymen expected that he would reduce the exorbitant price of the French merchandizes. The savages exceeded the advice which Cadillac pretended he gave them; for when they came into Frontenac's presence, and presented their belt, they told him he had his choice of peace or war; which last he must expect, if they were not gratified in their demands. The governor-general rejected the belt with great haughtiness, but at the same time he knew how to soften his refusal by seeming to be sorry at the necessity he was under of chastising his children, and endeavouring to open their eyes to the conduct of the Iroquois, which, he said, tended to their destruction, by detaching them from the French, that they might fall a more easy prey to the English.

Negotiation
with the northern savages.

- LE BARON* observed a profound silence during this conversation, which amazed the deputies. At last, being urged to speak, he said he had nothing in charge from his countrymen, but to hear the sentiments of Onnonthio, and to report them to his principals. But Frontenac gave him to understand that he was well acquainted with all his practices, and that he neither loved nor feared him. Upon this the Outaouais, and the Nipissings, interposed, by saying, that they had no concern in any thing that Baron might have done to displease him, and the latter declared that they were satisfied to remain with the governor, till they should see the event of the war he had threatened. It was about this time that le Sueur brought a great convoy to Monreal, from the western extremity of the upper lake, which was inhabited by the Sieux, and contained vast quantities of profitable furs full of game. One of their leaders approached Frontenac with a most melancholy air, and all the marks of dejection in his countenance, and even tears in his eyes, and conjured him in the name of his nation to take compassion upon him. "All nations, he said, but himself, had a father, and he alone remained an orphan." He then stretched upon the ground a robe of beaver, on which he laid one after another twenty-two arrows, to each of which he gave the name of a village in his nation, and begged of the governor to take them all under his protection, which Frontenac accordingly promised. Though this singular ceremony had no effect, because the French neglected to improve the incident, yet we have related it, because it is a fact that may be of service to the successors of the French in the property of Canada.

- THE discontents at Sir William Phipps's government had by this time risen so high, that he had been recalled to London, where he died, and was succeeded by one Stoughton. During his administration seven Abenakis, who came to Pemmaquid fort with a flag of truce, were arrested, and sent prisoners to Boston, to which three of them were conducted, but the other four were murdered on the road. Tho' the Abenakis resented this breach of hospitality, yet they did not all at once break with Stoughton, till they found they had no hopes of of recovering their relations, who were prisoners, or hostages at Boston, and then they took arms. They were, however, very backward in entering upon hostilities with the English, because they thought they were far superior to the French by sea. But perceiving that a French man of war, commanded by Bonaventure, had taken a great number of English ships, and receiving from him very considerable presents, they determined at last, in good earnest, to enter upon action.

Frontenac's conduct vindicated by himself.

FRONTENAC, the very day after the departure of the armament for repairing his fort at Cataracouy, received from Pontchartrain an express order against his proceeding in that design; which determined him to account for the motives upon which he acted. In his answer to that minister, he very sensibly observed, that after the great preparations he made, if he had dropt them he must have rendered himself despicable in the eyes of the Outaouais, who had been witnesses to them; as they must attribute his conduct either to his inability to execute his design, or to his intention of making peace with the English, who were as averse to the establishment of the fort, as the Iroquois were earnest for its being rebuilt. He added, that it had been re established at a small expence both of time and money. The following passage of his observations, which are founded on experience, ought to be transcribed into English at this time. "I was pressed, said he, in his dispatch to Pontchartrain, to attack Onnontague with all our troops, our inhabitants, and allies; and with drums beating, but I did not think fit to comply; first, because I had not a force sufficient for such an undertaking; secondly, because, had I followed that advice, I should have left this province open to the inroads of the English, who might have attacked Montreal on the side of Chambly; thirdly, because the undertaking itself was ridiculous, and could have ended only in burning a few huts; for the savages, supposing them not to have had time to be assisted by the English, could have escaped with their families to the wood. The event of M. Denanville's expedition against the Tsonnonthuans sufficiently justifies my observation, and proves, that the burning one or two villages never can secure us from the incursions of the savages. The only way to humble them is by continuing to harass and alarm them by small parties, so as that they dare not stir abroad, which we shall be enabled to do by the re establishment of fort Frontenac (meaning that of Cataracouy). If his majesty shall next year think proper to attack the fort of Pemmaquid, it will give great encouragement to our savages in those parts. It is even to be wished, that such an expedition should be extended to the bombardment of Boston and New York, which, I think, is by no means impracticable, and would by one blow effectually finish the war in that country." Such was the reasoning of Frontenac in defence of his conduct, and experience afterwards proved it to be just, but he was now old, and his positive haughty humour had made the officers under him his enemies. Towards the end of this year both Frontenac and Champigny represented to their court the defenceless state of Placentia, which was then in the hands of the French, in case it should be attacked by the armament then fitting out at Boston. They therefore proposed that the French should send a squadron strong enough to beat that of the English in those seas, and then to take Boston; which would not only put them in possession of immense riches, but render them absolute masters of all the fisheries. Any court but one so uninformed as that of France was, would have adopted such a proposal, which, in the then state of affairs, was very practicable. But happily for England, Lewis XIV. was so busied in forging chains for Europe, that he neglected those for America.

A. D. 1699.
Plan of the French operations.

INSTEAD of following Frontenac's advice, the French council confined the plan of operations for North America for the year 1696, to the taking fort Pemmaquid, which was a kind of a bridle upon all Acadia, the driving of the English from all the posts they had in Newfoundland, and likewise from those they retained in Hudson's Bay. Iberville and Bonaventure were appointed to the command of the expedition against fort Pemmaquid, which was to be defrayed at the expence of the French king; while the northern company were to be at the charges of the other two expeditions. Orders so early as the month of February were issued out to Begon, the intendant of Rochelle, to equip two ships, the Envious and the Profound. The two commanders were instructed after they had taken fort Pemmaquid to raze it to the foundation; and then to make a settlement at the bottom of the river St. John, from whence they were to dispatch M. de Sesigny in the Dragon to the bottom of Hudson's Bay. As to the other two expeditions the two commanders were to proceed from the river St. John, and there join some vessels from St. Malo, and in concert with Brouillan, the governor of Placentia, vigorously to attack the English both by land and sea. With regard to the Iroquois war, the French ministry perceiving the smuggling trade that was carrying on by the wood rangers, and the disorders which they had introduced amongst the French savages in the North and West, and likewise reflecting on the total neglect of agriculture which they occasioned, with the vast expence and danger in keeping up the communication between Michillimakinac, and the interior parts of the province, they gave orders a orders for abandoning that and all the upper posts, excepting St. Lewis upon the river of the Illinois. At the same time, la Foret and Tonti, who commanded in the last-mentioned fort, were not to import any beaver into the colony. Charlevoix acknowledges the mistended to its utter ruin, as those advanced posts certainly must fall into the hands of the English, who in that case, if joined with the savages, might in one campaign have driven the French out of all Canada.

FRONTENAC was now at the end of all the art and address with which he had hitherto managed the savages, who plainly perceived that all sprung from his weakness to chastise them, and therefore he resolved to carry his threats into execution, and to march against them with all his force. He therefore sent a messenger along with the Outaouais deputies as they were returning to their own country, acquainting la Motte Cadillac with his intention. The messenger found that commandant in a most perplexed situation. Baron had succeeded not only in effecting a meeting between the savages of Mackillimakinac and the Iroquois, but in concluding an offensive treaty, by which they were to unite their forces, and to attack the French. Cadillac was informed of this by Onaské, chief of the Outaouais Kiskakons; but his embarrassment was increased upon the report which the deputies made at their return, who represented the French in the most despicable light. All Cadillac could do to break this dangerous alliance, was to offer them provisions at the usual price, and even to give them credit for the payment, to the last grain he had in his magazines. He, at the same time, greatly magnified the advantages which the French had gained over the English in other parts of New France, and assured them that they had nothing to apprehend, but from the crossness of the winds, which kept the fleets with the merchandizes from coming from France. Cadillac's generosity touched the savages, who, it must be confessed, were a most perfidious, inconstant race; and notwithstanding their late engagement with the Iroquois, they resolved now to join the French in making war upon them; and before they left the place where Cadillac had assembled them, they named Onaské, and other two chiefs, to head the expedition, from whence they returned victorious with thirty scalps, thirty-two prisoners, and a booty of about five hundred beaver skins, which were the property of the English. Soon after, M. D'Argenteuil arrived at Michillimakinac, where he published an account of the vast preparations making by Frontenac against the Iroquois and the English; and Cadillac was in great hopes that five hundred Outaouais warriors would march to join the governor-general; but he was disappointed by the intrigues of the Hurons, who had disapproved of the treachery of the other Michillimakinac savages towards the Iroquois.

Difficulties of the French government with the savages.

It remained now for Frontenac to fix the plan of his operations. He was once inclined to have fallen in the winter upon the Onnontague canton; but, upon the representations of Callieres, he deferred it to the summer. In the mean time, he ordered five or six hundred men to be drawn from the governments of Montreal and Trois Rivières to march against the Agniers. Those savages had much better intelligence than he expected; for he was advised, that foreseeing the storm that was to come upon them, they had called in not only all the other cantons of the Iroquois, but the English likewise, to their assistance. Upon this, Frontenac was obliged to alter his scheme, and to send no more than three hundred picked men to fall upon the Iroquois hunters, who were without any diffidence roving between the river St. Laurence and that of the Outaouais. This detachment left Quebec towards the end of January under the command of Louigny, but they were stopt for thirteen days at Montreal by an extraordinary fall of snow. They then continued their march under incredible difficulties to within five leagues of Catarocouy. From thence they sent savages to reconnoitre, who, after a march of seven or eight days, met ten Iroquois, and a woman; three of whom they killed, and took the rest; one or two of whom were inhumanly burnt at Montreal. About the beginning of spring, the Iroquois appeared in a body in the neighbourhood of Montreal, in order to interrupt the French in sowing their grounds; but they were disappointed by the wise dispositions of de Callieres the governor; so that few of the French suffered, and those by their own fault. About this time, the chevalier de Crisafy died of heart-break, for not having been able to obtain from the French government the smallest acknowledgment for the important services he had rendered to the colony, though he had been again and again recommended to the court on that account by the governor-general, and all the officers of that crown in New France.

Preparations against them.

In May, Callieres came down to Quebec, and having concerted with Frontenac the operations of the campaign, he returned to Montreal, where, on the twenty-second of June, he was joined by the governor-general himself, the chevalier de Vaudreuil, Ramezay, governor of Trois Rivières; the irregulars and militia of Quebec, and those of Trois Rivières; those of Montreal being in readiness. On the 4th of July, they were joined by ten Outaouais, who had been hovering about the Onnontague canton for some time, but without being able to make a prisoner; and the French conceived great hopes that they would be followed by others of their nation. At last the order of the whole army was settled, and French officers, who were perfectly acquainted with the manners of the Indians and their way of fighting, were appointed to command the savages. The French regulars were divided into four battalions, and the Canada militia into as many, with their proper officers. On the 6th, they encamped on the island of Perrot; and next day they began their march. We shall not here follow Charlevoix in a minute description of the arrangement of this army, a matter always of great importance with a French author, as well as officers; and which, it seems, set out partly by water, and partly by land. It is sufficient to say, that on the 19th, the whole body arrived at Cataracouy, where they expected four hundred Outaouais, who had been promised them by Cadillac, but who never joined them. On the 28th, the whole army found itself at the entry of the strait and rapid river of Chouguen, which obliged the governor-general to proceed with great caution; nor could the troops advance up it above a league and a half in twenty-four hours. In short, after surmounting the most dangerous and discouraging difficulties, and several times escaping being wrecked by the rapidity of the falls, they mounted to the lake of Ganentaba, and passed a strait which the enemy had neglected to occupy. Here they found two bundles hanging to a tree, containing as many reeds as were warriors waiting to fight them, amounting in the whole to 1434. The French, however, made good their landing without much difficulty, and, next morning, threw up an entrenchment, or what they call a fort, in which they lodged their provision and ammunition. Notwithstanding all the boasts of the French writers concerning the superior genius of their countrymen over the Indians, their dispositions appear to have been very shallow in this expedition; and Callieres seems to have been the only man of sense amongst them, in a military capacity. Though secrecy was the main chance they had for success, yet they took no precaution to observe it; but Callieres, well knowing that the enemy would, by deserters or otherwise, come to the knowledge of their intention, publicly gave out amongst the savages, that the reason why the Outaouais had not joined him was, because they promised the governor-general that they would attack the Tsonnonthouans, while he was marching against the Onnontaguese. This was faithfully reported by a savage deserter to the Tsonnonthouans, which was the true reason why they had remained at home to defend their own country. The following night, the French army saw the chief village of the Onnontaguese in a blaze, it having been set on fire by the inhabitants themselves; and, by the footsteps on the ground, they had reason to believe that the Onnontaguese had sent all their useless mouths to the cantons of Goyogouin and Onneyouth, and that they had been reinforced from thence. On the 3d of August, all the French army was drawn up in order of battle; the left line being commanded by Callieres, the right by Vaudreuil, and the center by the governor-general; but the grounds over which they marched were so impracticable, that it was very late before they could reach the village, which they found in ashes, and in it the bodies of two Frenchmen, who had been murdered. The French were surprised to perceive, that not only the village was burnt, but the English fort, that had been built there for the protection of the inhabitants, was abandoned; and which, had it been properly defended, might have ruined Frontenac's army. On the 5th, a French soldier, who had been a prisoner, came from Onneyouth with a belt from that canton, demanding peace. The general sent him instantly back with this answer; That he was ready to receive the submissions of those who had employed him, provided they came to live within the pale of the French settlement; but that, if they did not immediately comply, he would next day send his troops to receive their last answer.

ACCORDINGLY Vaudreuil next morning set out with six or seven hundred men under his command, with orders to cut down all the corn, to burn the villages, and to receive six of their chiefs as hostages; but in case of the smallest resistance, he was to put to the sword all who fell in his way. Next day, a French prisoner, who had escaped, having discovered some secret concealments of the enemy, Vaudreuil began to put his ravaging orders into execution, by cutting down the corn, and laying waste the country, for two entire days. The unmanly rage of the French and their savages went so far on this occasion, that a venerable Onnontague, about a hundred years of age, and therefore unable to fly with the rest of his countrymen, falling into their hands, they made formal preparations to put him to death with the most excruciating torments, which he eyed with the most intrepid indifference, upbraiding the natives all the while with being slaves to the French, whom he spoke of with the utmost contempt. While some were endeavouring, either thro' compassion or rage, to put an end to his life, "You ought not, says he, to be in such haste to finish my torments, but give me longer time to teach you how to die like men; for my part, I die contented, because I can reproach myself with no meanness." Next day Vaudreuil, after laying waste the villages of the Onneyouth canton, returned to the camp with thirty-five prisoners, most of whom were French, whom he had delivered from captivity, and accompanied by the chiefs of the canton, who threw themselves upon the mercy of Frontenac. Amongst a Amongst the prisoners was a young Agnier, who had escaped from a French settlement, and who was burnt alive. He reported that three hundred Agniers and English had left Orange to come to the relief of Onneyouth; but that they had returned thither in great consternation. Upon this, a council of war was assembled, and it was resolved to treat the Gogouin canton in the same manner as they had done those of Onneyouth and Onnontague; and after that to erect forts to bridle the savages, or force them to remove from that country. Frontenac, at first, seemed to approve of that resolution; but, all of a sudden, he changed his mind, declaring that he was resolved immediately to return to Montreal.

CHARLEVOIX is greatly perplexed to account for the governor's motives for this inconstancy. He mentions many, particularly that he was afraid, if the Iroquois were reduced, his power and command, of which he was extremely fond, must become insignificant; while others give out, that he was jealous of Vaudreuil: but, without having recourse to supposing that such extravagancies should enter the head of a man of seventy-four years of age, we have, upon the face of the jesuit's history, sufficient reasons for determining him to return. The expedition had been fitted out at great labour and expence, and, in fact, nothing had been done that had answered either. The savages had not lost above thirty or forty men; they could easily repair their cabins, and were sure of sustenance from their friends of New York and New England, to whom they always were welcome. Frontenac, therefore, who during all the expedition was carried in an open sedan, very rationally concluded that it would be madness to prosecute farther so ineffectual, so dangerous, and so expensive an expedition; so that, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of Callieres and the other officers, he gave the signal for retreating, which he began to do on the 9th, and arrived at Montreal on the 20th, having lost in the expedition no more than six men.

At Montreal, Frontenac found D'Argenteuil with fifty Frenchmen from Michillimakinac, but who had arrived too late to be present at the expedition. From them he learned that the northern and western savages had, in fact, no good reason for not having joined the expedition, but the disadvantageous impressions they had of the French and their power. All they alledged was, that they had not joined the expedition, because they imagined, that like others of the same kind before, it would fall to the ground. Notwithstanding this, though Frontenac had returned to Montreal, he was far from putting an end to the war against the Iroquois. He was informed, but his intelligence was false, that their cantons were on the point of starving, and that the English of New York were in no condition to give them relief. He therefore flattered himself, that, by sending out parties to harass them, he should soon bring them to subjection; and having given orders accordingly, he returned to Quebec. A little time shewed him how much he had been mistaken. The Iroquois invaded the French settlements with as much fierceness as ever. Their cantons were restored to as good a condition as they had been in before they were destroyed. Instead of having subdued, he had only exasperated, them; and the French themselves, by the badness of their harvest, were in danger of suffering the calamities they had endeavoured to inflict upon their enemies.

TOWARDS the end of autumn, Callieres had orders to raise a large body of troops, and to march them over the ice against the Agniers; but found the design impracticable for want of provisions. Upon this, the governor-general ordered him to send only a party of fifty men to the ground on which the Iroquois had used to hunt, during the winter. But even this design was laid aside upon the Onneyouths being again in motion, and intelligence being received, that the Iroquois had, that year, changed their usual place of hunting. Notwithstanding this, some private rangers advanced on the side of New York; but few of them escaped being killed, either by the Mahingans, or the Agniers, or by their own savages, who mistook them for English. On the 5th of February, 1697, thirty-three Onneyouths arrived at Montreal, offering in the name of their canton to submit themselves to the French governor. They added, that other cantons would have followed them; but that lying between their enemies, the Onnontague held them by one arm, and the Agnier by another: that this had not altered their intention, and that if Ononbio would send any one to them, they would come to him, as soon as possible; as for themselves, they were willing to be settled wherever he pleased. All they begged was to retain the name of Onneyouths. Callieres gave his new guests a very favourable reception, and had orders from Frontenac to send back the chief man amongst them to the canton of Onneyouth, that he might there report the civil usage they had met with, and thereby entice them all to follow their example, and to settle amongst the French.

THE Onnontague, the Agniers, and the other cantons in alliance with them, conceived great umbrage from those proceedings of the Onneyouths; and the Agniers, under pretence of escorting two Frenchwomen, who had been taken prisoners sometimes before, sent two of their countrymen to Quebec to learn how matters went. From those female prisoners, the

the governor-general understood, that the Iroquois were quite recovered from the consternation into which they had been thrown by the late invasion and desolation of their country; that the English had made presents to the Onnontague sufficient to indemnify them for their losses, and to rebuild their villages; and that they proposed in the spring of that very year again to sow the lands which had been ravaged by the French. As to the two Agniers, they behaved with great freedom before the governor. They demanded to know whether the way between Quebec and their canton was free; and one of them insisted upon his son, who was a prisoner, being restored to him. Frontenac pretended, that had it not been out of regard to the two prisoners they had brought back, they should have felt the weight of his indignation for those insolent demands. He added, that he would give them no answer, till they behaved with perfect submission to his will, and till their canton had sent back all the French prisoners it detained. Not contented with this severe answer, he kept the two Agniers at Quebec during the rest of the winter, lest they should put their countrymen upon their guard against the French parties who were out. At the same time, he sent fresh orders to Montreal to harass the Iroquois, and, if possible, to gain intelligence of what was passing between their cantons and the government of New York. On the 15th of May, the savages of the highlands and the fall of St. Lewis came to offer their services to the governor of Montreal; but Frontenac gave them to understand, that, in the posture affairs then were, he would find sufficient employment for them at home; from whence he ordered them not to stir. This order was occasioned by the advice, which the governor-general had received by a Canadian, one Vincelotte; who, by a most amazing journey, had arrived at Quebec, over the desert mountains near fort Pemmaquid, where one Gabaret had arrived from France, with dispatches from that court to Frontenac.

The Iroquois
renew their incursions.

Fort Nelson taken by the English.

THEY imported that the governor-general should send from home no troops upon any service whatever, and that a squadron of ships was ready to sail from the ports of Old England, to join another at Boston, to attack Canada; and that the governor should have in readiness 1000 or 1200 men to execute the orders, which should come from court. A strict compliance with those orders soon gave the Iroquois to understand, that they had nothing offensive to apprehend from the French; and therefore they renewed their incursions on the government of Montreal, which obliged Callieres to send out detachments against them. Soon after, some prisoners from New York informed him that whatever show the English made of invading Canada, the people of that colony were themselves so much distressed, that they were rather apprehensive of an invasion from the French. Advice came at the same time, that fort Nelson had been again reduced by the English. Towards the end of autumn last year, four English ships and a bomb-vessel had appeared in the road, as did, soon after, two French ships, but the latter immediately set sail; the one arrived safe at France, but the other was wrecked in sailing to Quebec. Upon their departure, the English began a brisk cannonading against the fort, and attempted to land, but were repulsed by the French. After this, the bomb-ketch plied the fort so warmly, that La Foret, the commandant, demanded a capitulation, and to be carried with all his garrison, who were to carry off their several properties, to some place belonging to France. According to the French, this capitulation was violated by the English, who carried the garrison prisoners to England. But this is extremely unlikely, and it is probable no capitulation was made; or, if made, that it was observed, as much as was in the power of the English. But the truth is, that the French accounts cannot be depended upon, when they rest upon the evidence of their officers, who never fail to magnify their own merits at the expence of truth. Four months after this garrison arrived in England, they were sent to France, where they had no sooner arrived, than understanding that an expedition was fitting out to retake fort Nelson, most of them embarked on board the four ships and a sloop that were destined for that purpose at Rochelle, and which were to be commanded by Serigny, who, when he came to Placentia, was to resign his command to his brother Iberville. The instructions of the latter were that before he went to Hudson's Bay he should visit fort Naxoat, on the river St. John; but they arrived too late in the year, the season being so far advanced, and the ships so much battered by the voyage, that he was obliged to sail directly for fort Nelson, and he accordingly arrived at the mouth of Hudson's Bay, on the 28th of July. By the 3d of August, the frost had set in so severely, that he lost one of his ships, and the men were with difficulty saved. He afterwards lost sight of all the others; but, on the 4th of September, he was within sight of port Nelson, and sent one of his officers ashore to reconnoitre, and to get intelligence of some English ships he had seen at the entrance of the bay. Next day, he saw three ships, who proved to be English, and, according to the French historian, though one of the English ships was stronger than his own, which was called the Pelican, and mounted only fifty guns, and though he had but a hundred and fifty men on

- a board fit for service, he engaged them all, and took one of them, the Hudson's Bay. After this, as he was preparing to attack fort Nelson, both he and his prize were wrecked in the night-time, at the river St. Therese. The crews, however, had the good fortune to save themselves, and artillery sufficient to attack the fort; but he was destitute of all provisions, and he depended for subsistence only on his success. As he was making his disposition for the attack, he saw three sail, who proved to be his own ships, which he had lost wrecked himself. So seasonable a reinforcement encouraged him as much as it daunted Bailey, the English commandant of the fort, who immediately proposed to capitulate, which he did on the following terms. First, that all his papers and books of accounts should be safe. Secondly, that his garrison, both officers and soldiers, should keep their chests, cloaths, and all that belonged to them. Thirdly, that they should be treated as well as the French themselves. Fourthly, that they should be sent directly to England. And lastly, that the garrison should march out with all the honours of war, without being disarmed. The garrison consisted of no more than fifty-two men, of whom seventeen had belonged to the Hudson's Bay, and had escaped from the Pelican when it was wrecked; but had the benefit of the capitulation. After this Iberville returned to France in the Profond, and, when he arrived at Belleisle, his crew was so distressed with the scurvy, that scarce a man of them was serviceable. The conquest of Hudson's Bay was of more importance than the French themselves were apprized of. First, because it furnished better furs than any other part of North America; and secondly, because the natives were so miserably poor, that they sold them much cheaper than they could be had elsewhere.

FRONTENAC all this time remained in great doubt concerning the meaning of the order he had received from court, concerning the force he was to keep on foot, when the head of the Onneyouth canton came all alone to Quebec, and with an air of unconcern, presented himself before the governor, telling him, that his countrymen, hearing how well their brethren had been received by the French were disposed to follow their example. This chief was the same whom Callieres by Frontenac's order, had sent back to acquaint his canton with the good reception of their brethren who had settled with the French. He added, that the Onnontague were upon the point of doing the same; and were about to send a belt to Onontio, to know whether he would be pleased to receive them; and another to the missionaries, to beg a peace with the French, from the God of the Christians. Frontenac instantly perceived that all those compliments were meant only to gain time. He had no choice left, but either to declare war, or to dissemble. The orders he had received from his court disabled him from the former; and, putting the best face upon the matter he could, he told the Onneyouth chief that he gave his countrymen to the month of September to determine whether they would come in a body and ask for peace; but that, if they should suffer that time to elapse, they should find him for ever their mortal enemy. Though he depended but little on the effect of this menace, yet the savages appeared in the field much sooner than he had expected or foreseen; for, in a few days, they renewed their incursions; a proof how well those savages could dissemble, when instigated by resentment, and how irreconcilable they were when they thought themselves injured. But this was not the only cause of disquietude that Frontenac had at this time.

Conduct of Frontenac upon the orders he received from France.

A LARGE party of the Miamis, who dwelt near the river Maramek, which discharges itself into the eastern part of the lake Michigan, had, in August the year before, begun their march to join their brethren, who were settled on the river St. Joseph; but they were attacked upon the road, and some of them killed, by the Sieux. The Miamis of the river St. Joseph resented this hostility so much, that they took the field against the Sieux, and, penetrating even into their country, found them entrenched in a fort with some French rangers. This did not daunt the enraged Miamis, who several times attacked the fort, but were always repulsed with a considerable loss of their bravest men. Upon which they were obliged to retreat homewards. While they were upon their march, they met a party of French who were carrying arms and ammunition to the Sieux, and stript them of all they had, but without doing them any other violence. The Outaouais, understanding what had passed, immediately lent a deputation to inform Frontenac, that it was absolutely necessary for him to appease the Miamis, lest they should join the Iroquois. Frontenac endeavoured to answer them with good words; but the Miamis continued to be so much exasperated, that Perrot, notwithstanding the great regard they had for him, must have been sacrificed to the flames, had he not been rescued out of their hands by the Outagamis. Though Frontenac at last found means to soften the Miamis, yet he was in great fear lest the affair should come to the ears of his court, from whom he had received express orders, that none of the French should carry on the least intercourse with those savages. Champigny and Callieres were of opinion, that a certain number of French should remain at the posts of Micbillimakinae, and suggested other precautions to prevent the abuses complained of.

He is embroiled with the Miamis.

As their proposals tended to diminish Frontenac's authority, he secretly traversed them, but, at last, he joined in a memorial to the court, representing the necessity of maintaining the posts of Macbillimakinac, and the river St. Joseph, to prevent the English from settling there, and establishing a trade with the natives. They added, that this could not be done, without sending every year at least twenty-five canoes, loaded with merchandizes, which were to be at the disposal of the governor-general, who was to distribute them amongst the friends of the French, to keep them from joining with the English; and that it was absolutely necessary for the safety of the missionaries sometimes to march troops into the savage countries. The French ministry, after long deliberation, agreed to those proposals; to which they were, in a great measure, determined by Baron, the savage chief we have already mentioned, having carried to New York, thirty Huron families, and was soliciting others to follow him.

He is joined by nations.

TOWARDS the end of August, Cadillac who had been informed by Callieres of the apprehensions the colony was under of a new visit from the English, arrived at Montreal, with a considerable body of French, and three hundred savages from the tribes of the Sakis, Pouteouatamis, Outaouais, and Hurons. Frontenac was then at Montreal, and received them with high compliments upon their zeal and readiness to defend the colony, and upon their valour during the last campaign, in which they had killed or taken above a hundred Tsonnonthouans. About this time the Iroquois, to the number of two hundred and fifty, of whom about sixty were in canoes, having taken the field, were marching to join Baron, but were discovered by the Rat, who was now entirely in the French interest. Tho' he was at the head of no more than a hundred and fifty men, he marched to attack the enemy, and by a well-timed stratagem, he killed about forty-six, and took fourteen. This action, and the services he had done the French in putting them and their allies on their guard against the practices of Baron, brought the Rat, who had attended Cadillac to Montreal, into great credit with the governor-general. The latter, however, knew too much of their character to believe that they were disinterested in their professions, or that they came so far merely in compliment to his character and person. He therefore told them with an air of frankness, that he expected every one amongst them would lay before him their grievances, if they had any to complain of; that he would do all he could to remove them; and that they ought to take care not to divide themselves, but to unite against the Iroquois against whom he was resolved to continue the war. Upon this, Onanguicé, the head of the Pouteouatamis, and a leading orator amongst the savages, in the name of all the assembly, observed that more was generally promised to them, than was intended to be performed; that they had been often assured that they never should want for arms and ammunition, but that they had received none for a whole year; that the English did not treat the Iroquois in that manner, and that, if they continued to be so neglected, they would appear no more at Montreal.

with them.

IN answer to this reproach, the governor said, that though it was true, that they had not been furnished for a year before with arms and ammunition, they should be no losers in the end; that he had a great warlike expedition to undertake, which he was not then at liberty to communicate to them, but that, as soon as he had made his arrangements, he would take care they should want for nothing. Upon this they parted, all seemingly satisfied. By this time, all fear of the English invading Canada was blown over, so that the governor dismissed the savages without farther audience. It now appeared, that the grand expedition, which had been kept so secret, was destined against New England; the conquest of which had been projected by Pontchartrain himself. Frontenac had been so forward in his preparations, that he informed that minister that he should be ready to march in eight days after he had received his orders; but that the conquest of New York was an object far preferable to that of Boston; that the latter did not at all incommode New France, but that the former might be easily conquered by the French shipping attacking New York itself, while the Canadians fell by land upon New Orange. His representations came too late. The French king had given to the chevalier Nesmond the command of ten ships of war, a frigate, and two fire ships, with orders to join, by the 25th of April at latest, the Rocheport Squadron under the command of M. de Magnon; and, to prevent the usual complaint of the lateness of the season, they were to sail directly to the bay of Placentia, and to drive the English entirely out of Newfoundland. After this, they were to sail to Pemmaquid, from whence they were to dispatch a vessel to Quebec, with orders to join them there with 1500 men, whom he was to have in readiness. This junction being formed, the fleet, after taking the troops on board, was to sail directly to Boston, and, after conquering that city, to lay all the English settlements between that and Piscataqua in ruins; so that it should not be in the power of the English to repair them.

THE French king, being apprehensive that Frontenac's great age might disable him from serving in person, left him at liberty, if he pleased, to substitute Vaudreuil in his room, in which case the latter was to be subject to the orders of Nesmond; but if Frontenac marched

Plan of the French for the conquest of English America.

- a in person, his command was to be independent. After taking Boston, and completing their ravages on the coast of New England, the French fleet and army had orders to reduce New York, and, in their march homewards, to lay that colony likewise in ruins; and, lest Nesmond's force should not be sufficient for such mighty operations, he was empowered to take along with him all the French ships of war that were employed in Hudson's Bay. When Nesmond anchored in the road of Rochelle, he found orders waiting for him, to give the chevalier Villebon, who was at Naxoat in Acadia, all the reinforcement and supplies he could spare; and, when he came to the bay of Placentia, he received intelligence from Pontchar-train of ten English ships, under the convoy of a man of war, who had sailed from Portugal with salt to fish on the coasts of Newfoundland, and which he was by all means to attack;
- b and, after that, he was to take or destroy all the English ships in those parts.

Fruitless expedition of Nesmond,

- SUCH was the mighty plan which the French laid down for the destruction of the English in North America, without considering the unsurmountable difficulties that lay in the way of its execution. Nesmond was two months on his voyage to Placentia, which he did not reach till the 24th of July. Upon calling a council of war the question was put, whether the fleet should sail directly for Boston, and it was carried in the negative, and because they were entirely ignorant of what the English were doing; because whatever dispatch they made, the forces from Canada could not reach Pemmaquid sooner than the 10th of September, by which time, the fleet, which was victualled only for fifty days, must be disabled from going upon any expedition. Nesmond, to his great mortification, had nothing to reply to those reasons; but dispatched one of his officers, des Ursins, with all the shipping he had brought for Canada, under his convoy, but with express orders to return, and give him notice, if, on his voyage, he should discover any English ships. Nesmond then took his station twenty-two leagues to the west of Placentia, as being the most convenient for acting against the English. In the beginning of August, he had intelligence that the English were fortifying St. John's; and, another council of war being held, it was unanimously agreed to make a descent upon that place, especially as they were informed, at the same time, that they might there make prizes of thirty-four sail of English ships. Of those some had sailed from Plymouth under the command of captain, afterwards admiral, Sir John Norris; and others had arrived from Ireland, with 1000 land troops on board, commanded by colonel Gibson.
- d The French fleet accordingly sailed to the east coast of Newfoundland; but Nesmond was disappointed in all his expectations, for he did not meet with a single English ship, and was obliged, without firing a gun, to return to France, after promising to himself the conquest of all the English American continent. But we are now to attend the affairs of New France in other parts.

and of the English against Naxoat.

- THE French court having greatly at heart the reduction of fort Pemmaquid, took it, as we have already mentioned in the history of New England, and, after demolishing it to the ground, Iberville and Bonaventure, who commanded the expedition, spied an English squadron, as they were sailing out of the river Pemmaquid. Iberville upon this ordered the ship, which he had taken from the English, and which had on board a hundred Mickmack savages, to keep close by him. The savages, understanding their danger, begged the captain of the ship where they were to board the largest of the enemy's vessels, as they were desirous of dying with their arms in their hands, rather than rot in the dungeons of Boston; which the captain promised should be done. But Iberville held so near the land, that the English ships durst not follow him, and they changed their course towards the river St. John, while Iberville arrived on the coast of Cape Breton. Here he put all the savages ashore, excepting three who refused to leave him, but could not reach La Heve, where others were ready to embark with him for Newfoundland, where, on the 12th of August, he anchored in the road of Placentia. In the mean while, the English ships, which he had escaped, fell in with the chevalier de Villebon, who was returning with a company of savages to his fort of Naxoat, and made him prisoner. The English then continued their course to Beaubassin, where one Burgefs, who had an estate in those parts, presented the commodore with a writing, by which the inhabitants of Beaubassin, at the time that Acadia was conquered by Sir William Phipps, engaged themselves to be faithful to king William. At the same time, two hundred and fifty English, and a hundred and fifty savages were put ashore. The commodore received Burgefs with great civilities, and the chief inhabitants of the place, who, tho' they were English subjects, had in fact revolted to the French, welcomed to shore the commodore and his chief officers, who were entertained at Burgefs's house. According to the French accounts, the commodore had promised full protection to the inhabitants, and had ordered the soldiers to take nothing in their quarters without payment, and to kill no cattle that were not immediately necessary for their subsistence; but they were guilty of great irregularities. The truth is, the English commodore discovered a writing under Frontenac's hand, laying down the terms of a trade between them and the other French subjects of New France; and, considering the attempts and barbarities of the French against the English lish settlements in those parts, it is not to be wondered at if the soldiers were guilty of excesses. The inhabitants, however, in general, being conscious of what they had done, were so apprehensive of the consequences, that they secreted both themselves and their effects, which, perhaps, farther exasperated the English, who demolished or pillaged their houses, and reduced their church to ashes. The commodore then threatened to treat the remaining inhabitants as rebels; but was contented with obliging them to subscribe a fresh paper, by which they renewed their allegiance to the English government. The squadron then proceeded towards the river St. John, where Villebon, who, it seems, had obtained his freedom by producing a sufficient pass, commanding again at Naxoat, they were discovered by an ensign of the fort, who was reconnoitring with three or four soldiers, and who, escaping through the woods, gave Villebon intelligence of their arrival. Two days after, the same ensign returning to reconnoitre was surprised and killed by the English, and two soldiers he had with him were made prisoners. Those soldiers discovered to the English a great many concealments, where ammunition and merchandizes were lodged; and which being dug up, and put on board the squadron, it set sail for Boston. When they had proceeded a little way on their voyage, they were met by an English frigate of thirty-two guns, and two sloops, and their commander produced an order for them to return and attack fort Naxoat. It was the 16th of October, when Villebon, who imagined the English at that time had reached Boston, was informed of their return, and that they intended to besiege his fort. He immediately put every thing there in a posture of defence, threw up new entrenchments, and drawing out his garrison under arms, he harangued them like a Frenchman, by extolling the superiority of the French courage and glory over those of the English, exhorted them to fight bravely, and promising, that if any of them were disabled in the service, his most Christian majesty should provide for them all the rest of their lives. Every thing was now disposed for a vigorous defence; the garrison was in high spirits, and passed the night under arms; and, on the 18th, the English made good their landing, and began the attack. We are not much prepossessed in favour of the English military skill in America in those days; but, had it been greater than it was, little could have been expected from the success of an enterprize undertaken at a season so bitter, that the most hardy troops could not keep the field, especially in the night-time. In short, the English were obliged to give over their enterprize, and the siege was raised; but Villebon could not persuade his savages to pursue them. The loss of men on both sides was very trifling; but the English, before they retired, burnt down some settlements.

Affairs of
land.

THOUGH the natural vanity of the French magnified every little incident happening in America to extravagance in their own favour, yet it is certain, that they never had amongst them a genius for commerce, comparable to that of the English. Their settlements on the continent of America were, at this time, a dead weight on their mother country, while those of the English enriched theirs, even on the bleak island of Newfoundland; where their fisheries were reckoned to amount to little less than a million sterling a year. The French, in vain, endeavoured to rival them in this commerce, and, though in possession of Placentia, one of the finest harbours in North America, all they could do was to keep themselves from starving, while the English there lived at ease and in opulence. The governor of Placentia at this time was de Brouillan, a brave intelligent officer, but covetous, rough, and disagreeable in his manners to all about him. His garrison consisted of no more than eighteen soldiers, but it might upon an emergency have been reinforced with about eighty fishermen; but all of them with little or no experience in war. The island of Newfoundland being thus divided between the English and the French, Iberville, after his conquest of Pemmaquid, proposing the entire reduction of it, arrived for that purpose at Placentia on the 12th of September. Three days before this, Brouillan had set sail in the Pelican, a ship of war, and with eight St. Malo vessels, to reduce the fort of St. John, the principal settlement which the English had on the island. While they were intent upon entering the bay, they took an English officer, from whom Brouillan understood, that there lay at St. John forty English ships, some of whom mounted from eighteen to thirty-two guns. This did not intimidate Brouillan; but the current set so strongly against his ships, that it was with great difficulty he entered the bay, where he made good his landing, and took or silenced some English forts. Brouillan then advanced against the fort of St. John, which he passionately desired to take before the arrival of Iberville; but happening to quarrel with the St. Malo people, he was obliged to attack fort Forillon, which he took sword in hand, and made the English commandant, who was captain of the Zephyr, prisoner of war with all his garrison. He then advanced against some other English posts, which the French call forts, and which he found deserted; but the quarrel between him and the St. Malo men continuing, all he could do was to pick up about thirty fishing vessels, and he was obliged to return to Placentia without taking fort St. John. It was the 17th of October before he returned thither, where he found Iberville, who, for want of provisions, had been unable to join him. At last, a last, receiving provisions and reinforcements from Quebec, he was preparing to attack Car-boniere, the most northerly post the English possessed. When Brouillan returned, Iberville acquainted him with his intention, which Brouillan resolutely opposed, and told Iberville that if he was resolved to proceed he would order the Canadians not to follow him. Iberville, upon this, prepared to return to France, as he foresaw that it was impossible for him to act in conjunction with a man of Brouillan's disposition. The Canadians hearing of his resolution refused to obey any orders but his, and threatened to return to Quebec. The fact was, that Iberville himself was a Canadian by birth, and being one of the ablest officers that country ever produced, was adored by his countrymen. Brouillan and Iberville dis-

THE character of the Canadian troops was, that when they were roughly treated they were intractable, when gently, submissive. But, besides them, the St. Malo men made bitter complaints of Brouillan, who found himself obliged to come to a better temper, and to enter into an accommodation with Iberville. At last, it was agreed, that they should proceed to the attack of St. John's fort in separate bodies; Iberville at the head of the Canadians; and Brouillan of the regulars and the militia; but when all were united, that Brouillan should have the command, though Iberville, who had contributed the most to the expedition, was to have the greatest share of the plunder, when they became masters of St. John's. This accommodation being made, Brouillan embarked on board the Profond, which was still commanded by Bonaventure, who, though a Canadian, had taken no part of the dispute, and Brouillan found means to fix de Muys, who sailed in the same ship with himself, by promising him in due time, the command of the Canadians. Iberville began his march on the first of November, and after surmounting prodigious difficulties, for nine days, arrived at Forillon, where he was joined by the chevalier de Rangogne, whom Bouillan had sent out with a small party to reconnoitre fort St. John. Rangogne, in his march, had taken an English man, who, having escaped, had given the alarm to fort St. John, from whence the English governor had sent out a detachment in pursuit of Rangogne, which killed, wounded, and took prisoners, about sixty of his party. On the 12th Iberville went in a sloop to Rognouse, which was the general rendezvous of the French, where he had an interview with Brouillan. He was surprized to find the latter insist upon his (Iberville's) division attending him to Forillon, and upon his having half the plunder which should be made at St. John's. Iberville put him in mind of the compromise he had entered into on that head; but the other denied it, and insisted so resolutely on what he proposed, that he resolved to abandon all concern in the expedition: but Bouillan, afraid of the consequences, once more desisted from his pretensions, and the whole expedition sailed for the bay of Toulle, lying between Rognouse and St. John's. During their march they understood that one hundred and ten Englishmen were in the bay of Toulle, and that such of them as had been conquered by the governor of Placentia, and the St. Malo men, had lost only their wretched habitations, which they intended to rebuild in the spring. Upon this intelligence, Iberville determined to attack the enemy by the wood, and the Profond was sent back to France with prisoners. Brouillan then renewed his pretensions to the command of the Canadians, to which he appointed de Muys, and treated Iberville with great haughtiness. The behaviour of the Canadians, however, soon made him resume a better temper, and a fresh reconciliation taking place between the two commanders, they continued their march towards the bay of Toulle, in order to attack St. John's, which they did after defeating several small parties of the English, posted to oppose them. Every little skirmish in this expedition is most ridiculously exaggerated, when we consider that the whole garrison of St. John's consisted only of two hundred and fifty men; of whom not above ten or twelve had ever seen a gun fired, the rest being poor fishermen; that they were commanded by an inhabitant of the place, who was appointed by the captains of the ships lying there; and that the fort itself was in a most miserable situation, and in want of every thing, not having wherewithal to subsist upon for twenty-four hours, nor a bit of wood to burn. After the French had sent in their summons for surrendering, the commandant endeavoured to gain time, because he had seen two large ships, which he thought to be English, two days before, endeavouring to make the bay. The French officers, having a suspicion of his intention, demanded his answer upon the spot, with which he was obliged to comply. The terms he obtained were, that two ships should be allowed him for carrying his garrison to England; that no person should be rifled, and that such of the English as had a mind to settle at Bonaventure might repair thither with all safety. It was remarkable, that Brouillan did not pay Iberville even the compliment of desiring him to sign the capitulation. Surrender of fort St. John;

THE two ships we have mentioned, who were English, understanding the place was taken, immediately sailed for England. As to the French they seem to have behaved in a very unmanly manner to the poor defenceless English inhabitants; whom they pillaged and imprisoned. When the division of the booty came in question a fresh misunderstanding, which had almost proved fatal, broke out between the two French commanders; but its effects were prevented by a prudent mediation. Brouillan proposed to preserve the fort and its dependencies, and to make de Muys governor of it, to which Iberville consented, provided none of his Canadians were left in garrison. De Muys refused to accept the command on that condition; upon which a resolution was taken to abandon their conquest, and to set fire to the fort, and all the houses in or near it that were still standing. This being executed, Brouillan and de Muys returned to Placentia, while Iberville and his Canadians carried on their operations in the eastern parts of the island; so that in two months time the English lost all their settlements in Newfoundland, but those of Bonaville and the island of Carboniere. The first of those posts was too well fortified to be surprized by the handful of Canadians and savages that Iberville commanded. As to the isle of Carboniere it is almost inaccessible in the winter, and it contained above three hundred English, who had flocked thither from all parts of the island, and had put it into so good a posture of defence, that Iberville durst do nothing against it. His scheme was to have attacked it first; in which case, it probably would have fallen into his hands. The French pretended that during this campaign they made six or seven hundred English prisoners, who, being sent to Placentia, escaped from thence, there being there no place of safety for their confinement; an excuse so frivolous that it renders the other particulars of their relation * the more questionable (I). After all, Iberville's boasted conquests in Newfoundland on this occasion seem to have been little better than roving from one post to another; for he was obliged to abandon them all, and to return to Placentia, in hopes of succours from France, which never arrived; those which came being destined, as we have already seen, for another expedition, which proved unsuccessful.

A new fishery projected.

It is of importance to this history now that the English are masters of New France, to mention that in the year 1697, one Riverin, an active enterprizing Frenchman, projected, at Mount Lewis, which lies on the south coast of the river St. Laurence, about half way between Quebec and the sea, and is provided with a noble harbour, a fishery. A society of French merchants had formed themselves for improving those kinds of fisheries upon that river; and this situation was particularly proper for such a settlement; but when the undertakers had provided ship-falt, with every thing necessary for their purpose, and were ready to embark, the governor-general, in consequence of his orders from Europe, laid an embargo upon their voyage, which discouraged the society so much, that for that time they gave over their undertaking. Riverin, however, was not discouraged, but by the assistance of the few settlers at St. Lewis, prosecuted it with so much success that it was afterwards resumed.

Frontenac
an expedition.

ALL the spring of this year, Frontenac had on foot a respectable body of regulars and militia in New France, to be in readiness to execute the orders of his court when he should be called upon; and thereby he kept the Iroquois in awe; by which his government was restored to a tolerable state of tranquillity. He had made propositions to the four superior cantons, and had given them till June this year for returning an answer: after which, he threatened to march against the Iroquois with the whole of his force, and to begin with the Agniers, against whom he was to send five hundred men. His threats seem to have had no meaning; for, making no impression upon the Agniers, he countermanded the expedition, and was obliged at the same time to support, with the necessaries of life, the Iroquois Christians, who, by holding themselves ready to serve in the expedition, had neglected their hunting, and were in a most deplorable condition. Matters were in this situation when he received from Old France a fresh ordonnance, by which all officers in out posts were prohibited, under pain of cashiering and degradation, and the soldiers under pain of the galleys, to carry on any commerce whatever. The same ordonnance extended to travellers and rangers of all denominations, who, when detected, were to be sent prisoners to the government, and if found guilty, were to be condemned to the galleys. This ordonnance aimed so considerable a blow against the governor-general's power as well as profit, that he made remonstrances against it at court. But all was to no effect. Pontchartrain repeated the orders, and maintained that they were for the interest both of the colony and the savages; who would thereby have French goods at the first hand from the northern company. Notwithstanding this, it appears pretty plain that the commerce still continued, and Frontenac

* CHARLEVOIX, Vol. III. p. 289.

(I) The jesuit, in this period of his history, takes occasion to extol the intrepidity, valour, and the good qualities, both civil and military, of his countrymen in North America, and, at the same time, represents the English and their governors as so many brutes, intent only upon cultivating their lands, and improving their commerce, which, by the bye, we apprehend to be the chief, if not the sole end of all colonies. The event of the conquest of all French North America, by those English, whom he represents as being so despicable, shews how very fallible the father's judgment of the two people was. The truth is, men, who, as officers, would be but barely mentioned in an English history or narrative, are magnified by the French into herces, philosophers, the wisest of men, and the best of Christians.

a either paid very little regard to the ordonnance, or found means to elude the execution of it.

THE advantage which the Abenakis, and the other French Indians had obtained the preceding year over the English and their savages allies, still continued to flatter Frontenac with the hopes that fear would prevail upon the Iroquois to join the French. The Black Cauldron, who continued to be in high credit with his nation, and to be the irreconcilable enemy of the French, at the head of a party advanced towards fort Cataracouy, where he informed la Gomeraye, the French commandant, that the elders of the four superior cantons were set out to treat of a peace at Quebec. La Gomeraye suspected his sincerity; and Frontenac sent him orders not to provoke the Iroquois, but without any noise to endeavour to get into his hands one or two of the chiefs of the Black Cauldron party. Before this order came, thirty-four young Algonquins attacked and cut in pieces the Black Cauldron and his party, excepting a few whom they made prisoners. Charlevoix calls this a noble action of the Algonquins, though he seems to own, at the same time, that the Black Cauldron and his party, depending on the faith of the negotiation, were hunting without any mistrust in the neighbourhood of Cataracouy, and were there destroyed. Soon after, Oureoubaré came to Quebec, where he gave Frontenac the strongest assurances of the good disposition of his canton of Goyogouin towards the French; but in a few days after he fell ill of a pleurisy, which carried him off, to the vast regret of Frontenac and all the French, who bestow extraordinary encomiums upon his piety, fidelity, and virtues. In the month of February 1698, the French in Canada had advice by four English traders of the peace of Ryswick being concluded, which, in May following, was confirmed by colonel Schuyler, who arrived at Quebec with nineteen French prisoners, and a letter from the earl of Bellamont, governor of New England, demanding the release of all the subjects of the king his master, who were detained prisoners in New France, English, as well as Indians, promising to send all the French savages who were prisoners in his government, under a good escort, if necessary, to Montreal. Frontenac agreed to the release of the English prisoners; but evaded the other demand of releasing the Iroquois, as the reader may see in the history of New England. He likewise pretended that he had no power to oblige the Canibas, and the other French savages who were settled on the borders of Acadia, to release the English prisoners. In short, the whole of Frontenac's answer was a piece of mere chicanery; and it is plain from the relation of Charlevoix himself, that his great intention was to make use of the peace to divide the English from their Indian allies. Schuyler, and one Mr. Dellius, who was joined with him in the negotiation, were obliged to be contented, with this answer; and two months after their departure, the fruits of Frontenac's artifices and infidelity were seen by the Agniers throwing into the fire all the papers which passed between them and the English government, relating to the purchase or payment of their native lands, as an evidence that they looked upon all such negotiations to be invalid, and that they were resolved to be independent of the English. This ceremony being over, they offered to detain all the Iroquois of St. Lewis's fall, who were with them till Frontenac should send back their countrymen, who were prisoners in his government. The earl, as appears from the accounts of the French themselves, honestly rejected the proposal, and offered to negotiate a peace between them and the French. Frontenac, who was informed of all those particulars by the savages of St. Lewis's fall, resolved to improve the misunderstanding between the Agniers and the English. Being informed that some of the Agniers were paying a visit to their countrymen of the fall of St. Lewis, between whom a very tender affection still subsisted even during war-time, he gave those savages a most polite invitation to repair to Montreal, where they were for some weeks highly caressed, and nothing was wanting that could inspire them with a jealousy and hatred of the English. It is sufficient, at this time, to add, that Frontenac's conduct on this occasion drew from the earl a very severe letter, which was answered in the same terms. The Frenchman, however, failed in his main point.

The Black Cauldron killed.

The peace of Ryswick concluded.

Artifice of Frontenac.

New differences with the English.

WHILE this controversy was on foot another started up. Mr. Dellius, in his return from Quebec, stopt at Montreal, where he roundly demanded Michilimakinac, and all the lands to the southward of that post, in the name of the English governor; as having formerly belonged to New Belgia, now New York; of which the English had obtained the full cession from the Dutch. Callieres, on the other hand, pretended that those posts had belonged to the French long before the Dutch had a foot of ground in America; nor do we find that the demand was farther insisted on. Of all the thorns to the English government in America, the savages on the side of Acadia were the most severe; which induced the former to think of rebuilding fort Pemmaquid, and to people both sides of the river Kennebeck, both which projects met with strong opposition on the part of Villebon, the French governor of Acadia. All this while the courts, both of France and England, were in the dark as to the limits between the two nations in Canada, and commissaries were named for fixing them by both crowns. As that dispute is now at an end by the cession of the whole country to the English, it is needless to resume the argument here. The Iroquois acted more wisely than either of those nations, and, at this time, actually held the ballance of power in North America. They declared themselves independent of both, and neither cared to provoke them, for fear of throwing them into the arms of the other. This year died count de Frontenac, in the 78th year of his age, after supporting, under prodigious disadvantages, the interests of Canada during his long government. It is certain, that the court of France had received from the jesuits, and the northern company, very false impressions of that colony, and Frontenac was often obliged to encounter vast difficulties, and which a man of any other character but his, must have sunk under. But though he could not always surmount them, he always was equal to them. One amazing reflexion arises from the history of his administration, which is, that though France then boasted itself to be the most powerful kingdom on earth, yet she never was able to furnish that public support to the government of Canada which its affairs required. This was owing to two causes, the first was, that the perpetual wars his most Christian majesty was engaged in Europe, did not admit of his sending but very few troops to New France. The second was, the inconstant volatile temper of the Canadians, and the French themselves, who could not conform themselves to those painful industrious habits, which alone can render a colony powerful and flourishing; and which were so natural to the English. But what is still more extraordinary is, that the toil and fatigue, which those very people suffered in their marches against the Indians and the English, were greater than all that was necessary for cultivating, improving, and fortifying their country.

So great was the reputation, which Frontenac held in his life-time amongst the savages, that upon his death the Iroquois thought of breaking the treaty, or, rather, the neutrality they had entered into with him. Callieres, during the vacancy of the government, acted as governor-general; and those savages in the month of March sent deputies to Montreal, on pretence of bewailing the late governor's death, but, in reality, to learn the state of the colony, now that he was no more. They presented to Callieres three French prisoners, and promised to send him all the others they detained, provided he would set at liberty all he had of their countrymen. They begged him, at the same time, to send de Maricourt, a Canadian gentlemen, and two of the French Indians with them to Orange, where they proposed to make the exchanges, and to conclude the peace. In short, they represented to him, that as long as he suffered the war kettle to remain on the fire, and his allies to keep their hatchets in their hands, they could not trust him. Callieres replied, that he was determined to treat at Montreal, and not at Orange, and that before he entered into any negotiation, he must be satisfied that they were sincerely disposed to fulfil all the terms that had been imposed upon them by the late governor-general. He then, at their own request, gave them a truce for sixty days, and indulged them in some other matters of small consequence; but in the main was very ill received, having some reason to believe that all their intention was, by degrees, to draw their own prisoners out of the hands of the French before they entered upon hostilities. They then took their leave, promising to return before the month of June. By this negotiation it appears pretty plain, that after the death of Frontenac the English recovered their ascendancy over the savages; for the earl of Bellamont, at that very time, was in treaty with their heads, or sachems at Penobscot, and they had promised to be directed by him in their future negotiations with the French.

THE chevalier de Callieres was nominated by the court of France to succeed the count de Frontenac as governor-general of Canada, to the disappointment of de Champigny, the intendant, who expected the preference. His promotion, on account of his well-known abilities and valour, was extremely agreeable to the colony. As he had neither birth, rank, nor alliances equal to those of his predecessor; neither did he possess his violences, haughtiness, and prejudices, and his great moderation gave the colony hopes of living at more ease under his government, than they had done under that of his predecessor. About the same time Vaudreuil, who had lately returned from France, and was likewise an officer of great merit, was appointed to the government of Montreal. Fort Cataracouy was now become a post of so much importance, that his most Christian majesty left the nomination of its commandant to the governor-general, who had it in charge to bestow it on none, whom he could not depend on for acting without orders, if accidents and circumstances of affairs should so require. Those precautions were the more necessary as the governor of New England had brought a claim against some of the Abenakis tribes, the most faithful allies the French had in America; as if the Canibas, by being settled on the river Kennebeck, were actual subjects of England. De Callieres received orders from his court to conclude nothing definitive with the savages till after the limits in North America were fixed; but he had so good an opinion of the Abenakis, that he left the management of their negotiation with the English, to themselves. The preliminaries they insisted upon with the English governor were, first,

a first, that he should order all the English to retire out of their country. Secondly, that he was not to pretend they owed any allegiance to the crown of England, because they professed themselves to be the voluntary and faithful subjects of his most Christian majesty, from whom alone, and his generals, they were determined to receive orders. Thirdly, that they should be at liberty to permit the French, and no other nation, not even the English, to settle upon their lands. Fourthly, that they heard, with some surprise, the English governor intended to send amongst them other missionaries than French; but that they never would change their religion; for which they were resolved, if necessary, to fight and to die.

It is certain, that the bickerings between the French and the English in North America hurt both parties, without benefiting either; so that the two courts ordered a cessation of all hostilities to take place there. His most Christian majesty's letter for this effect came under the earl of Bellamont's cover, to be by him forwarded to Callieres, who, in like manner, was honoured with the delivery of his Britannic majesty's letter to the earl. Callieres, notwithstanding the confidence he had in the Abenakis, was so anxious about the success of the negotiation with the English, that he sent la Valiere, the major of Montreal, with father Bruyas to Boston, where they were to negotiate the exchange of prisoners, and to inform themselves in what condition the negotiation between the English and the Abenakis stood, or how the English governor was affected as to the proposed reconciliation between the Abenakis and the Iroquois. The latter had of late committed some hostilities against the Miamis, of whom they had killed a number. Notwithstanding this the Iroquois in general were well disposed towards peace, and the earl of Bellamont omitted nothing to render himself the arbiter of it. It happened that Callieres had obtained a duplicate of the orders the earl had received from his master, by which he was instructed to oblige the Iroquois to disarm themselves. Callieres finding that he could not get the better of Bellamont's interest with those savages, sent copies of this letter all over their cantons, that they might see the English regarded them only as their subjects. He likewise signified to them that they were to expect no assistance from New York, because his Britannic majesty had expressly ordered his American governors to give them no assistance either directly or indirectly. At the same time he gave them to understand, that it would be no difficult matter for him to reduce them to accept the terms proposed by his predecessor, now that they were deprived of the assistance of the English. The cantons still observed their former policy in endeavouring to live well, both with the French and the English, to whom they said they would behave as brothers, but not as subjects, which the English appeared to be satisfied with; but Callieres still persisted to press them to a decisive resolution to accept the terms proposed by his predecessor. To evade this they endeavoured to gain time from the 21st of March to the month of July, 1700. Three months after this, a number of the Outaouais landed at Montreal to justify their conduct towards the Iroquois, whose cause Callieres espoused. On the 18th of July two deputies from the canton of Onnontague, and four from that of Tsonmonthouan, had a very formal audience of the governor, to whom they made great professions of friendship, pretending that they had powers of deputation from all the four upper cantons; and that the reason why no deputies were with them from the cantons of Goyogouin and Onneyouth, was, that they were gone to New England to enquire into the reasons why the earl of Bellamont had sent Schuyler to dissuade them from repairing to Montreal. They then complained that while they thought themselves safe under the treaty between France and England, in which they were comprehended, they had been attacked by the Outaouais, the Illinois, and the Miamis, who had killed them one hundred and fifty men, and they begged of the governor to send along with them father Bruyas, Maricourt, and Joncaire, who were in great credit with their cantons, and into whose hands they would deliver all the French prisoners in their country.

His negotiations with the earl of Bellamont.

CALLIERES, in answer, expressed his surprise that the deputies of the Goyogouins and the Onneyouths, instead of coming along with their brethren, should wait upon the English governor upon a point that could require no farther explanation, after the conclusion of the treaty between the French and the English. He added, that what they had suffered was owing to themselves, having at first attacked the Miamis, and having so long trifled with him in the affair of the peace, and that he had done all he could with his allies to prevent all hostilities during the negotiations. That he was sorry for what had happened, but that to prevent the like accidents in time to come he had ordered all his allies to send their deputies in thirty days to treat; and that if they (the Iroquois) were sincerely inclined to peace, they would likewise order deputies from all their cantons to be present. That in such a case, all the war kettles should be overthrown; the great tree of peace established, the rivers cleaned, the roads made strait, and that every one then might go and return as he thought proper. As to the missionary, and the two officers they required, he consented and conference with the Iroquois deputies.

to their going along with them, but upon condition that they should bring back with them a deputies furnished with full powers to conclude a durable peace; that upon their arrival at Montreal all the Iroquois prisoners should be set at liberty; but that some of the deputies there present should remain as hostages with the three persons who were to go along with the others. Upon this four of the deputies offered to become hostages; and being accepted of, the rest of the audience passed in good humour, only the Abenakis and the Christian Iroquois were far from being so complaisant as the governor-general had been to the Iroquois deputies, but treated them with great freedom and many reproaches.

A French embassy sent to Onnontague.

WHEN Callières took his leave of this assembly he declared that he would wait till the month of September for the grand deputation. The three French ambassadors, when they came to the canton of Onnontague, were received with unprecedented demonstrations of joy, b and conducted to the chief township in triumph. Teganissorens on this occasion acted as the mouth of the canton, and harangued them in the most polite, but friendly manner, which was the more agreeable to the ambassadors, as they knew that he was sincere. Being introduced under repeated discharges of a numerous musketry into their grand council-hall, they there found deputies from all the upper cantons. There father Bruyas, who was the spokesman of the French, presented them with three belts. By the first he intimated, that Ononchio was their father, and the English governor no more than their brother; and that therefore they ought in all events to behave to him as children, whether they were in friendship with the English or not. By the second belt he signified the high regard which his brethren the missionaries still entertained for the Iroquois nation, notwithstanding all the sufferings they had undergone, and their condolence upon their losing many of their chiefs of great distinction. The third belt expressed the sincere desire for peace, which they knew Ononchio had; and which he was willing to grant them, provided they acted by him with the same candor, and agreed to the conditions which he, the missionary, was ready to lay before them. c

Proceedings of the great assembly of the Iroquois.

THIS speech was received by the assembly with vast seeming satisfaction, and was succeeded by another from Maricourt, which turned upon the great power of Ononchio, and the inability they were under to resist him if they should reject his terms, which he held forth to be extremely reasonable. As those savages always require time to deliberate on the propositions made to them, they met next day in council, where a young Englishman d and an old Onnontagué presented themselves from the earl of Bellamont, putting them on their guard against the practices of the French, and informing them that his lordship expected them in ten or twelve days at Orange, where they should know his farther pleasure. So imperious a message, far from winning over the assembly, disgusted them entirely. "I know not (said Teganissorens) what my brother can mean in endeavouring to dissuade us from hearing the voice of my father, and in singing the war-song, at a time when every thing invites us to peace." This temper of the assembly was improved by the missionary to his own purposes. He animadverted on the haughtiness of the English, who wanted to treat them as their subjects; and what they were to expect should they let slip the opportunity now offered them, and this point was farther pressed by Joncaire, who observed e that the view of the English in being so solicitous to dissuade them from peace, could only be, that they might weaken themselves by war, so as to be unable to resist their tyranny.

NOTHING decisive seems to have happened that day; for upon the assembly's breaking up, Joncaire, who had his cabin among the Tsonnonthouans, that is, who was adopted into that canton, and had all the privileges of a native, set out thither, and was received with the highest demonstrations of regard and affection. His business was to reclaim the French prisoners who were there, and whose liberty was immediately granted them. What followed, though extraordinary, is natural. Most, or all, of those prisoners had been adopted likewise; and the life of a savage was, in their eyes, so much preferable to that of a French f Canadian, that they refused to return to their country. This circumstance may be easily accounted for. Amongst the savages they enjoyed in full extent, not only that freedom, which they could not find under French government, but, if they were industrious, more abundance; because, what they acquired by hunting and sowing was their own, untaxed and unimpaired by the griping hand of power. Not to mention that the civil and military duties amongst the French were more irksome and laborious than amongst the savages. Some of those captives, therefore, rather than follow Joncaire, concealed themselves, while others flatly told him they would remain where they were.

Their resolutions favourable to the French.

MEAN time, the general council of all the Iroquois nation was reassembled at Onnontague, to pronounce their definitive resolution, and the young Englishman was present. Teganissorens continued to be the mouth of the assembly, and declared to the French ambassadors, that his nation was resolved to hear the voice of its father, and instantly to send two deputies g a ties from each canton to Montreal. "I do nothing in secret, said he, (addressing himself to the Englishman, in the name of his whole nation,) inform my brother Corlar, who sent thee hither, that I am setting out for Quebec, there to receive the orders of my father Onontario, and to plant the tree of peace. I, after that, will go to Orange, and learn the will of my brother Corlar." Teganissorens then laid five belts at the feet of the ambassadors, and father Bruyas pressed the assembly to dispatch the deputation, that they might arrive time enough to confer with the deputies of the upper cantons. But though *Charlevoix*⁹ has, in honour to his order, one of which was at the head of the embassy, represented this negotiation in a favourable light for the French, yet it is highly improbable that matters were carried on so smoothly as he has represented. The declaration which the earl of Bellamont had made by his master's order, that he would no longer support the Indians against the French, no doubt made an unfavourable impression upon those savages; but it is plain that their real intention was not to break with the English, if they could avoid it; and, notwithstanding all the jesuits could do, the English Iroquois were at least as well disposed to protestantism as to popery; though the bulk of the nation was indifferent as to both. The jesuits were alarmed when they understood that lord Bellamont had even prevailed upon them to receive Protestant missionaries, who had been successful in making profelytes; and that they could not bring the natives to expel them. It must, indeed, be owned that the jesuits, for the reasons we have already given, were far more active, and more pains-taking than the Protestants at this time. The zealous sect of New England ministers, who made the conversion of the Indians a work of conscience, was now worn out, that colony being planted with men, who regarded religion chiefly as it was connected with interest; and the English divines lived too comfortably at home to hunt for danger in making conversions abroad.

The jesuits alarmed.

THE Onnontague and the Goyogouin deputies set out with the French ambassadors on their return to Montreal. They were all of them conducted in great state to Gannentaba, where they expected to be joined by the Onneyouth deputies; but that canton, which it seems did not chuse to part with their prisoners, only sent them a belt, pretending that their chief deputy was indisposed. Soon after, Joncaire joined them with six deputies from the Tsonnonthouans and three French prisoners, which were all he could deliver. While the ambassadors and the deputies were ready to embark, a Tsonnonthouan arrived at Gannentaba from Orange, with an account that the governor of New York, irritated at the proceedings of the Iroquois, had not only put in irons an Onneyouth, who was suspected of having killed an Englishman, but had seized upon all the furs belonging to the Iroquois at Orange; that he had hoisted a red flag, had ordered the Mabingans to begin the war against the cantons, and threatened to come in person to chastise them. The Iroquois pretended to the French, that they received those menaces with indignation. When they came to Montreal, where the deputies of the upper cantons were waiting, they were received under a discharge of artillery, which gave offence to the savage allies of the French. When the assembly met, the Iroquois orator magnified the vast deference which their cantons had paid to Bruyas, in having, at his desire, suspended all hostilities against their enemies. He then affected to treat the New York governor's menaces with contempt; but artfully added, that as it was probable their nation must now go to war with the English; they hoped to find at Catarocouy not only the merchandizes they used to be furnished with at Orange, but arms and ammunition for their defence. The answer Callieres made to this harangue was very civil, and he gave the deputies to the month of August the following year for releasing the remaining French prisoners, and those of the French Indian allies. In the mean while, he referred them upon no account to revenge any private quarrels amongst themselves, but to refer them to him, and promised to do all he could to obtain a like order on the part of the earl of Bellamont. As to their request about fort Catarocouy, he said he should lay it before the king his master, but that in the mean while he would send thither an officer with some merchandizes, and a smith.

Grand congress at Montreal.

THIS answer highly pleased the assembly, and a provisional treaty was agreed on conformable to what had been communicated by the governor-general. The manner in which this treaty was signed was very particular. After Callieres and his officers, civil and military, with the ecclesiastics, had put their hands to it, each of the savage nations signed it with a particular figure peculiar to themselves. The Onnontague and Tsonnonthouans delineated a spider. The Goyogouins, a calumet or pipe of peace; the Onneyouths, a piece of cleft wood with a stone in it; the Agniers, a bear; the Hurons, a beaver; the Abenakis, a kid, and the Outaouais a hare (K). This treaty is dated the 8th of September 1700. It ap-

Remarkable signatures.

⁹ CHARLEVOIX, Vol. III. p. 357.

(K) Charlevoix acknowledges that neither the Agniers nor the Onneyouths had any deputies at this congress; what degree of authority therefore is due to their signatures, unless it appeared, which it does not, that they had commissioned some one to sign for them?

appears that the earl of Bellamont's views were not to excite a war between the Iroquois and the French or their allies, but to prevent those savages from uniting under the French government, whose territories lay much more convenient than those of the English did for effecting such an union. Callieres, on the other hand, whose views were really pacific, knew the vast advantages, in case of another rupture between France and England, that such an union would produce to the former. Thus the whole dispute was a kind of a trial of skill between the two governors rather than the two crowns.

Views of the French and English.

Bad policy of
governor.

CALLIERES, in pursuance of this plan, laboured to make it as extensive as possible. He dispatched Courtemanche, and another agent, to the most distant tribes in the North and the West, to persuade such of them as had not sent their deputies, to accede to the provisional treaty, and to send deputies to the meeting, which was to be held the following August, that it might be general, in order to conclude a definitive treaty. Those measures being resolved on, Callieres gave advice of them to Pontchartrain, and informed him, that it would be possible, in the approaching congress about boundaries, to get some signal advantages to France. If during the course of the negotiation she could not obtain the property of the Iroquois country, it ought at least to be declared neutral; and that it should be unlawful either for the French or the English to make any settlement upon it. With regard to missionaries, he thought there could be no danger to the French interest to admit the English ministers to act as such amongst the savages. Lord Bellamont perhaps on this occasion did not act with so much moderation, or indeed justice. The English had always sought to avail themselves of the cessions of lands made to them by the savages, who paid very little regard to such deeds, and often pretended that they had been outwitted or intoxicated when they agreed to them, having received for them no valuable consideration. Though there sometimes was but too good foundation for those remonstrances, yet it is certain the English were far more justifiable in that respect than the French, the latter having never given any consideration for their vast possessions in America, while the most considerable of the English had been purchased and duly paid for to the natives. The earl of Bellamont demanded (we must think very impolitically, if true, for we have it only upon Charlevoix's word) that the Iroquois should hang all the jesuit missionaries who came amongst them, and he proposed to build forts in the cantons of Agnier, Onneyouth, and Onnontague; and one particularly at the mouth of the river Choguen, lying near lake Ontario. But the natives seemed to be so much shocked at those propositions, that his lordship did not think proper to insist upon them. About this time, Riverin attempted to re-establish his fishery at mount Lewis; but through the avarice and villainy of those he was concerned with, his project again fell to nothing. We are now to attend affairs in the other parts of Canada.

His administration.

THE English still continued to fish upon the coasts of Acadia, but it appears as if the French court had cooled in its zeal for the re-establishment of that colony. A son or relation of le Borgne, whom we have already mentioned about the time of the peace of Ryswick, in right of his predecessors of that name claimed the property of all the peninsula of Acadia, reaching from cape les Mines towards L'isle Verte to the West; and in consequence of this claim, the English, notwithstanding the peace, continued still to trade upon the coast of Acadia, on pretence of being authorized by le Borgne, to whom they paid fifty crowns for each ship. All that Villebon could do was to erect fort de Naxoat on the river St. John; but receiving no assistance from France, it was of very little use. We continued, however, to make such representations to the French court, that an engineer was sent over, by whose advice, in the year 1700, the inhabitants of Naxoat were transported to Port Royal. No care, however, being taken to fortify that settlement, on any part of the coasts of Acadia, the English still went on to engross the fishing trade there, and are charged by the French with the same practices they themselves have ever been charged with by the English, and in almost the same terms. Upon the breaking out of the war in the year 1702, no care had been yet taken to fortify Port Royal, and the other posts on the coast of Acadia; but the importance of that province appeared now so evident to the French court that de Callieres received the strongest assurances that new missionaries should be sent to Acadia for converting the natives, and that proper measures should be taken for peopling the colony with French. The bishop of Quebec, who was then in France, undertook the former province, as the court did the latter; but such was the state of the French affairs in Europe, that both projects fell to the ground.

Broullan
governor.

By this time Villebon was dead; but was succeeded in his government of Acadia by de Broullan who had been governor of Placentia. He found the affairs of his province in a most miserable situation. The Bostoners and the New England men had ravished all the sea-coasts, and had either driven the inhabitants into the woods, or carried them prisoners to Boston, from whence they sent most lamentable complaints of cruel usage. An order had come from the English government, that none of the French prisoners there should be exchanged;

a changed; and a French captain, one Baptiste, was threatened with hanging, on pretence of his being a pirate. De Brouillan upon this, sent an express, acquainting the English governor of Boston, that he would make use of reprisals, in case he should put his threats in execution against Baptiste; which saved the captain's life. This messenger did a more important service to the French in America; for while he was at Boston he discovered that the English were making preparations for attacking Quebec; and upon his return de Brouillan sent advice of the same to the governor-general of New France, by which means he had so early an intelligence, that the expedition miscarried. It is certain that the affairs of the English government were at that time very ill managed on the coasts of North America, where a squadron of their men of war was commanded by admiral Graydon, a corrupt brutal officer, and a disgrace to the marine service of his country. It is true, the New England men found their account in ravaging the French coasts; but only a few particulars were benefited; for the national service was neglected. It may be proper to inform our readers, that we have carried the affairs of this province thus far, that they may not interfere with the more general history of Canada, to which we now return.

DE CALLIERES continued his indefatigable endeavours to effect his favourite measure of uniting all the savages of North America, and thereby establishing a general peace amongst them; but an unforeseen accident had almost ruined his labours. The Iroquois, after their deputies had returned to their own country, had gone to hunt upon lands which had been appropriated immemorably to the huntings of the Outaouais, and had there destroyed some beaver huts. The Outaouais, provoked by so unjust an invasion of their property, fell upon a party of the Iroquois hunters, killed some of them, and carried off their chief, prisoner. The Iroquois in their turn resented this hostility, and would immediately have made severe reprisals, had not their deputies put them in mind of their promise to refer all their differences to Ononthe. This pacified them for the present, and a fresh deputation was nominated, which, on the 2d of March, 1701, reached Montreal, where they found the governor, and laid before him their grievances, praying that he would interpose for the delivery of their chief, who had been carried prisoner to Michillimakinac. Callieres endeavoured to excuse the Outaouais for what had happened, as the party who had committed the hostility did not then know of the treaty that had been concluded. He promised, at the same time, to procure the release of their chief, and assured them, that they should not suffer by referring their complaints to him. The deputies found no fault with this answer. But on the 5th of May, Teganifforens, attended by a good number of Iroquois chiefs, arrived at Montreal. Their business was not only to renew the complaints against the Outaouais, but to be informed whether there was any truth in the report, that the governor-general intended to make a settlement upon the strait, that communicates between lake Huron and lake Erie, which, by way of eminence, is called Detroit? and whether the war was ready to break out again in Europe between England and France? With regard to the Outaouais, Callieres answered as he had done before; but the settlement was a matter of more importance, because it was a measure he actually had resolved upon. All he would say was, that he could not perceive how either the cantons or the English could take any umbrage about Detroit, as it belonged to himself. That all he meant by establishing such a settlement was to preserve all the nations in peace, and that he had given orders to the person who was to act for him at the settlement in question, to accommodate all the differences that might happen amongst his allies. During the course of this conversation, it appeared that lord Bellamont had at that time the very same design, and that Detroit was one of the places he had mentioned to the Iroquois deputies for erecting a fort. The knowledge of this rendered Callieres still more obliging to the deputies; assuring them that he would treat them as his own children; and that all he was doing was for their good. Teganifforens replied nothing on this head, and frankly owned that the elders of his canton would report his answer to the English; but de Callieres made very light of that circumstance, and gave no direct answer to another request made by Teganifforens, that in case the war should be renewed between the two crowns, the cantons might not be obliged to take any share in it. Callieres, upon Teganifforens leaving Montreal, sent his three former ambassadors along with him to Onnontague, both to do him honour, and to assist in bringing back the French prisoners, who still remained in that canton. The ambassadors were surprized when they arrived at Onnontague, to find Englishmen mingled with the savages who came out to meet them. The truth was, that an Englishman, whom Charlevoix calls Abraham, had arrived at Onnontague, on the part of lord Bellamont, to endeavour to dissuade the elders of the canton from sending their deputies to the August congress; and some of this Abraham's retinue had gone out with the savages to meet the ambassadors.

Quarrel amongst the savages.

Apology of Callieres, who is pressed by the Indian deputies.

The latter were conducted into the principal village with the same honours as before, and the ambassadors were introduced alone into the assembly of their elders. There, father Bruyas taguese, Proceedings of the Onnontague.

Bruyas spoke very sharply on their negotiations with the English, and threatened that Onontio would no longer treat with the Iroquois, if they did not send their deputies along with those of the other nations to the grand congress, which was to establish a general peace amongst them all. He added, that very possibly wars might be renewed between the French and the English, but that the interest of the cantons led them to observe a strict neutrality. It was three days after this speech was made, before the subject of the embassy was resumed; and the English were introduced into the meeting, where Teganissorens immediately presented a belt to Abraham, exhorting him not to oppose the accommodation that was ready to be concluded between the canton and the French. He then laid another belt at the feet of Bruyas, giving freedom to all the prisoners in the canton, and expressed the resolution it had come to, in the following lively terms, “ I open all my gates, (said he, still speaking in the character of his canton,) I stop no body. I want to live in good correspondence with my father Onontio, and my brother Corlar; I hold each of them by a hand, and am resolved hereafter never to divide myself, either from one or the other. Five deputies are to go to Montreal, and two others to Orange. For my own part, I will lie still on my mat, to convince all the world, that I take no party, and that I am resolved to observe an exact neutrality.”

prisoners.

THIS declaration from the mouth of Teganissorens, who was known to have so much authority in his canton, and to be a firm friend to the French, gave great pleasure to Bruyas and Maricourt, who had already sent Joncaire to Tsonnonthouan, as they had another Frenchman, one la Chauvignerie, to Onneyouth. Soon after Villedonné, a French officer, arrived with the agreeable news, that the deputies of all the nations were on the road to Montreal. This intelligence, however, was somewhat qualified by the return of Chauvignerie from Onneyouth, with an account that he had found that canton in a very bad disposition towards the French; and that he was not able to bring from thence a single prisoner. This was likewise the case with the Onnontaguese. Teganissorens declared to the deputies, that all the French who lived in the canton had been adopted by the natives, and most part of them being married, their friends and relations refused to consent to their release; and they themselves being equally averse, nothing could be done in the affair; and that he was much grieved to find himself under the dismal necessity of being worse than his word to his father. The ambassadors knew the character of Teganissorens and his canton too well to endeavour, to reason either the one or the other out of what had been resolved on. They were therefore obliged to dissemble, otherwise all the credit of Teganissorens could not have prevented his countrymen from throwing themselves into the hands of the English. The whole of this negotiation appears to have been conducted by the savages with exquisite address, and proves of what singular advantage their personal independency upon all superiors was to them in the affairs of government; because if their deputies ever exceeded their instructions, or concluded any thing disagreeable to their constituents, the latter always thought themselves at liberty to withhold their consent.

Success of Joncaire with the On-nontaguese.

THE ambassadors, for obvious reasons, still concealed their discontent, but Joncaire succeeded better with the Goyogouins and the Tsonnonthouans, from whom he brought deputies with several prisoners; and their example had such an effect upon the Onnontaguese, that they gave up five French captives. The Onneyouths likewise sent deputies, and the ambassadors, attended by two hundred Iroquois, arrived at Montreal, the 21st of July. We have already mentioned Courtemanche and father Anjelran having been sent by Callieres to Michilimakinac, where Anjelran treated with the Outaouais and the Hurons, while Courtemanche went to the river St. John, where he found the Miamis, the Pouteouatamis, the Sokokis, the Oniagamis, the Hurons, and the Mahingans; and most of them preparing to go to war with the Iroquois. Courtemanche threatened them, the Miamis in particular, with the governor-general's indignation, if they did not alter their intention, upon which they not only commanded their warriors, but recalled their war-parties. He had more difficulty in persuading them to give up the Iroquois prisoners, whom they had adopted, but he succeeded even in that; and all of them promised to send deputies to the general congress. Courtemanche then visited the Illinois; all of them, excepting the cantons of Kaskaskias, were likewise preparing to go to war with the Iroquois, but he reconciled them to more pacific intentions by the same arguments he had used with the Miamis; as he likewise did the Ouyatanons, a Miamis nation, who were going to war with the Sieux and the Iroquois; and all of them, in like manner, promised to send deputies to Montreal. He had the same success, but with more difficulty, with the Mascontins, amongst whom he arrived the 5th of May. He then continued his route to the bay of Puantes, where he arrived the 14th, and there found the Sakis, the Otchagros, the Malbomines, the Outagamis, the Pouteouatamis, and the Kicapous; and, reconciling all differences amongst them, he persuaded them likewise to send their deputies to Montreal. On the 2d of July, he returned to Michilimakinac, after travelling a above four hundred leagues. Every thing there having been settled by Angelran, he set out for Montreal, with two Iroquois prisoners, whom he had recovered out of the hands of the Outaouais, while Courtemanche remained at Michillimakinac; from whence he set out for Montreal with a fleet of a hundred and eighty canoes, carrying between seven and eight hundred savages; but thirty of the canoes were sent back with their sick. When they arrived, on the 22d of July, at Montreal, they were received under a discharge of the artillery; and the Rat, in the name of all the other savages, complimented the governor-general.

CALLIERES thought proper, before he held the general congress, to sound all the deputies one by one; and then a kind of preliminary congress was held, in which an Outaouais, called John the White from the fairness of his complexion, made presents to Onontio, and harangued him with great applause. He was followed by other Algonquin chiefs. The drift of all their speeches was, that he should diminish the prices of the French merchandise, and take off their hands the smaller furs, because the beaver skins were becoming scarce. The Rat, on whom Callieres depended greatly for the success of this congress, then presented his Iroquois prisoners, but demanded why all the rest of the nations had not done the same. The chiefs of the Pontouatamis then, in the name of all the western savages, declared, that their nations were so zealous to fulfil the will of their father Onontio, that they had not been deterred from it, even by the report of a contagious distemper reigning at Montreal. The Miamis chief made his harangue to the same effect. He then drew forth a calumet or pipe of peace for all the nations to smoke at, declaring, that, if he made peace with the Iroquois, it was not because he feared them, but in obedience to his father's will. The deputy of the Sakis next, by means of Onanguice, the Miamis chief, made presents of atonement for a Frenchman they had killed. The general gave many other separate audiences, and acquitted himself with great dexterity with all, but John the White, who was too clear-sighted to be so easily satisfied as the others were. When the Iroquois deputies made their appearances before him, their orator endeavoured to shew how impossible it was for his nation to send back all their prisoners, many of whom, being taken in their infancy, knew no other parents, but those who adopted them. He then insinuated, that he thought such a restitution immaterial, because Maricourt and Joncaire had not much insisted upon it. This apology gave great distaste to some of the other cantons, and it was for some time before they could be reconciled.

Policy of Callieres.

THE conferences opened on the first of August; and while a Huron chief was haranguing, the Rat, who had been the principal instrument in effecting this wonderful congress, fell ill, to the great concern of Callieres; but, being somewhat recovered, he was placed in an elbow-chair in the middle of the assembly. As he was the greatest orator and the most acute wit of all the American savages, they flocked round to hear him; and he delivered a discourse upon the benefits of peace, which drew the loudest applauses from all present. At last, his voice failed him, and he never spoke more in public, for he died soon after the breaking up of the conference. Charlevoix speaks of this savage, as if he had been an ornament to human nature, and superior in wit even to the French themselves. At the time of his death, he had the rank and pay of a captain in the French army, and therefore received a noble military funeral; at which the governor-general and all the chief officers assisted. Joncaire on this occasion covered him, that is, made presents to his nation on account of his death, at the head of sixty warriors of the fall of St. Lewis. The inscription upon his tomb-stone was, "Here lies the Rat, a Huron chief." His death was an irreparable loss to the French; but his countrymen promised to follow his example in an inviolable attachment to Onontio.

Death and magnificent burial of the Rat.

THE ceremonies of the Rat's burial, which took up some days, being over, the Iroquois complained of their being distressed in the affair of their prisoners, and promised that, if the governor-general would give them back their captive countrymen, he should have no reason to repent of having trusted them. Callieres had, before the Rat's death, consulted him upon that subject; and it was not only his opinion, that they should be gratified, but he brought over several of the deputies to the same. Callieres therefore, after endeavouring to make the Iroquois sensible how unreasonable both their complaint and request were, promised to lay the latter before the general assembly of the deputies; which he did, and they agreeing to it, he trusted them, and was justified by the event. Mean time, an epidemic distemper breaking out amongst the savages swept off great numbers of them, of the Hurons particularly, who attributed it to witchcraft, and applied to the jesuits for destroying the enchantment. According to Charlevoix, all who died were baptized. This accident, however, obliged the governor to press the finishing of the treaty, and on the 4th of August, it was agreed that the articles should be signed, and the peace published with the greatest solemnity. For this purpose, a theatre of one hundred and twenty-eight feet long, and seventy-two broad, was erected on a plain without Montreal. At the end of this theatre was raised a large box for the ladies, and all the people of fashion in that city. De Callieres was attended by Vaudreuil, and all his principal officers, and 1300 savages were seated in order within the rails of the theatre, which were surrounded by soldiers under arms.

Progress of the congress.

THE meeting was opened with a speech made by Callieres upon the benefits of peace, and of their being under the protection of their father the great Onontio, and his words were repeated to the several nations by proper interpreters, and received with the highest acclamations. This being finished, each chief received a belt of wampum, and rising one after another they marched gravely up in their long fur robes to the governor-general, and each presented him with his prisoners, and a belt, besides their compliments, some of which are said to have been very fine; but all of them took great care to make him sensible how much they suffered in their private interests, by their compliance with his will in trusting the Iroquois, whom they neither feared, nor expected to be grateful. Callieres received each in the most gracious manner, and consigned the prisoners as he received them, to the Iroquois. The finery of the savages, their different manners of address, the oddities of their devices in their attire, and the whimsical state they assumed when they spoke to the governor, formed a scene of ridicule, that exceeded all belief. Charlevoix has been very minute in describing them. The ingrossed treaty of peace was then brought, and signed by thirty-eight deputies, but with other devices than those they made use of when they signed the former treaty. They brought at the same time, the great pipe of peace, out of which the governor-general smoked first, the intendant after him, and then Vaudreuil, and lastly, all their chiefs and deputies, each in his turn. After this, Te Deum was sung, and then the great kettles were produced, in which thirty oxen had been boiled. The meat was served up to each in order, without noise or confusion, every thing passed with great cheerfulness, and the whole ceremony was concluded by discharges of artillery both great and small, bonfires and illuminations.

And a peace concluded.

Conferences with the deputies.

Two days after, Callieres had a particular conference with the deputies of the upper nations, whom he warned against committing any depredations upon the French, in which case he threatened to chastise them; but, in the mean while, he gave them presents in the name of the king. The Outaouais begged that he would send with them father Anjelran and Nicholas Perrot, to which the governor agreed. Their deputy then most earnestly begged of the governor, that he would suffer no brandy to be imported amongst them, on account of its fatal effects upon their youth. This request was highly applauded by all present, except one Huron chief, who, being a great drunkard, had provided himself with a large stock of that liquor. Next day, Callieres gave audience to the deputies of the Iroquois cantons, whom he ordered to deliver their prisoners into the hands of Joncaire, who was to return with them, and promised, that if any of them should desire to return to the cantons they should have full liberty; he having granted the same to the Huron prisoners. He then recommended to them a strict neutrality between the French and the English; and endeavoured to make them sensible how much it was against their interest that the English should build any forts upon their lands. He next informed them, that the settlement at Detroit was far advanced under the inspection of La Motte Cadillac, who had with him a hundred men and a jesuit; adding that his motive for making this establishment was to be beforehand with the English, who intended to do the same. Every thing being thus amicably adjusted, the deputies took their leave of the governor, but scarcely were they gone, when deputies came from the Agniers, who had sent none to the congress, and signed the treaty. Soon after Joncaire returned, but brought with him very few prisoners; the captives, for the reasons we have already seen, refusing to attend him. Next year the Iroquois sent a solemn deputation to Callieres, and the upper nations did the same, to thank him for having given them peace. The Iroquois even requested him to send jesuits amongst them. This gave great pleasure to Callieres, who, for many reasons, had not ventured to offer them any of those fathers; but he most passionately desired, that they would voluntarily apply for them. Those deputies informed him at the same time of the death of Garakonthie, who, to his last, had continued faithful to the French interest, and presented to the governor his nephew, who offered to supply the place of his uncle, which the governor agreed to. The request of the deputies for the jesuits was instantly complied with, and Maricourt introduced them to the cantons, where, even (according to Charlevoix,) their business was rather that of spies than missionaries.

War declared between France and England.

By this time the war was declared between France and England in Europe, and Callieres received the strongest assurances from his court that Acadia should be peopled and fortified. This was the only province of New France that gave Callieres disquietude, because, now that the Iroquois were secure, it was the most exposed to the invasion of the English. This project went so far with the court of France, that the bishop of Quebec, who was then there, was endeavouring to provide a plentiful supply of ecclesiastics, without being obliged to a part with any in Canada, for the new colony. This passion for the establishment of Acadia soon cooled, and it still remained exposed to the ravages of the New England men. It was not long before the Iroquois grew heartily tired of their new alliance with the French, and not only they, but some of the French savages, by their agency, renewed their intrigues with the English. The truth is, that, though the measures Callieres had taken were wise and happily executed, and though he had greater abilities than any governor of New France ever had, yet it was not in his power to keep those savages in the French interest, for this plain reason, among many others; because his Canadians were so miserably needy, that the barbarians could get nothing by trading with them; so that mere indigence, had there been no other cause, obliged them to trade with the English. Callieres in vain represented to his court, that the source of all the danger of his government lay in its poverty and weakness, which could only be remedied by supplies from Old France. But, while he was endeavouring to encrease the fortifications of Quebec, to disconcert the intrigues of the English amongst the Iroquois, and to re-establish the system he had so wisely planned, he died on the 26th of May, 1703.

Death of Callieres;
1703.
who was succeeded by Vaudreuil.

VAUDREUIL, who was then governor of Montreal, took upon him, of course, the government of New France, till the pleasure of his court should be known. He had great experience in the manners of the savages, had always discovered resolution and address in every thing he undertook; and, by his polite, generous, and affable behaviour, he had gained the esteem and affections of all the colony, who unanimously applied to the French court, that he might succeed Callieres. Champigny, the late intendant, having now returned to France, and given over all concern in American affairs, the marquis de Vaudreuil was without a competitor; and the French king, who had a personal knowledge of Vaudreuil's courage in Europe, shewed great satisfaction in appointing him to the government of New France, the news of which was received with raptures by the Canadians, whom he had endeared to himself by his government during the inter-reign. His first care was to make sure of the Tsonnonthouans. This canton had sent a deputation to him upon the death of Callieres; and, when the deputies returned, they were accompanied by Joncaire, who brought back one of their chiefs. This savage, after making many compliments upon the governor's taking his canton under his protection, appeared highly offended that the Onnontague had not sent the governor-general a deputation likewise to pay him their compliments, and this he attributed to the bad designs they had. According to Charlevoix, whose relation, on this occasion, is not only unauthenticated, but improbable, the deputy made a formal cession of the property of the Tsonnonthouan canton to Vaudreuil, but in so secret a manner, that none but themselves were to know any thing of the matter; and, for this purpose, he presented the governor with three belts: the first signifying the absolute cession of their country to him; the second, to express that his countrymen would rather lose their lives than suffer any harm to come to the jesuits; and the third, to obtain permission for Joncaire to go along with them and spend the winter. Vaudreuil granted those requests with better will than they were asked. We are, however, to observe that the savage, in making the cession of his country to the French, signified that he expected the latter would protect him in all the differences he might have with his neighbours. Upon the whole, therefore, it is reasonable to believe, that there either never was such a sham cession, or that it was made entirely for the conveniency of the savages, who had already sufficiently disclaimed all such transactions, if found inconsistent with the general good. But the jesuit had a view in entering such claims, which, absurd as they were, were afterwards often insisted upon by the ministers of his court merely from his authority in the American disputes between the French and the English. Soon after this deputy's return to his own country, Teganissorens arrived at Montreal. This savage, though strongly attached to the French, shewed the greatest affection for his country. He honestly told the governor, that "the Europeans were a wicked set of people; that when they made a peace, a very nothing made them take up the hatchet again. We, continued he, do not act in that manner. When we once have signed a treaty, we must have very important reasons for breaking it." He then declared that his canton would take no part in the war, either on one side or the other. Vaudreuil approved of this resolution, and Teganissorens promised that the missionaries should remain in his canton. For that reason, and lest any pretext should arise for breaking the neutrality, Vaudreuil delayed sending any expedition against New York for that time. Mean while, the Boston men had endeavoured to engage the Abenakis into a like neutrality; but without effect. Vaudreuil had engaged a party of them to make an irruption into New England, and had joined to them some French with a French officer, one Beaubassin, at their head. The French historians ridiculously say, that this party, in the incursion they made, killed three hundred English; but, that otherwise they did very little damage to the colony. Beaubassin might make such a report upon his return; and very possibly none contradicted it. But besides the silence of the English accounts, it is well known, known, that, had such a slaughter happened, the booty must have been very considerable to a people so needy as the French Canadians and savages were, and in a colony so rich and flourishing as that of New England. But, in reality, Vaudreuil had scarce any view in this expedition, but that of exasperating the English against the Abenakis, so as to render them irreconcilable enemies to each other. Towards the end of autumn, the English repaid the visit by invading the country of the Abenakis, where they put many of those savages to death. The latter upon this, applied to Vaudreuil for assistance; and he sent them, in the winter time, two hundred and fifty men commanded by one de Rouville, who, as Charlevoix pretends, killed a great number of the Englishmen, and took a hundred and fifty prisoners. We shall here, once for all observe, that any one who knows the spirit of the English colonists in North America, how apt they are to exaggerate the loss they suffered from the French, and to call out on their mother-country for protection and assistance, will easily see the improbability of those French accounts, as no such losses are to be met with on the face of the English history, or even in the common gazettes of the time, which are always very full of such incidents.

IN the year 1704, amidst all those fancied triumphs over the English, Vaudreuil was alarmed by the dispositions which the Hurons of Michillimakinac, who went to visit Detroit, discovered against the French. They were headed by a chief who was nick-named Forty-pence, and who was a friend of the English. The Outaouais, part of whom likewise visited Detroit, and the Miamis, were equally exasperated, and wanted to renew the war against the Iroquois, who, they thought, were the only gainers by commerce with the French. The Outaouais even attacked a party of the Iroquois under the cannon of fort Cataracouy, and killed a considerable number of them. Upon this, Schuyler, governor of New York, an active English officer, but of Dutch extraction, had no great difficulty in persuading the Iroquois to break with the French, after so notorious a violation of all their promises of protection. He carried his views so far that he startled a great number of the Christian Iroquois, who had been in a manner naturalized with the French, and who insisted upon their chief's representing, what had happened to the governor-general, and demanding satisfaction. Ramezay, the governor of Montreal, did what he could to avert the blow; but all must have been in vain, had it not been for the Abenakis, who were then at Montreal, and represented the English as not being Christians; which deterred those pious savages from all communication with them. Joncaire had been again sent by Vaudreuil along with father la Vaillant, where they learned that Schuyler had succeeded in obtaining a general assembly of all the Iroquois at Onnontague; where the following capital points were to be insisted upon. First, that the cantons should banish all the missionaries. Secondly, that the Abenakis should be obliged to discontinue their hostilities. Thirdly, that the Makingans, who had for some time been settled in the country of the Agniers, should be obliged to return to their former habitations near Orange. And, fourthly, that a free passage should be given through their cantons for the upper savages to trade with the English. But this intelligence was not the only subject of vexation which the French governor had at this time. Some of the savages at Detroit had visited New York, where they were greatly caressed, while others set fire to Detroit fort, which was saved from being burnt down with some difficulty. The meeting of the assembly, that was summoned to New Orange, was put off on the news of the hostility committed by the Outaouais at fort Cataracouy; and the Tsonnonthouans, who had been the sole sufferers, sent Vaillant and Joncaire to Vaudreuil with complaints of what had happened. So doubtful, but so unexpected, a proceeding gave great pleasure to the governor-general, and he promised the Tsonnonthouans ample satisfaction. It now appeared that the building the fort at Detroit had given rise to the quarrel between the Outaouais and the Iroquois; and the governor-general came to a resolution to abandon it. He desired the Tsonnonthouans and the Onnontaguese, of whose fidelity he now was well assured, by all means, to repair to the meeting at New Orange, that they might oppose any resolution proposed to the prejudice of the French interest. They managed so well, that even the baron de Longueil, who had succeeded his brother Maricourt, now dead, as resident with the Onnontaguese, that Joncaire, and father Vaillant, were admitted to the assembly, notwithstanding all that Schuyler could do to prevent it; so that the meeting broke up without coming to any resolution. Schuyler, upon his return to New Orange, happening to meet some Iroquois of the fall of St. Lewis, engaged them by presents to follow him to Cerlar. There, after mentioning that they had been the authors of the war, he offered them lands if they would settle within the English government, and presented them with a belt for their own village, and two others for those of the mountain and the Recollect-fall, by which he exhorted them to remain in peace, and to open a correspondence with him. Those belts were delivered to the several villages; but Ramezay, coming to the knowledge of the transaction, dealt so effectually with their elders and their chiefs, that they were sent back without any answer, and three villages agreed to raise men to make war upon the English.

SOME

^a SOME time before this, the English having surprized and killed some of the Abenakis, the latter demanded assistance from Vaudreuil, who sent them the sieur de Montigny, and four or five Canadiens. Montigny soon put fifty of the Abenakis in arms, and, leading them against the English, he pillaged and burnt a fort, (more probably a farm-house) and carried off some prisoners. At this time, other Abenakis were so closely hemmed in by the English, that, receiving no supplies from the French settlements, they were in danger of perishing through famine. Vaudreuil, hearing of their situation, immediately resolved to execute a design, which he had formed soon after he came to his government. He proposed to the savages, that they should come and live in the colony, to which they consented, and they were settled on the river Bekancourt, where they served as a very useful barrier against the Iroquois, when the latter were persuaded to take arms for the English. Though this was not easy for the English to bring about, yet Vaudreuil plainly saw that the great drift of the Iroquois, the Tsonnonthouans in particular, in so strictly adhering to their neutrality, was, that they might be able to hold the balance between the French and the English, whom they made it a point of honour to include in the neutrality * (L). Nothing could be more easy than this, but it cross Vaudreuil's views, and he sent to his court for instructions how to behave. He was answered in terms perfectly conformable to his own insidious intentions; "that, if he thought he could make war with success, without engaging the king's master in any extraordinary expences, he was to reject the proposal of the Iroquois, otherwise he was to conclude the neutrality. But it was by no means for the honour of the crown of France, that he should make the first advances, and far less that the Iroquois should be the sole mediators." The minister, therefore, proposed that the missionaries should deal with the savages to persuade the English to desire a neutrality, in which case, Vaudreuil was to hear what they had to offer; but he was to conclude nothing without orders from court.

Instructions to Vaudreuil from France.

THE tentative proposed by the minister proving of no effect, all that Vaudreuil could do was to endeavour to keep the Iroquois in good humour, and a very happy incident for that purpose presented itself. The chief of the Outaouais party, which had attacked the Iroquois under fort Cataracougy, in his return to his own country passed near fort Detroit, where he displayed the trophies of his victory, and summoned all the Outaouais settled there to join him. Tonti, who commanded there in the absence of la Motte Cadillac, to chastise this gross insult, ordered an officer with twenty men to attack the barbarians, who, though they were supported by their countrymen at Detroit, were put to flight, and obliged to leave behind them all their prisoners; who were immediately delivered back to the Tsonnonthouans. This seasonable check not only established the French interest amongst the savages, but entirely disconcerted the measures of the English, who were equally unfortunate in other parts of Canada.

IN the year 1704, July the 2d, some English ships appeared in the basin of Port Royal, where they had set some men on shore, who made several of the inhabitants prisoners. This armament, according to the French accounts, consisted of ten vessels; one carrying fifty pieces of cannon; one of thirty; a Boston galley of eight; and seven brigantines; but other French accounts make the English force upon this expedition to be almost double: nor indeed are the accounts of the English themselves consistent with each other; because all parties were ashamed of their management. There is reason, however, to believe, that the French have greatly exaggerated both the English force and their own valour on this occasion. This formidable fleet seems to have been no more than a few Boston vessels, with five hundred and fifty volunteers on board, commanded by major Church, who visited Penobscot, Passamaquady, and les Minas, and attempted Port Royal, but could not take it; though they carried off about an hundred prisoners. Charlevoix presents us with a detail of noble actions performed by the French governor, and the inhabitants of Port Royal, against the English, whose numbers are represented to have been sixteen hundred; and who, after being defeated in repeated attacks, re-embarked, with about fifty prisoners, on the 21st of July. Before the English sailed, they set on shore one of their prisoners to acquaint the inhabitants, that they had nothing to fear, provided they kept themselves neutral. Soon after this, de Brou-

(L) We have here followed Charlevoix, who has inadvertently discovered the meaning of a French neutrality in North America to be no other, than that the Indians should abstain from attacking them, but, if required, should assist them in cutting the throats of the English. The savages, in the passage before us, appear very sensibly to have considered this as no neutrality; and that they could not be neutral, unless they were so between the English and the French, which bound them up from attacking the former as well as the latter; nor indeed were they safe unless the English were comprehended in the neutrality.

Subercase governor.

Loss of the English.

illan died, and was succeeded in his government by M. de Subercase, who had been governor of Newfoundland, where he had done infinite damage to the English. M. de Vaudreuil was still governor-general of New France, and, it is said he had privately entered into a correspondence with captain Rowse, an Englishman, of Charles-Town, for furnishing the French of Acadia with provisions, which Rowse did, under colour of carrying flags of truce into their harbours, for exchanging prisoners. Subercase, on his part, lost no advantage, which the support of Vaudreuil, and the friendship of the Abenakis, (who spread their ravages all over New England) afforded (M). At last, Dudley, the governor of New England, resolved upon an expedition for driving the French entirely out of Canada. His preparations for this purpose were carried on with the utmost secrecy. Two regiments of militia; those of Wainwright and Hilton were embarked on board transports under the command of colonel March; and covered by the Deptford man of war, and the Province galley. The entrance of what is called the basin of Port Royal is very narrow, and Subercase had placed there, in a watch-tower, fifteen men, with orders to alarm Port Royal, on the first appearance of ships approaching the basin. On the 16th of June, perceiving the English squadron, they retreated to the fort of Port Royal, but had scarce entered it, when the English squadron was seen at anchor within a league of the place. Next day, according to Charlevoix¹, the English landed 1500 men on the side of the fort, and 500 on that of the river, which struck such a terror into the garrison, that it was with difficulty they could be kept to their arms; especially as the fort had several breaches in its walls. The English, who had landed, had very thick woods to pass through, before they could attack the place, and Subercase having called in to his assistance all the inhabitants of the neighbouring country, a resolution was taken to harass and cut off the English, on their march, in detached parties. This ill-advised march, however, of the English, though not taken notice of by the French historian, was occasioned by the obstinacy and want of discipline of the officers of the Deptford man of war, who refused to come nearer the fort; and, to say the truth, the marine of England was then under a miserable direction. It was no wonder, if this disagreement between the sea and land forces rendered this expedition, as it has since done many others, ineffectual. The English, in marching through the woods, were dreadfully harassed, and lost many men, without being revenged on the inhabitants, who were provided with canoes, that, whenever they were pressed, carried them back to the fort. At last, the five hundred English, who had landed, with great difficulty, arrived on the banks of a river, which they had still to pass; while the governor, and a Canadian officer, one de la Ronde, kept the main body of the English in play, but, at last, were obliged to retreat into the fort, which was now in excellent order, all its breaches having been repaired.

THE English had suffered so much in their march, and had so ill an opinion of their seamen, who ought to have covered the siege, that they lost all spirit, and for two days remained entirely unactive. So that it was the night between the 10th and 11th of June, when they broke ground before the place. Next day, the governor ordered fourscore of the garrison, who were best acquainted with the country, to march out, and to intercept a convoy of six hundred English, who were bringing in live cattle. This detachment, which consisted of Indians as well as French, placed themselves in ambuscade so conveniently, that they interrupted the march of the English, and forced them back, with some loss, to their camp. We are not, however, to imagine that the English detachment was so numerous, as they are represented to be by the French. Every thing contributed to disappoint the English in this expedition. Some pretended French deserters, who had gone over to them, had given them great hopes of a mutiny in the garrison; but had concealed from them, that the breaches had been repaired. The English, therefore, imagining that the place was in a very bad state of defence, attempted to storm it in the night of the 16th, but were received by so brisk a fire of the French great and small arms, that they were obliged to retire from the assault. Notwithstanding this disappointment, they completely invested the place, and must have taken it, had they not been seized with a panic on seeing the French governor still hold it out, which they thought he would not venture to do, if he had not some dreadful mine to spring when they approached the walls. This apprehension grew so strong, that, having in vain attempted to destroy some French shipping, which was at anchor under the cannon of the fort, they returned to their camp by day-break, and next day re embarked on board their ships. The loss of the English in this ill-concerted expedition was about an hundred men, and it is certain that Port Royal owed its deliverance to sixty Canadians, under the baron a de St. Castin, who had thrown themselves into the fort, the day before the enemy appeared in the basin.

THE English fleet, on its return to Boston, touched at some of their settlements, where they understood the people of Boston had been so confident of success, that they had made public rejoicings upon the reduction of Port Royal. This determined colonel March to remain at Casco Bay, till he should clear up his conduct to the governor and assembly of New England. He accordingly wrote them an account of the expedition, in which he vindicated his own conduct, laying the whole blame upon the disobedience of the forces under him, in which they were encouraged by their officers, who never could be brought to make a general assault. Notwithstanding this apology, it was thought that if March had landed at Boston, the populace would have torn him to pieces. The governor and assembly were more just; and, upon enquiry, acquitted the colonel from all charge of misbehaviour, but sent him orders not to suffer the troops to land, and to remain where he was, till he should hear from the assembly. There the governor Dudley represented the danger, as well as disgrace, of letting the expedition drop, and offered to go in person, and take the command upon himself; adding, that he rather would die, than that Acadia should not be reduced to the subjection of the crown of England. The assembly did not think proper to accept of the governor's proposition of heading the expedition in person; but, having confirmed colonel March in his command, and cleared him from all imputation of misconduct, they reinforced him with three large ships, and five or six hundred men, with orders not to return before he had made a fresh attempt upon Port Royal. At the same time, to give the greater spirit to the expedition, the governor's son, and several of the principal members of the assembly, undertook to assist personally in it. On the 20th of August, the English squadron appeared once more before Port Royal; a sight which struck the garrison with such consternation, that Subercase the governor was almost single in his opinion to defend the place. His resolution, at last, was approved of; and, though many of the inhabitants were twenty miles distant from the town, the assurance of conquest which the English entertained from their armament gave Subercase time for making proper dispositions for a defence. All that the English had suffered in their late attempt had not taught them experience. Subercase, as before, placed ambuscades of Indians in their way, which cut off some of them, while others were taken prisoners; and from the latter he understood, that the English were to bring up their artillery under cloud of night before the fort. This intelligence enabled Subercase to disconcert his enemies, who undoubtedly acted in a very unsoldierlike manner, and, instead of making one great effort against the town, threw away six or seven days upon little attacks and skirmishes, in which they generally had the worst. On the 30th of the same month, the English all reembarked; but next day landed again to attack the place on a different quarter. Their advanced guard, however, as before, fell into an ambuscade of an hundred and fifty French and Indians, commanded by St. Castin, who did so much execution, that Subercase was in hopes of forcing the English intrenchments. In this he was disappointed; but he succeeded so far as to oblige his enemies with no little precipitation to reembark on board their fleet.

Defeat of the English, and the siege of Port Royal raised.

Upon the whole nothing can be imagined worse conducted than this expedition was, nor indeed is it to be much wondered at, that it is scarcely mentioned in the English histories of America. The French, however, perhaps, are not a little partial to themselves when they magnify, as they do, the valour and good conduct of their governor and countrymen, who they say had only three men killed and fifteen wounded, but killed great numbers of the English. The distresses of France in her wars in Europe, prevented her from making any great advantage from the defeat of the English expedition. The colony and garrison who had behaved so nobly, remained neglected by their mother-country so much, that they had not even the necessaries of life; and the complaints which Subercase wrote to his court on this head shew to what a poor pass France was then reduced; but those were not the only checks the English received at this time.

Their mismanagement.

ONE le Grange, a Frenchman, an excellent sailor, and had served under Iberville in Hudson's Bay, fitted out two barks at Quebec, and manned them with one hundred Canadians, with an intention to surprize some English ships, which he knew had lately arrived at Bonavista in Newfoundland. When he came within twelve leagues of that port, to prevent discovery, he left his barks, and shifted himself and his men on board two large floats or lighters, in which he entered the harbour in the night-time, and, according to Charlevoix, boarded and made himself master of a frigate, of twenty-four pieces of cannon, laden with fish ^w (N). He then burnt two vessels, each of between two and three hundred tons, ran

There was, at that time, six hundred English in fort Bonavista, who appeared next day, but too late. Le Grange had, in the mean while, rejoined his barks, and was under sail for Quebec, where he sold his cargo, and freighted his prize for Old France. In his voyage thither, he was attacked and taken by the English; but after so brave a resistance, that he afterwards was raised to a considerable rank in the French marine.

Subercase's expedition to

 island.

A. D. 1705.

THE success of le Grange encouraged Subercase to resume Iberville's and Brouillan's scheme for driving the English entirely out of Newfound'and, and which was approved by his court. L'Epinay, commander of the Wasp, a French ship of war then at Quebec, had orders to take on board one hundred Canadians, and to carry them to Placentia, under the command of M. de Beaucourt, who had twelve officers under him; amongst whom was Montigny. On the 15th of January, 1705, Subercase set out from Placentia, at the head of four hundred and fifty men, all of them resolute and well armed, and each of them carrying provisions for twenty days. In their march they met with four rivers, which they were obliged to wade through; the ice not being strong enough to bear them, and encountered other terrible difficulties; but at last they fell into the heart of the English settlements at Rebou, where all the inhabitants submitted without resistance. Here they found plenty of provisions, and, after sufficiently resting and refreshing themselves, they marched to Little Harbour, an English post within three leagues of St. John's. Here they left the prisoners they had made at Rebou, under a guard of forty men, on the 31st of the same month, in hopes of being able to surprize the garrison of St. John's; but they had used so little precaution in their march, that the English there were alarmed and ready to receive them. Being arrived before St. John's, they attacked the largest of the two forts they found there; but, meeting with a brave resistance, and their powder, part of which had been wetted in their march, failing them, they were obliged to give over their attempt, and to be content with destroying all the English habitations in the neighbourhood of Little Harbour. It was the fifth of March before they began to move by the coast-side towards Forillon, another English settlement, which they destroyed, and made all the inhabitants prisoners. This struck such a terror into the defenceless English, that they suffered Montigny, who commanded the savages in this expedition, to ravage all their coasts as far as Bonavista; so that the English trade of Newfoundland was for that year almost ruined.

 Quebec taken

 lish, and the lose a million

 of livres.

THE English, however, received some indemnification for those loss-s, by their taking the Seine, a large French ship, which was commanded by the chevalier de Maupeou, bound to Quebec, and having on board the bishop of that city, a great number of ecclesiastics and laymen of large fortunes; so that the whole of the cargo amounted to about a million of livres. This prize which was made by the convoy of the Virginia fleet, gave a dreadful blow to the affairs of the Canadians, but in the end contributed to their advantage; for the loss they had sustained obliged them to apply themselves to the linnen manufacture, and to raise hemp and flax, which answered wonderfully well on their soil. As to the bishop, he remained eight years a prisoner in England; her Britannic majesty insisting upon the provost of Liege whom the French had made a prisoner, being exchanged for him. All this while Vaudreuil, and Dudley the governor of New England, were treating about the exchange of prisoners. Dudley, for that purpose, sent a gentleman, one Levingston, to Quebec, and Vaudreuil sent Courtemanche to Boston with his terms, the chief of which was, that no English prisoner should be released until all the French prisoners, and those of their Indians, were set at liberty in New England, and till security was given for the release of those who had been sent to Europe, and the American islands. A negotiation ensued upon this, and young Dudley, the governor's son, was dispatched in a vessel to Quebec, to finish the cartel; but according to Charlevoix, in reality, to take the soundings of the river about Quebec, and to observe the state of the fortifications; for which that jesuit highly blames Vaudreuil's inattention.

Difficulties of
 Vaudreuil,

NOTWITHSTANDING the Tsonnonthouans had recovered their prisoners from the Outaouais, yet they insisted upon further reparation for their dead, to which they were, it seems, strongly instigated by Schuyler, the governor of New Orange. This was a very perplexing situation for Vaudreuil, as the young Outaouais were clamorous for war, and the nation in general refused to treat any more with the Iroquois. He therefore dispatched Louigny to Michillimakinac, who, with great difficulty, persuaded the Outaouais there to put into his hands some Iroquois prisoners, whom he conducted to Montreal, and was in expectation of being followed by deputies from the Outaouais. This induced the governor to propose an interview between the Outaouais and the Iroquois at Montreal; to which the latter consented; and waited till the beginning of August. No Outaouais then appearing, the Iroquois were then returning to their own country, when the Outaouais arrived at Montreal. They behaved before the governor in the most submissive humiliating manner; and their orator, in the name of the rest, applied for pardon both to him and the Iroquois, who were so much touched with their expressions, that a reconciliation was soon brought about by the governor.

a nor-general ordering the Outaouais to cover the dead, and feasting both parties. Upon this, all the savages left Montreal in perfect good humour with one another.

Two dreadful evils, at this time, afflicted the province of New France, litigiousness and nakedness. The two Raudots, father and son, had succeeded Beaubernois as intendant of Canada. The son applied himself to the marine, as his father did to the civil department. The latter found the inhabitants were daily running themselves in law suits, inso-much, that their lands lay uncultivated; upon which he very laudably abridged the forms, and retrenched the expences of the courts, and even applied himself to compromise differences amongst the inhabitants, without putting them to law charges. As to the other evil, that of nakedness, he endeavoured to remedy that likewise, by applying to the French court for leave that the inhabitants should manufacture the hemp and flax they raised, into linnen and stuffs; those imported from France being so excessively dear, that they were unable to purchase them. The minister, in his answer to this application, refused to grant such a permission, because it tended to injure the manufactures of the mother country. He, however, greatly extolled the inhabitants for the attention they, at last, had paid to the cultivation of their lands; recommended to them ship building, and the improvement of their fisheries, and concluded by giving the poor leave to manufacture their own hemp and flax. This permission was, in fact, the greatest benefit that the French Canadians had ever yet received from their mother country; and, in a short time, they set themselves to manufacture their own linnens and stuffs, from which the colony reaped vast advantages.

and distresses
of the Canadians.

c THE Outaouais, notwithstanding all their professions of repentance, had never yet performed their promises to the Iroquois, and even the missionaries found them so so untractable, that, after burning their own habitations, they came down to Quebec. The Iroquois, on the other hand, prepared to do themselves justice by force of arms; but Vaudreuil, by employing Foncaire amongst the latter, and Montigny amongst the former, soon reconciled all differences. Scarcely was this affair made up when another quarrel, of a still more interesting nature, broke out amongst the savages. The Miamis had killed some Outaouais, who, on applying for satisfaction, received a very slighting answer from the elders of the former, and they even killed another Outaouais, one of the chief of the nation, for whose death they likewise refused to give any attonement. The Outaouais, upon this, applied to de la Motte

d Cadillac, the French commandant at Detroit, where were three townships of Miamis, Outaouais, and Hurons. Soon after, Cadillac, having occasion to go to Quebec, told the Outaouais, at parting with them, that, as long as his wife continued at Detroit, they had nothing to fear, but, if she should leave them, they must take care of themselves. About two months after his departure she left Detroit, which struck the Outaouais with the notion that their ruin was resolved on, in revenge of the hostilities they had committed against the Iroquois; for as those barbarians themselves never sincerely forgive, they imagine all other men, in that respect, like themselves. In the mean while, an officer, one Bourgmont, arrived at Detroit, to relieve Tonti, Cadillac's lieutenant there, and upon the Outaouais coming as usual to pay him their compliments, he told them for news, in a rough manner, that Cadillac would return in the spring, well attended. This redoubled the suspicion of the sa-

e vages, and it was confirmed by some words of discontent at his being recalled, that fell from Tonti. In short, they took no pains to conceal their apprehensions. Bourgmont, understanding how matters went, assembled them, and proposed that they should march with the Miamis, the Iroquois, and the Hurons, upon an expedition against the Sieux. They appeared to consent; but they were, in their own mind, convinced, that the proposal was made with an intention to cut them off in their march, and that the Iroquois were parties in the design. Every trifling accident now confirmed them in their belief; and though the wisest amongst them were for applying to the French for an explanation, yet the general voice was for putting all the Miamis to death by way of prevention, but in the mean time to seem as if they were ready to set out on their march against the Sieux; and they actually began it. Having reached a wood, their chiefs, who were in the secret, acquainted the common men with what they intended, and all of them marched back, with a full resolution to massacre all the Miamis who fell in their way, but without doing any violence to the French or the Hurons. Five of the Miamis, whom they met on their return, were immediately put to death, others took refuge in the fort, which fired upon the Outaouais, who, in their fury, inadvertently killed a recruit, and another Frenchman. Upon this, Bourgmont ordered the gates of the fort to be shut, and thirty of the Outaouais were shot dead by the fire of the fort, or by that made upon them by the Miamis and the Hurons. While this disorder was at the highest, the Outaouais unexpectedly retired to their township, as did the other savages to theirs.

f VAUDREUIL, who was then at Quebec, hearing of this disturbance, was at a loss how to behave. His perplexity was encreased by a deputation he received from the Iroquois, who required him to abandon the protection of so faithless a nation as the Outaouais were, and declared that they were ready to make war upon them. By this time, Cadillac had returned to Detroit with all his family and a large convoy of men and provisions; so that Vaudreuil could not consult with him. All he could do was to talk to the Iroquois in so resolute a tone, that he diverted them from their design to the great disappointment of the English. At the same time, he resolved not to suffer the Outaouais to be ruined or driven to despair, because of their importance to the fur-trade. Soon after, one of the chiefs of that nation came to Quebec, and acquainted him that all the Outaouais had removed from Detroit to Michillimakinac, where they were well received by their brethren there, and that they were resolved to stand or fall by one another. Notwithstanding this important advice, Vaudreuil, as a mark of his resentment, ordered all the French at Michillimakinac to withdraw into the colony, in hopes that such an order might divide the savages; and he commanded Cadillac to act upon the defensive only, till it could be known what turn affairs would take. Those orders came too late to have effect. While he was upon his march he had heard what had happened at the fort, and he summoned the Tsennonthouans and the other Iroquois chiefs, as if he intended to have exterminated the Outaouais; but the latter growing bold by despair, he dismissed the Iroquois, and remained quiet. In the month of June 1707, a deputation, headed by John the White, who had been very active in the affair of Detroit, waited upon Vaudreuil, and made a most artful apology for all that had passed. Vaudreuil's answer was, that the deputies must repair to Detroit, and there make reparation for their fault; that he would signify his pleasure to Cadillac, and that they must obey whatever he should injoin them to do. He then dismissed the deputies, but without accepting the belt they offered him, and sent St. Pierre, one of his officers, along with them to Detroit.

1707.

Impudence of la Motte Cadillac.

WHEN they arrived there, Cadillac told them that they had no mercy to expect unless they put into his hand Pesant. This was the name of a savage Outaouais, whom John the White accused of being, as he really was, the main author of the Miamis massacre; for which reason, his countrymen would not suffer him to go along with the deputation. Perceiving in what situation they were, they offered to return to Michillimakinac, and either send the criminal to Detroit, or take off his head there. They accordingly set out attended by St. Pierre, and, in a few days, the Outaouais brought Pesant to Detroit. He was at first put into irons, but the chiefs of his nation interceding for him upon their knees, he was most injudiciously pardoned by Cadillac, instead of being given up to the justice of his own nation. This step was the more impolitic, because it gave a handle for the Miamis to reproach Cadillac for breach of promise, and disappointed them of their revenge; from which they were not to be so easily diverted. Their principal settlement was on the river St. Joseph, above one hundred leagues from Detroit, from whence Cadillac had recalled the missionary Aveneau, who had great interest with them; not chusing that a jesuit should have so much influence with so distant a nation. After this recall, all the Miamis united in demanding justice upon Pesant, and finding that Cadillac trifled with them, they killed three Frenchmen, and committed some other disorders in the neighbourhood of Detroit. Cadillac was preparing to chastise them when he discovered, that the Iroquois and the Hurons had joined them in a conspiracy to massacre all the French in Detroit; and this obliged him to clap up a dishonourable peace with the savages. The Miamis observed the terms of this treaty so ill, that the French commandant took the field against them at the head of four hundred men, and obliged them to throw themselves at his feet. They were pardoned, but it was judged proper to send back the missionary, who alone was able to moderate their passions, and to keep their sallies within bounds.

Success of Jon-
caire with the Iroquois.

JONCAIRE, all this while, behaved with so much address, and activity amongst the Iroquois cantons, whose language he spoke as if he had been a native, that he disconcerted all the intrigues of the English. Schuyler, at the same time, was playing the same game amongst the Christian Iroquois, who had been colonized in Canada. They had for some years sensibly relaxed in their piety, which was attributed to the strong liquors furnished them by the English, in defiance of all the orders of their king and governor to the contrary. The plan of an expedition was now formed against New England in a great council at Montreal, at which the chiefs of the Christian savages assisted. It was to consist of them, the Abenakis, one hundred choice Canadians, and a considerable body of volunteers, many of whom were officers, the whole amounting to four hundred men; the French to be commanded by Mess. de St. Ours des Chaillons, and Hertel de Rouville, and the savages by M. le Sieur Boucher de la Perriere. The two former were to march by the river St. Francis, together with the Algonquins, the Abenakis of Bekancourt and the Hurons of Lorette. The latter were to take the route of lake Champlain, and the general place of rendezvous was to be lake Nikispique, where they were joined by the neighbouring savages of Acadia. They set out on the 26th of July, but when Chaillons and Rouville came to the river St. Francis they were informed that the Hurons had returned, from a superstitious panic they had conceived upon one of their number being killed. The Iroquois, who were marching with Per-

a Perriere by lake Champlain, followed their example, under pretence of some of their number being sick, and that the rest of the army were in danger of being infected.

VAUDREUIL, who had advice of those desertions, ordered the commanders, by all means, to proceed, even though they should be abandoned by all the remaining savages, and rather than return without doing any thing, to attack some lone place. When Chaillons communicated the governor's letter to the savages they swore they would follow him to death, and after a most fatiguing march of fifty leagues they arrived at lake Nikisipique; but there they were disappointed in meeting with any savages. Hearing of an English village in the neighbourhood, called Haverhill, consisting of twenty-five or thirty well built houses, under the protection of a fort garrisoned by thirty soldiers, who had been sent thither a few days before by the governor of New England, on his being informed of the French irruption, the French and their savages attacked this fort, took it, and set it on fire with all the houses, and in them a number of English, besides about one hundred who were put to the sword. There is, however, great reason, as we have often hinted before, for distrusting the French accounts of their expeditions, when they are supported by no other evidence than the report of the officers who carried them on. They tell us that after performing this brave exploit, they perceived by the drums and trumpets * (O) of the neighbouring forts and villages, that they were in danger of being surrounded, that they prepared to retreat, carrying along with them a considerable number of prisoners, and a sufficiency of provisions to subsist them in their return; but that, as for plunder, they never thought of it, till it was consumed in flames. After marching a little way, they were attacked by seventy English, who lay in ambush at the entrance of a wood, and soon found themselves surrounded by numbers of horse and foot. Notwithstanding this, they pushed forward, and, after killing or taking prisoners all the seventy English, excepting ten or twelve, who ran away, they returned to Montreal with the loss of no more than five French and three savages killed, and eighteen wounded. We are to observe, however, that of all the boasted number of prisoners that were made, they brought but very few to Montreal, the rest having made their escape. Upon the whole, there seems to have been no other truth in the account of this pompous expedition, than that a body of French and savage rangers attacked a little out-settlement of the English under the guard of a block-house, garrisoned by twenty-five or thirty men; and that they most inhumanly burnt the place, and butchered or carried into captivity the inhabitants. Neither the French nor their savages are so regardless of plunder, as to set it on fire when they can secure it to themselves.

Expedition against the English, and Haverhill taken by the French.

THE true secret why the Iroquois had abandoned la Perriere in this expedition now appeared to be the intrigues which Schuyler had carried on with the Christian Iroquois of the fall of St. Lewis and the highlands. But Schuyler seems to have depended too much upon the assurances they had given him, that neither they nor any of their nation should serve any more against the English. All this intelligence came from an English prisoner, who had been taken at Haverhill; and Vaudreuil, who was perfectly well acquainted with the nature of those savages, knew so well how to pique their pride by an affected neglect and contempt for all they could do, that instead of observing their promises to Schuyler they took arms, and joining the Abenakis, they filled all New England and New York with their ravages. Vaudreuil complained of Schuyler's tampering with the colonized savages of New France, and of his instigating the other savages to take arms, while he himself was willing to grant New York a neutrality, which was as advantageous to that colony as to New France. Schuyler honestly avowed that the reason of his corresponding with the savages for a neutrality, was from the Christian motive of preventing their committing those excesses in war which were shocking to humanity itself, and which his own mind could not bear to reflect on without pain and horror. The reply of the French to this candid declaration consisted not in denying the facts, but in recriminating upon the English for the encouragement and protection they had formerly given to the Iroquois against the French. We may here remark one particular arising from this altercation, which is, that Schuyler, and perhaps, all the English in North America, were of opinion, from experience, that the heathen savages were far from being so barbarous as the popish. But in the main, however the French may recriminate on this head, it is certain that they themselves were the fundamental aggressors, and that they were, at this very time, establishing their colony of Louisiana upon lands that were the undoubted property of the crown of England. It ought, therefore, to be no surprize if the government of Old England did endeavour to form a General view of the French and English government in North America.

* CHARLEVOIX, Vol. IV. p. 36.

(O) A slight view of the map must convince any one of the improbability of this relation. Haverhill, or as Charlevoix calls it, Hevreuil lies considerably to the north of lake Nikisipique according to his own map, and consequently on the borders of French Canada, without any English settlement near it.

party amongst the French American allies. With regard to the Iroquois, of whom the French complained so much of their being instigated to their barbarities by the English, nothing could be more groundless than that charge. The English, it is true, had bargained and honestly paid for great part of their lands, and therefore had a right to claim a property in them, as well as to account those savages, who remained upon them, and had put themselves under the protection of their government, subjects to the crown of Great Britain. But they enforced even this claim so gently, that their Indians scarcely felt subjection, and they had treated the Iroquois as a free and independent people, even when they were paying them for serving in the field. The French, on the other hand, on the strength of the fictions of their missionaries, the impudent assertions of their ministers, with a thousand other delusions and fallacies, claimed a direct dominion over all the Indians in North America, even over those, who, by length of time, had become naturalized subjects of Great Britain; because they were of nations who had formerly submitted to the French government. Having established this system of power, their next step was to endeavour to persuade not only the savages but the Europeans into a notion that all the settlements of the English in North America were so many usurpations and encroachments upon their property. To support those unwarrantable claims, they invented boundaries. They changed the names of places, and even delineated charts with such fictitious longitudes, latitudes, and situations, as best suited their views.

St. John in Newfoundland taken and demolished by the French.

THE importance of the Newfoundland fisheries becoming every day more evident, a French officer, one St. Ovide, a lieutenant of Placentia, and nephew to Brouillan, formed a project, which he communicated to another Frenchman, one Costebelle, then governor of Placentia, for destroying all the remaining English settlements in the bay of St. John; and, that too, at his own expence. The project was approved of, and St. Ovide soon mustered about one hundred and twenty-five men, exclusive of twenty-four of the garrison of Placentia, lent him by Costebelle. On the 14th of December they began their march, on the 20th they came to the lower end of St. Mary's bay, and, by the assistance of some shipping, sent them by Costebelle, they arrived on the last day of the year, within five leagues of St. John's without being discovered. As the commandant (who it seems had some secret ill wishes among the adventurers) could hope to succeed only by surprize, he advanced within three hundred feet of the first pallisade he was to attack, and though some shot were fired at him, pushing forward, he entered by the gate which had been left open, and calling out Vive le Roy, the English were so dispirited, that he and his friends had time to fix their scaling-ladders to the main body of the place, which they mounted, and became masters of, after a very faint resistance on the part of the English, who begged for quarter; so that in less than half an hour the English governor of fort William being wounded they took possession of both forts. This was the more extraordinary as one of them mounted eighteen pieces of cannon and four mortars, besides other artillery, and had a garrison of one hundred men under a good officer. In the other fort were six hundred inhabitants; but according to the French accounts, they could not force open the door of a subterraneous passage, which communicated with the first fort time enough to come to the assistance of the garrison there. A third fort, which was likewise well provided with artillery, and a garrison lying on the other side of the harbour, surrendered upon being summoned. St. Ovide dispatched an account to Costebelle of this success; but in the mean time without his order he sent off one Despensens in a small vessel he found in the harbour with a like account to Europe. His triumph was of no long continuance; for he received orders from the governor of Placentia to dismantle the forts, and to return to Placentia by the end of March at farthest. Costebelle, at the same time, sent a frigate to bring the English governor and the garrisons of the forts, with all the ammunition, of which there was a great quantity, to Placentia; which, had not St. John's not been surprized by St. Ovide, was to have been attacked by three hundred English, who had their magazines there. St. Ovide was obliged to obey those mortifying orders, and it is said that the French court afterwards repented their having approved of the advice of Costebelle for demolishing St. John's.

The conquest of Quebec resumed by the English.

WE have, in the history of New England, mentioned a scheme that was formed by the whig ministry for the conquest of Quebec, and the reason why it was then laid aside. It is to the reproach of the English Americans that they have taken so little care of ascertaining their transactions at this period, that we must, in a great measure, depend upon the French for our information. We shall proceed as cautiously as possible where any thing occurs that clashes with the English accounts. Before the news of St. Ovide's success in Newfoundland reached Quebec, Vandreuil had been alarmed with advices from all hands of the vast preparations that were making in the English settlements against Canada. Father Moreville the French missionary at Onnontagué, had endeavoured for several months past to put Vandreuil upon his guard; but his intelligence was disregarded on account of the great opinion the governor general had of an Iroquois, who was the secret agent of the English in his canton.

a canton. Notwithstanding this, all the Iroquois cantons, except the Tsonnontbouans, entered into a treaty at Onnontagué, and set up the war-song against the French; so that it was with vast difficulty that father Moreville escaped to New Orange, where, though he was a prisoner, he was treated by Schuyler with the utmost indulgence and humanity. In the month of June 1710, Vaudreuil having now certain intelligence of the designs of the English, put every thing into a posture of defence at Quebec, and repaired to Montreal, from whence he sent de Rouville with a party of two hundred and fifty men, to reconnoitre towards lake Champlain, where the English were expected; but Rouville hearing nothing of them, returned, without doing any thing, to Montreal. On the 10th of May colonel Vetch, whom we have mentioned in the history of New England, and who was joined with governor Nicholson in soliciting the expedition against Canada, arrived from England at Boston; from whence he proceeded to New York to expedite the levies that were destined against Montreal. We shall not here examine the detail given us by Charlevoix concerning the views of the whig ministry in fitting out at this time an armament against Canada; because they are of very little importance, and all he speaks of them is uncertain. There is no doubt that they would have been extremely glad to have carried it into execution; and there is as little, that when they saw it fall into the hands of their enemies they took but small concern in its success. Two thousand English, and an equal number of savages, were to attack the government of Montreal, and their rendezvous was fixed to the river of Chicot, two leagues from lake Champlain; from whence they were to fall down, in canoes and boats, to Chambly. Vaudreuil, upon this intelligence, resolved in a grand council of war to march a considerable body of troops towards New York, there to dissipate the gathering storm. Ramezay offered his service to command in this expedition; but, several differences subsisting between him and Vaudreuil, it was not accepted of till some time after. He then, understanding that the English were actually upon their march, gave Ramezay the command of 1500 men; of whom one hundred were regulars, and the rest militia and savages. The governor then went down to Quebec, where he laid an embargo upon all the shipping in that harbour. It was the 28th of July before Ramezay began his march with his army, which was commanded by the best and most experienced officers in Canada; but each envied the other, and there was neither subordination nor authority amongst the commanders. It is true they marched d forty leagues in three days; but when they were upon the point of entering upon action, a thousand false reports were spread, and difficulties occurred, which determined the savages not to advance farther. Ramezay, who thought himself secure of his blow, would have proceeded, notwithstanding the report that 5000 English were well entrenched only a few miles distant; but the backwardness of the savages, and the dread of not being obeyed by his own officers, determined him to a retreat. While he was upon his march in the middle of September, he received advice by an Iroquois from the English camp, that 2500 men had been detached to build a fort at the extremity of lake St. Sacrament, and that six hundred English and their allies had been sent to take post upon lake Champlain at a place from which they were no more than two days journey from Chambly. To this place Vaudreuil immediately repaired with a considerable body of regulars and militia: but after remaining e there for some time, he heard nothing of the enemy, and this brings us to the history of the English in this their unfortunate expedition.

Miscarriage of Ramezay against the English;

f THE four Iroquois cantons, who had pretended to declare for the English, were so far from being sincere in their professions, that they intended nothing more than to follow their old policy, and to render themselves so necessary to both parties, that they could always cast the balance between them. This maxim was so forcibly explained by the orator of the Onnontague, or one of their elders, that a resolution was taken to remain inactive till they could see what turn affairs would take, and then to follow that course that could most effectually contribute to their interest and independency. In consequence of this plan they indeed joined the English army; but finding that it was strong enough to take Montreal, thought of nothing but how they could most effectually destroy it. According to Charlevoix, (who had his information from father Moreville,) the Iroquois, to compass this end, threw the skins of all the creatures they killed in hunting into the river, on which the English lay, a little above the place of their own encampment; and this infected the water so much that above 1000 English died of drinking it. But without having recourse to so extraordinary a fact, we may without any breach of probability suppose, that the Iroquois began to cool in their zeal for the English so visibly, that the latter were disheartened from proceeding; that diseases making havock in their camp, that the numbers of the French coming to attack them being exaggerated, and that misunderstandings prevailing amongst themselves, g determined them to retreat to New York, which they did. But the most probable reason of all seems to have been the failure of their appointment with their fleet and the people of Boston. Whatever may be in this, it is certain that Canada was then delivered from a most dreadful blow. When the English returned to New York, they understood that their fleet, which

and of the English against Montreal.

which was destined for the siege of Quebec, was not yet arrived at Boston, and was employed in Portugal, where that king, without their assistance, must have otherwise be reduced to make a separate peace with Spain. a

The Onnontague and Agniers received into favour by Vaudreuil.

In the following winter the Onnontague applied by their deputies to Vaudreuil, begging him to receive them again into favour, and even apologized for the conduct of Schuyler, and the people of New York, who had obliged them to break the peace. It is probable that Vaudreuil was fully sensible of the treachery of the Iroquois towards the English; for he gratified the barbarians in all they required, and particularly in an exchange of prisoners; but he told them at the same time, that the rest of the allies had long demanded his permission for making war upon them, and, if they would avoid that destruction, they must live in peace, otherwise, he would most certainly let loose all his children upon them. The Onnontague were scarcely gone, when a deputation came from the Agniers with the like professions, and protesting that they never would, from that time forward, take up the hatchet against the French. Though Vaudreuil was sensible that their connexions with the province of New York were so strong they could not fulfil their promises, yet he was extremely civil to the deputies, and sent them away in very good humour. b

Affairs of Newfoundland

THE news which arrived from Hudson's Bay somewhat damped the joy of the Canadians upon the disappointment of Mr. Vetches's expedition against Montreal. Mantet had undertaken, with a party from Canada to render himself master of fort St. Anne in that bay, but failed, and was killed in the attempt, through the cowardice of the party he commanded, and his own imprudence in not having sufficiently reconnoitred the place. Things were more happily managed on the part of the French in Newfoundland. The only post of consequence which the English now held there was the isle of Carboniere, which Costebelle laid down a scheme for reducing, in which he was promised to be supported by the French court, if he could entirely drive the English from the coast. But as the reinforcements from Old France were long upon their voyage, Costebelle resolved to attempt their reduction with the force he had with him; of which he made two detachments, the one to march by land, the other to be carried in two small sloops by sea, and the whole to be under the command of one Bertrand, a Placentian, a man of courage and experience. The two detachments were fitted out, and proceeded with so much secrecy, that they arrived at Trinity bay, which is in the neighbourhood of Carboniere, without being discovered. Here they found an English frigate carrying thirty cannon, and one hundred and thirty men. The French sloops, who had on board but five and twenty men a piece, immediately boarded and took the frigate; but with the loss of their leader Bertrand, whose place was supplied by a resolute young man, named Dacarette. Soon after, two English pirates came in sight. One mounted twenty-two guns, and the other eighteen, and making up, began to fire upon the prize. Dacarette would willingly have engaged them both: but his crew being discouraged by the death of their leader refused to stand by him; so that all he could do was to cut his cables, and to run out of the bay; by which he cleared himself of the two pirate ships. The other detachment all this time were waiting on shore, and seeing no probability of their being joined by those on board, they fell upon the defenceless inhabitants, whose houses they demolished and plundered, and then retired to Placentia, where the two sloops arrived soon after. Such were the unmanly expeditions of the French against the English, and indeed both courts were at this time highly blameable with regard to their American settlements. The possession of the fisheries of Newfoundland were acknowledged by French writers to be of infinitely more value than all Canada, and yet the efforts they made to keep possession of them were despicable beyond expression. The English, on the other hand, were as sensible, as the French were, of the value of those fisheries; but suffered their ships to lie rotting in their harbours, and their sea-commanders to prey upon their American subjects rather than make any national efforts to secure so invaluable a treasure. Upon comparison, therefore, the English appear most to blame, being far superior to the French in wealth and numbers upon the continent of America, not to mention the superiority of their marine both there and in Europe. c d e f

Misconduct of the French and English.

Port Royal conquered by the English.

In the year 1710 six men of war, with a bomb ketch, and some troops, arrived at Boston upon a new expedition against Acadia; which, if successful, was to have been the prelude to the conquest of all New France. Subercase, on the other hand, invited to Acadia all the freebooters, pirates, and men of desperate fortune on the continent of America and its islands, with a view of making a strong settlement at la Hève; but his project was disappointed by the inability which Old France was under to support them. He had better success in spiriting up the Abenakis and the savages of Canada against the English, whom they murdered wherever they had an opportunity. According to the best accounts, the court of England was much better informed than that of France was with regard to the importance of Acadia; which queen Anne's ministry continued in their resolution to conquer, cost what it would. g

- a Subercase was not ignorant of this, and had sent repeated advices of the danger of that province to Vaudreuil, the governor of New France, and to the court of Old France, but with very little effect; so that Subercase, though undoubtedly a very able officer, became indifferent as to the fate of the province. The English, ignorant of his dispositions, continued to make preparations at a vast expence for the reduction of Acadia; and in July 1710 general Nicholson arrived at Boston from England with some British officers, and colonel Reading's marines. He brought with him instructions for all the governments in New England to assist him in his expedition; and adjutant-general Vetch was joined with him in the command. In August an English man of war of sixty guns, with a brigantine, and a sloop, blocked up Port Royal in such a manner that it could receive no supplies by sea,
- b which obliged the garrison, who every moment expected a general attack, to perform very severe duty. On the 18th of September the grand armament sailed from *Boston*². It consisted of the Dragon, Falmouth, Leestaff, and Feversham men of war, the Star bomb, and the Massachusetts's province galley, with transports, in all thirty-six sail; the land forces aboard were, one regiment of marines from England, two regiments of Massachusetts's Bay, one regiment of Connecticut, and one regiment of New Hampshire and Rhode Island, commissioned by the queen, and armed by her gift. On the 5th of October the whole armament, amounting, according to the French accounts, to fifty one ships arrived in the basin of Port Royal and threw anchor before the fort. Subercase, who very justly thought he had been neglected by his court, made no dispositions for defence, and suffered the English to land
- c next day without opposition. He had under his command no more than three hundred effective men, but of them as well as the inhabitants of the place disaffected to a service, in which they considered themselves as being sacrificed. The besiegers, on the other hand, are said to have amounted to 3400 men, exclusive of officers and sailors; so that Subercase only thought of making such a defence as might enable him to come off with honour. As soon as the English came up to the fort he made a general discharge of his artillery, which obliged them to retire. A brisk cannonade on both sides then followed, and some bombs were thrown into the place from the English bomb ketches. One of their fireships blew up, in attempting to enter the harbour, with all its crew, consisting of forty men. On the 10th, the bombardment again began; but with very little effect. The inhabitants, however, knowing that the place was not defensible, above fifty of them left it: and they who staid behind presented a petition to the governor, requesting him to take their situation into his consideration, and expressing their apprehensions, that they would be put to the sword, in case the place was taken by storm. Subercase, upon this, summoned a council of war, where it was concluded to make the best terms they could with the English general. At first, they demanded liberty for all the women to leave the fort, which being refused, Subercase desired an interview with Nicholson, and the latter sent into the fort a subaltern, Terms of the capitulation.
- d who regulated the articles of capitulation; the circumstances of which are differently related by the French and the English. According to the *English*² they were, that all the French, being four hundred and eighty-one persons within the Banlieu, or three miles of the fort, shall be put under the protection of Great Britain, upon their taking the proper oaths of
- e allegiance; the other French settlers left to discretion; that, in case the French make incursions upon the frontiers of New England, the British shall make reprisals upon the French in Nova Scotia, by making some of their chief inhabitants slaves to their Indians. The garrison was allowed to march out with six cannon and two mortars; but the inhabitants having driven away all the cattle, Subercase could only retain one mortar, and was obliged to sell the rest to Nicholson for about 350 l. sterling. According to the English accounts, the garrison consisted of two hundred and fifty-eight soldiers, with their officers and other inhabitants, in all four hundred and eighty-one persons, male and female. The French historian says, that the garrison consisted only of one hundred and fifty-six men, and that Nicholson repented
- f of having granted a capitulation to a place, which, upon taking possession of it, he found must have surrendered in twenty-four hours for want of provisions. The garrison were sent to Rockelle in France, but were replaced by two hundred English marines, and two hundred and fifty New England volunteers, while the name of Port Royal, in compliment to queen Anne, was converted into that of Annapolis Royal. The charge of this expedition cost the people of New England 23,000 l. sterling, which was afterwards repaid by parliament.
- g SOME disputes between Nicholson and Subercase happened with regard to the capitulation. Nicholson sent major Livingston, and Subercase the baron St. Castin, to Vaudreuil, then governor-general of New France, with a copy of the capitulation. Livingston insisted that all the country, except that part which was within reach of the Port Royal artillery, was excluded from any advantage of the capitulation; and that the rest of the province with its inhabitants was at the discretion of the English. Livingston added great complaints upon the cruelties of the French savages, and threatened, that, if they should continue to exercise their barbarities on the subjects of Great Britain, reprisals would be made on the French inhabitants of Acadia, and then he proposed an exchange of prisoners. It must be owned, that, if Mr. Livingston made those demands upon the French governor, in consequence of Nicholson's instructions, the latter was not a little unacquainted with the rules of war, unless he could have proved that the cruelties committed by the French Indians were either perpetrated by the orders of the French, or could have been prevented by them. Vaudreuil took care to inform Livingston of this, and appealed to the good treatment which the English prisoners had always met with from the French, and imputed all the miseries that had happened, in the course of the war, to the English having formerly rejected a proposal for a neutrality between the subjects of the two nations in America. Livingston had threatened that a number of French prisoners equal to those of the English should be put into the hands of the English Indians. Vaudreuil threatened to do the same by putting his English prisoners into the hands of the French savages.

Policy of the French.

VAUDREUIL, on this occasion, wrote both to Nicholson, and Dudley, governor of New England; and sent his letters by the two best partizan-officers he had, that they might have an opportunity of seeing the country. In the mean while, he nominated the baron de St. Castin, then commandant at Pentagoet, to be governor of all that remained to the French in Acadia. Mr. Vetch was the English governor of Annapolis, and the French inhabitants of Acadia made lamentable complaints of his severity. It must be acknowledged, that the French governors and officers on this occasion, acted with more policy and wisdom than the English. The latter had little or no intelligence of the weak state of their enemies, and were at an immense expence, which they might have spared, in guarding against them. The French knew the real strength of the English, whom they took care to keep in ignorance of their condition. Vaudreuil, however, perceived that all his art could not conceal from his savage allies the weak condition of his government; and was obliged to have recourse to his missionaries for fixing them in his interest, in which he succeeded beyond expectation, notwithstanding the great power of the English, and the vast presents they lavished amongst the savages.

Defeat of the English.

ON the 4th of August, 1711, Vaudreuil received a letter from one of the French missionaries, informing him that forty savages, having defeated a numerous party of English, had joined with some French, and that they had invested the fort of Port Royal, where above half the garrison had died during the winter. Upon this intelligence, Vaudreuil detached the marquis D'Alogniers, at the head of twelve of his best officers and two hundred men, to press the siege; but while they were upon their march, advice came of the English preparations against Quebec, and they were countermanded. Nothing is more certain, than that, had the English, at this time, acted with common sense in North America, the French might have been entirely driven out of it. Pontchartrain, in all his dispatches addressed to the French officers there, manifested the utmost uneasiness at Port Royal being in the hands of the English, and pressed Vaudreuil to raise all the force of Canada to retake it, which the latter offered to do, provided he was assisted only by two ships from Old France; but so desperate were the affairs of his most Christian majesty at that time, that that request, despicable as it was, could not be complied with. Pontchartrain, however, from time to time, received from the French Acadians the strongest assurances of their affection to the crown of France, and that necessity alone obliged them to submit to the English. Upon this, he negotiated with the merchants of Rochelle, Rochfort, St. Malo, Nantes, Bayonne, and other places for erecting a company strong enough to people La Heve and Chedabouctou, and to recover Acadia from the English. But, though his most Christian majesty offered all the encouragement that was in his power to give to the adventurers in such an undertaking, the credit of his crown was then so low, that the project came to nothing. In the mean while, so artfully had the French missionaries spirited up their savages, that they acted with the most determined inveteracy against the English. The latter, in consequence of the surrender of Port Royal, considered themselves as masters of Acadia; and the English governor there sent out sixty of his soldiers, under the command of captain Pigcon with proper officers, in canoes to burn the habitations of the French, who refused to submit to the English government. The savages, hearing of this, watched their opportunity, and formed an ambuscade, which cut off all the English party, but one man. This success encouraged the French and their savages so greatly, that in the month of June, five hundred of them invested the fort of Port Royal, and one of their missionaries offered to be responsible for taking the place, if Costebelle, the French governor of Placentia, would send him a proper officer to command the siege. This could not be obtained; upon which the French and savages broke up the siege; though the garrison was reduced by sickness from five hundred, to one hundred and a and fifty, men. Notwithstanding this, the French inhabitants continued to harraß the English, whenever they had an opportunity. Acadia yielded by the treaty of Utrecht.

At last, the government of England began to open their eyes with regard to the necessity of conquering Canada. The acquisition of Port Royal had struck the savages with terror, and many, even of the French Christian converts, began to look coldly on the interests of New France, which occasioned Vaudreuil's encreasing the number of missionaries and agents, amongst them, to rekindle their zeal. He ordered all the well-affected to his government, that lived amongst the northern and western savages, to rendezvous at Montreal, to which he himself repaired on the ice. This was the more necessary, as he had intelligence, that the governor of New York was endeavouring to engage the Iroquois in an offensive league against the French, and none could answer for the consequences. The baron de Longeuil, lieutenant for the king at Montreal, attended by Joncaire and la Chauvignerie, undertook to treat with the Iroquois to preserve their neutrality. But, though the cantons of Tsonnonthouan and Onnontague sent deputies to Montreal, they gave them no great satisfaction as to the other five cantons, who, they said, were intimidated by the success, and debauched by the presents, of the English. Preparations for war went on at a great rate in New York, which, Vaudreuil being no stranger to, he issued the most vigorous orders for putting Quebec in a state of defence, and he effected a reconciliation between the two Iroquois deputies, and the upper savages, who had come down to Montreal to the number of about five hundred. It was not long before Vaudreuil had accounts from Costebelle of general Nicholson arriving from England at Boston, with two seventy gun ships, which were to be followed by the grand armament destined for the conquest of Quebec; the particulars of which have been already related. The news of this force arriving before Boston was carried by a Martinico privateer to Placentia, and soon after Vaudreuil had intelligence of its having left Boston, and that two hundred battoes were ready at New York; besides a hundred more daily expected for embarking two thousand English, who were to proceed against Montreal, while the fleet and the land forces from Europe were acting against Quebec.

VAUDREUIL, on this occasion, omitted no duty of a brave and prudent officer. He confirmed the two Iroquois cantons in their neutrality; and, notwithstanding the great advantages, which the upper savages had in trading with the English, they joined the colonized Indians in the war-song against the English; and the governor-general even obtained hostages from the Algonquins for their fidelity, as he did from the Abenakis. All which pieces of good fortune for the French government, Charlevoix, (perhaps, not without reason) ascribes to the labours of the missionaries. When Vaudreuil returned to Quebec, he not only found the fortifications in excellent order through the skill and application of Beaucourt, who served as engineer, but the place provided with every thing for holding out a long siege, and the garrison with the inhabitants, even to the women, resolved to defend themselves to the last. All the proper dispositions being made by the governor-general, who placed his own son in the most dangerous part, on the 25th of September, advice came of the English fleet being seen to the number of ninety-six sail; but, some days after, intelligence came of their having returned. The particulars may be seen in the preceding sheets. At last, it was reported, that the fleet had been shipwrecked near the Seven Islands in the river St. Laurence; upon which Vaudreuil sent thither some vessels, who found the hulks of seven or eight large ships, but with all their guns and furniture taken out, and printed copies of the manifesto, that general Hill was to have distributed amongst the Canadians and the inhabitants of New France. Expedition of the English against Quebec.

THIS is a curious piece, but far from being well drawn up. It roundly asserted, in general terms, that all North America originally belonged to the crown of Great Britain, which, from time to time, had portioned part of it to that of France, in the nature of fiefs; that the French, having broken the terms of those concessions, had forfeited all their right to the country, which the queen of England, as paramount of the same, had now sent to take possession of; and, that she looked upon all the French Canadians to be as much her subjects, as if they were born in the dominions immediately depending on herself. There is nothing very particular in the remaining part of this manifesto, which is of an uncommon length, but heavy charges brought against the French and their Indians for their unheard of cruelties upon the English subjects. Nothing could be more injudicious, or more shocking to the descendants of the original natives, than the terms of this manifesto; for whatever encroachments the French might have been guilty of with regard to the English, it was highly imprudent in the latter to pretend that they had a direct dominion over the lands of the original proprietors, and contrary to the tenor of all the settlements they had made amongst the natives. In short, the mischief which this ill judged manifesto did to the British interest in America is inconceivable. Charlevoix blames the distrust and obstinacy of the English admiral for the loss of his ships; but he undoubtedly exaggerates, when he says It miscarries.

says that 3000 English were found dead upon the shores; the loss not amounting to above eight hundred men. The English were equally unfortunate in their expedition by land; for, though no fewer than six hundred Iroquois had joined the English under general Nicholson, yet they all left him, even before they heard that the English fleet had miscarried.

As does their design upon Newfound-
land.

THE chief object of the English armament was Quebec; its secondary one was Placentia; the conquest of which by the people of England was deemed, of the two, to be by far the most practicable and profitable for them. When the English fleet was under sail for Quebec, it intercepted a packet from Castelle to Pontchartrain, complaining of the dismal state of Placentia, and of the French in general in Newfoundland, where, he said, he could not muster a hundred men in all the island. It is certain, that when the English returned to Spanish Bay, they had on board above seven hundred and fifty men; and granting their provisions could not have lasted for above ten weeks, the conquest of Placentia could not have cost them above three days. But, when a council of war was summoned, as if the members of it had been more than infatuated, they not only voted against any attempt being made upon Placentia, but that Nicholson should be ordered to desist in his expedition by land against Montreal, which accordingly came to nothing. All the advantage the English derived from this expensive expedition was the preservation of their new conquest of Port Royal in Acadia, the recovery of which became now to be a very serious consideration with the French ministry. Pontchartrain again pressed Vaudreuil to undertake it with the force he could raise in New France; Vaudreuil, to shew his zeal, had nominated the marquis d'Algniers to the command of some troops, who were to assist the savages and French of Acadia in a kind of blockade, they had formed of Port Royal; but upon the news of the English invasion he was recalled.

Quebec new fortified.

IN the beginning of the year, 1712, the merchants of Quebec raised the sum of 50,000 crowns for completing the fortifications of that city. The late miscarriage of the English had now rendered the French more respectable than ever in the eyes of the savages. The deputies of the Iroquois made, in the name of their cantons, the most sincere professions of their attachment to the French, and Vaudreuil answered them with a tone of authority; but, before he dismissed them, gave them considerable presents. It was about this time, that the Outagamis, (vulgarly called the Foxes,) who for twenty-five years had scarcely been heard of, began to make a great figure in North America. They were accounted to be more fierce, resolute, and vindictive, than even the most savage of the Iroquois, and, by mingling with them, they had come over to the interest of the English, to whom they promised to surprize fort Detroit, and to put it into their hands. With this view, they lay very near the place, and omitted no opportunity of insulting the garrison, which was commanded by one Du Buisson. Two other savage nations, the Kicapous and the Mascontins were confederated with them in the same design, which was discovered to Du Buisson, by one Joseph, a christian Outagamis, who informed him that they were farther exasperated by their receiving intelligence that a hundred and fifty Mascontins had been cut off, as they were coming to join them, by the Outaouais. Buisson, who had but twenty Frenchmen in the fort, sent out to inform the French Indians of his danger; but they were gone a hunting. At last, having taken all precautions against a surprize, he understood that they were on their march to relieve him. They consisted of the Outaouais, headed by a chief, one Saguima, who had cut off the Mascontins; the Hurons, the Pouteouatamis, the Sakis, the Maibomines, the Illinois, the Osages, and the Missourites; each of whom had a particular standard. "See'st thou that smoke, Saguima, said the Hurons to him, (to animate him the more to vengeance,) it rises from the flames that are now consuming thy wife." When the confederates approached the fort, Du Buisson ordered them to be admitted, and, after addressing them in a most affectionate pathetic manner, they were furnished with refreshments of all kinds, besides powder and ball.

THE Outagamis had reared a fort within musket-shot of that of Detroit, where they waited for their enemies with the most astonishing intrepidity, till they were invested on all hands and attacked with a very brisk fire. The brave defence they made obliged the assailants, at last, to raise two stages, each twenty-five feet high, from whence they battered the Outagamis, who now suffered every extreme of hunger and thirst. So great, however, was the affection of those poor wretches for the English, that they hoisted red coverlets by way of colours upon their palisadoes, calling out with all their might, that they had no other father but the Englishman, who would not fail to come to their relief, or revenge their death; at the same time, they advised the confederates to follow their example. It appears, as if those exclamations had made no inconsiderable impression upon the rest of the savages; and, of this Du Buisson was so apprehensive, that he ordered all conversation between the assailants and the besieged to be broken off. This could not be done before the latter had sheltered themselves in an adjoined house, against which Du Buisson ordered cannon to be brought. After this, the Outagamis demanded a parley, which he would not grant without consent a consent of the chiefs of his allies, whose opinion, upon consultation, was for it, that they might draw from their hands three of their women, whom the besieged held prisoners. Next morning Pemoussa, the chief of the Outagamis, was admitted into the assembly of the confederates, where he presented Du Buiffon with two captives and a belt, and the chiefs with the same, and begged for a delay of two days, that they might consult their elders upon the means of appealing their father's wrath. The manner in which he spoke touched the savages so much, that they were dumb, till Du Buiffon told Pemoussa, that he could enter into no farther treaty with his people, till they sent him the three women, one of whom actually was the wife of Saguima. Pemoussa's answer was, that he could say nothing on that head, till he had consulted the elders; and, having obtained a farther respite, he returned b with a white flag in his hand, attended by two Mascontin chiefs, and the three women whom he presented to the governor, who referred him to the chiefs of his allies, for what was farther to be done, upon the Outagamis demanding liberty to be gone. Upon this, the chief of the Illinois gave Pemoussa to understand that his people were to expect no mercy unless they surrendered at discretion; but he gave them liberty to re-enter the fort, and to make the best defence they could. They accordingly did so, and the fire on both sides being renewed, the besieged made so vigorous a resistance, that, by discharging arrows with lighted matches, they set on fire several houses in the French settlement, which obliged the besiegers to cover the remaining with skins. This resolute defence so greatly dispirited the French and the savages, that the latter were on the point of re-imbarking for Michillimakinac. Du Buiffon

c found means to detain them by presenting them with every thing he was master of, and then the war-song was renewed, which gave the besieged to understand that they had now no safety to expect, unless they accepted of the terms proposed. They begged for some farther time, and they were permitted to send a fresh deputation to the camp of the besiegers; who, notwithstanding all their earnest instances, still insisted upon their surrendering at discretion; and it was with great difficulty that Du Buiffon hindered his savages from putting the deputies to death. They were suffered to return to their fort, from whence all of them escaped under the favour of a tempestuous night, after enduring for nineteen days, under all the pressures of nature, a most vigorous siege by very superior numbers.

Desperate defence of the Outagamis,

In the morning, the French and their savages pursued them, and found them entrenched
d on a little tongue of land near the island of St. Clare. Here they were again besieged; but their defence for four days was so brave, that the French commandant was obliged to bring up the heavy artillery to force their entrenchments, upon which they surrendered at discretion. All who were found in arms were immediately put to death; the others were divided as slaves amongst the confederate Indians, who cut their throats likewise; so that few or none escaped the massacre; and it was computed, that upon the whole about 2000 of those brave savages were cut in pieces. It is impossible to read even the account in Charlevoix of this little campaign, without horror. The Outagamis appeared to have done nothing farther than to have declared themselves friends to the English, which was crime enough for their savage enemies, less barbarous than their French commander, under whose orders they e acted, to put them to a general massacre, after performing actions that must have entitled them not only to pardon, but to esteem, from any but Frenchmen, or a French Canadian. Perhaps the reader will scarcely believe, what is true, that this horrible massacre has, with the French historian, raised Du Buiffon to the character of a good officer, and a man of honour.

NEW FRANCE being now delivered from all its dangers, Vaudreuil applied himself to the re-establishment of the post of Michillimakinac, which had suffered greatly during the late commotions; and to which he sent proper officers and agents, to re-unite the savages in one common interest; in which they succeeded in appearance, but failed in reality. The natives there could not be persuaded to forbear their traffick with the English, in which they found
f so great advantage, and in which they were followed, even by the colonized savages; while the state of the French affairs in Europe was so low, that they could receive from thence no relief. The goods sent from France to Canada were so trifling in their value, that the merchants there had no returns to make equal to the furs imported by the savages, who, for that reason, were obliged to throw into the hands of the English by far the greatest part of the fur trade. Before the treaty of Utrecht, in the year 1713, was concluded, the governors of New France and New England received positive orders from their respective sovereigns to desist from all hostilities. It cannot be dissembled, that the conclusion of that treaty was highly for the interests of the English in America, where they had been miserably mismanaged. The Abenakis, who remained firm to the French, were g then carrying their ravages into the heart of New England; and, though by that treaty Lewis XIV. ceded his pretended superiority over the Iroquois, yet, by that time, the French had obtained such an ascendancy over them, that they declared they would maintain their own independance upon the English. All that the latter could do was to build a fort at the mouth of the river Choguen, where it discharges itself into the lake Ontario, in the country of the Onnontagueſe, while the French obtained from the Tſonmonthouans a permission to build another at the mouth of the river Niagara. As to the Abenakis, whose land fell within the cession of territory made to the English by the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht, as being comprehended within the limits of Acadia, or Nova Scotia, great difficulties occurred in the execution of that article. They were, of all the savages, the most irreconcilable to the English government, and the most wedded to popish absurdities. Nothing was omitted on the part of the English to win them over. They erected a free-school at the mouth of the river Kennebec, and appointed a minister, who was to board and teach their young at the public expence. But all was in vain, so strong was the delusions of their missionaries. The governors of New England and New York very wisely bore this with patience; so that the savages, by degrees, even encouraged the erecting of store-houses upon their lands, till they saw them multiply so fast, that they expressed their jealousy of them. The English then could not help signifying to them, that their whole country had, by treaty, become the property of the crown of England. The savages, tho' amazed at this, very sensibly complained to Vaudreuil, who made use of an evasion, unworthy a man of honour, and yet well adapted to encourage and confirm their dislike of the English; for he told them that no mention was made either of them, or their lands, in the treaty of Utrecht. When the governor of New England, in a conference he had with them, had convinced them of the truth, one of their chiefs replied with great spirit, That his majesty of France might dispose of what was his own as he pleased, but that the Abenakis held their land from nature, and that they would maintain their independency to the last child of their nation, who should be left alive. After this, upon some differences in matters of property, which were fomented by the popish missionaries, their deputies were arrested at Boston; and this, about the year 1721, produced some warm remonstrances on the part of the Abenakis. The case was perplexing. There could be no doubt with regard to the spirit and meaning of the treaty of Utrecht; but, from the moment that peace was concluded, the government of New France, from considering the Abenakis as slaves, affected to treat them as independent, and maintained amongst them an interest separate from the crown of England, which was extremely pleasing to the natural vanity of those savages. The English, on the other hand, could appeal only to the French, who denied their having had any authority over the savages, and maintained that they therefore could transfer none. They carried this insolent evasion so far, that when colonel Shute, then governor of New England, proposed a friendly conference for accommodating all differences, two jesuits and baron St. Castin proposed to be present on the part of the savages; and therefore the governor very properly refused to attend the conference in person. This St. Castin had great credit with those savages. His mother being an Abenakis, and he himself bred up all his life amongst them, they had appointed him to be the commander in chief of their nation, and he affected on all occasions to appear as an Abenakis; but he wore a French uniform, as having a commission from his most Christian majesty, whom he acknowledged to be his sovereign. As his local allegiance undoubtedly was due to the crown of England, the governor of New England ordered him to be arrested, and he was carried in a ship of war to Boston; but so cautious were the English of offending the Abenakis, that, though he talked in a very independent tone, he was released.

State of New France at the time of the treaty of Utrecht.

Disputes between the English and the savages.

Intrigues of a jesuit.

THE English found a still greater obstacle to the conformity of those savages, in the person of one Rasle, an active zealous jesuit, who had long resided amongst them as a missionary, and had got so entire a possession of their affections, that they implicitly followed his dictates in every thing. Being an enthusiast for his country, as well as religion, he omitted nothing that could keep up the aversion of the Abenakis towards the English. It was in vain the latter, (who every day felt his influence with the savages,) insisted upon his being dismissed out of their nation, and sent to Quebec; and, at last, they were obliged not only to set a reward on his head, but to make an attempt to possess themselves of his person, in which they failed. This attack upon their favourite jesuit exasperated the savages more than that which had been made upon their independency. They sent deputies thro' all their brethren and allies to meet them at Narrantſouak, their chief village, which they accordingly did; and nothing now but the war-song was to be heard, from the Hurons of Loretto to the savages of New England. They began by demolishing the English settlements on the banks of the rivers, where they destroyed all the lands and houses, but without offering any farther violence to the persons of the inhabitants than by confining five of them as hostages for their deputies, who were prisoners at Boston. It was impossible, and indeed would have been dangerous, for the English to have been longer passive. They broke into Narrantſouak, where they shot the pestilent missionary dead, burnt the cabins, plundered the church, and killed some of the inhabitants, who opposed them, while others fled; and this severity, for some time, restored tranquillity to New England, but was far from ^a reconciling the Abenakis to the British government. The English pretended they were in danger of losing all the acquisitions they had made in Acadia, and Newfoundland, by the treaty of Utrecht, through the inhabitants, French as well as savages, making use of the liberty which that treaty gave them, to retire to Cape Breton, and therefore they gave them such indulgences, that they did not seem to remember their having changed their sovereign.

WHEN Mr. Richards, in 1720, took possession of the government of Acadia and Newfoundland, he was astonished to find part of his government living independent, not only of him, but of the crown of England. They openly traded with Cape Breton, then in the French possession. They acknowledged neither laws nor language, but what were French, and their priests publicly performed their sacerdotal functions, as if popery had been the established religion of the country. Richards very sensibly endeavoured to abridge those impolitic indulgences, both in Acadia and Newfoundland; but he was not supported in this wise measure, which, if executed, might have prevented a vast effusion of blood and treasure, by the government at home. The truth is, king George I. at that time, had great connections with the regent of France: but it was an unpardonable oversight to dispense with the French Canadians and Acadians, as well as the savages, who had become subjects of Great Britain, taking an oath of fidelity to that crown (P). As we intend to give, under a separate head, the history of the settlement on Cape Breton, which the French now projected, and carried into execution, as the most proper means for indemnifying themselves for the loss of what they had given up by the treaty of Utrecht, we shall only say, that that settlement, as well as that of the island of St. John, was left entirely to the care of Castelblanc and St. Ovide; the latter of whom proved a very active agent for France in all her differences with Great Britain.

IT is equally astonishing, that the province of Canada, planted by a great and numerous people, should remain so long thinly inhabited, so poor, and so uncomfortable, as that it should, after so long a war as that which was terminated by the peace of Utrecht, be able to make head against the English, who were able, at that time, upon the same continent, to bring 60,000 fighting men into the field. As to the state of Canada, in the year 1714, we can have no better authority than the words of Vaudreuil, the governor-general, in his letter to Pontchartrain, the French minister^b. "Canada, says he, contains actually no more than 4484 inhabitants, able to bear arms from the age of 14 to 60, and the 28 companies of marines, paid by the king, amount to no more in number, than 628 soldiers." In the same letter, he lays down a scheme, the particulars of which are immaterial here, for the better peopling of his government, by transporting thither convicts and galley-slaves; and his advice appears to have been followed with success. His government, however, after the peace of Utrecht, was far from being tranquil. The Outagamis, notwithstanding the blow they had received in the affair of Detroit, were more exasperated than ever against the French. They infested all the communications between the colony and its most distant posts, robbing and murdering passengers, and in this they succeeded so well, that they brought over the Sieux to join them openly, while many of the Iroquois favoured them underhand. In short, there was some danger of a general confederacy amongst all the savages against the French. This made Vaudreuil resolve, if possible, to exterminate the Outagamis out of Canada, and invited all his savage allies to join him. Louvigny, the king's lieutenant at Quebec, was named to command the expedition; and he was soon at the head of eight hundred men, so determined against the Outagamis, that the extirpation of the race was no longer doubted of. They were themselves of the same opinion, and they lay intrenched, to the number of 500 warriors, and 3000 women, in a kind of palisadoed fort, before which Louvigny formally opened trenches, having with him two field-pieces, and a mortar for throwing grenades. The besieged, at first, defended themselves with great vigour; but, when Louvigny was preparing to spring a mine, they desired to capitulate, and their terms were rejected. They afterwards proposed others; viz. First, that the Outagamis and their confederates should make peace with the French and their allies. Secondly, that they should previously release all their prisoners. Thirdly, that they should replace the dead by slaves, whom they were to make prisoners from the distant nations they were at war with; and, fourthly, that they should pay the charge of the war. Louvigny had private instructions from his principals not to push matters to extremity. In this,

(P) The argument, we have mentioned, about the danger of Acadia becoming uncultivated, in case the French had been forced out of it, has in it no manner of weight. Their settlements were all cultivated lands, conveniently situated, and well improved; and never could have been without occupiers, both from Great Britain, and the continent of America.

they undoubtedly acted wisely, and by making presents to the chief leaders of his allies, he brought them to consent to the terms proposed. This, however, was an insidious negotiation. He obliged the Outagamis to give six sons of six of their chief leaders, as hostages for their sending deputies to ratify the peace at Montreal with the governor-general; and the treaty, being ingrossed, contained an express cession of their country to the French; of which, it is probable, the savages knew nothing. Unfortunately the small-pox, which raged next winter, carried off three of the hostages, together with the famous Outagamis chief, Pemoussa, before the treaty was ratified. This alarmed Vaudreuil so much, that he went upon the ice to Montreal, from whence he dispatched Louigny to Michillimakinac, with an order to execute the terms of the treaty, and to bring the chiefs of the Outagamis to Montreal, together with all the rangers in those parts, to whom his most Christian majesty had granted a free pardon for what had passed. Louigny set out at the end of May, 1717, and very prudently carried along with him one of the surviving hostages, who had lost an eye by the small-pox, that he might bear testimony to his nation, with what tenderness he and his companions had been treated. As soon as he arrived at Michillimakinac, he dispatched the hostage, attended by two French interpreters, with presents for covering the dead hostages, to the Outagamis. This was so agreeable to those savages, that they immediately raised the song of peace, or the calumet. They then declared to the interpreters their gratitude to Onontio, but added, that, for some particular reasons, they could not wait upon him till next year: that they never would forget that they owed their lives entirely to his clemency. The hostage and the interpreters then set out to rejoin Louigny at Michillimakinac; but, after travelling about twenty leagues, he left them, it being proper, as he said, to return home that he might keep his countrymen to their promise.

THE event shewed how little Vaudreuil and his assistants, notwithstanding all their experience, understood the nature of those savages. The hostage was never heard of after, neither did they send any deputies to the governor-general; so that all the fruit, which Louigny and Vaudreuil reaped from this laborious journey, was the bringing back the French rangers, and engaging some of the savages to bring their furs in greater quantities to the colony, than they had done for some years before. The reason the Outagamis gave for this breach of faith, when they afterwards met with the French in their excursions, was, that they had no idea an enemy, who had been provoked beyond a certain measure, could ever be a reconciled friend. They were afterwards beat in several encounters, and yet they forced the Illinois to abandon their settlements upon their river; where they formed a plantation, which rendered all communication between Canada and Louisiana extremely dangerous, notwithstanding all the losses they had sustained. The reader is, however, to observe, that they had, by this time, formed an alliance with the Sieux, the most numerous nation belonging to Canada; and with the Chichacas or Chickesaws, the bravest nation in all Louisiana. In the year 1725, New France enjoyed a tranquillity, that it had seldom known, and which greatly advanced both its populousness and prosperity; but the loss of the Camel, a French ship of war, which was wrecked near Louisbourg, with every soul on board, gave it a great blow. Besides its rich cargo, the intendant of Canada, Louigny, who had been appointed to the government of Trois Rivières, a son of Ramezay, who the year before had died governor of Montreal, together with a great number of the officers of the colony, and ecclesiastics of all denominations, perished in the wreck. To crown this misfortune, the marquis de Vaudreuil himself died in the October following, greatly lamented by the whole colony. He, as well as his predecessors, gave signal proofs of that secondary genius, which prefers the smiles of a court to all other considerations. Under vast disadvantages, arising from the weakness or inattention of the French ministry, he most surprizingly upheld the credit and interest of his government; and, notwithstanding the incredible disproportion of force between New France, even taking it in its utmost extent, and the English settlements on the continent of America, he had the address to conceal the weakness of his government; so that he left it, if not envied, yet respected, by its neighbours.

Death of Vaudreuil,

who is succeeded by Beauharnois.

He was succeeded in his government by the chevalier de Beauharnois, who had none of his predecessor's difficulties to struggle with; and nothing occurs remarkable in the history of Canada, but that, by the tranquillity it enjoyed, in the year 1751, its French inhabitants amounted to above 70,000. It does not belong to this part of our history to retrace the various situations of the courts of France and England, during this long interval; but it is certain that the government of England was lulled into a most fatal security, whilst that of France was making wide strides towards a total acquisition of North America. In the year 1746, the encroachments they made upon the undoubted property of the English in America awakened our government to a sense of its danger. A British secretary of state, by order of his majesty, required all the British governors in North America, to raise as many independent

- a pendent companies as they could, of a hundred men each. Those of New York, New Jerseys, Pensylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, were to be formed into one corps, under the command of brigadier Gooch, lieutenant-governor of Virginia. The colonies were to furnish levy-money and victualling; but his majesty was to be at the charge of arming, paying, and cloathing those troops. It was no secret, that those vast preparations in America, which were to be seconded by a suitable armament from Europe, were destined for the reduction of Canada; and that the whole was to be under the command of general Sinclair. The English colonies, therefore, proceeded with infinite spirit in their levies. Virginia sent two companies, Maryland three, Pensylvania four, the Jerseys five, and New York fifteen; all to be under the command of Gooch, and first to reduce Crown Point, and then Montreal.
- b The yellow fever then prevailing at Albany, the place of rendezvous for the troops was appointed at Saratago, twenty miles higher up Hudson's river. For this service, Massachusetts's Bay raised twenty companies, Connecticut ten, Rhode Island three, New Hampshire two, in all thirty-five companies, who were to attack Quebec, under general Sinclair, while Gooch was proceeding against Montreal. It was the misfortune of the British government at that time, that few qualifications, besides the date of a commission, were required in a commander. Sinclair had age and rank to recommend him; but he had neither activity, spirit, nor capacity, for so arduous an expedition, the miscarriage of which has never to this day been accounted for. The true state of the matter seems to have been, that the general, not being very fond of the service, did not expedite the preparations early enough in the year, and very possibly the ministry, even at that time, had their reasons for not provoking France beyond certain bounds. Lestock, the same officer who was so well known by his differences with admiral Matthews, was to command the fleet; but the public need not be informed, that the whole of the mighty preparations in England ended in a most scandalous pusillanimous attempt, under the same Sinclair and Lestock, upon Port L'Orient in Old France.

- THE French were not ignorant of the storm that was hovering over their American colonies. They sent all the force they could spare from Canada to Minas and Chibouctou, and omitted no opportunity of harassing and destroying the English settlements. In the summer of 1746, the Canadians receiving intelligence of the vast preparations making against them in England, Ramezay arrived at Minas, at the head of 1600 men, consisting of marine regulars, Canadian militia, wood-rangers, and French Indians. This body was to act in concert with a strong squadron, then fitting out at Brest, under the duke D'Anville. That armament consisted of eleven line of battle ships, some frigates, two fire-ships, transports, &c. having 31,500 land forces aboard. It was the 22d of June, before this squadron sailed from Rochelle, and the public of England were amazed that it was suffered to proceed unmolested, though Mr. Martin was then lying with a strong squadron of observation in the channel. The plan of D'Anville's instructions seems to have been formed upon those of Frontenac and Pontchartrain. He was ordered to retake and dismantle Louisbourg, which was then in the hands of the English. He was then to proceed against Port Royal, now called Annapolis Royal in Acadia, which he was to take and garrison. He was next to destroy Boston, then to range along the coasts of North America; and, at last, to pay a visit to the British sugar islands. D'Anville, setting sail, detached three of his capital ships and a frigate, under the command of M. Conflans, to convoy the French trade to Cape François from Hispaniola. The orders of Conflans were to return, and join the grand squadron under D'Anville; but, after cruising upon Cape Sable shore, between Cape Negro and Cape Sambre, without receiving any intelligence of D'Anville, they bore away directly for France; where, to the reproach of the British marine, they arrived in safety.

Expedition of the duke
D'Anville

- As to the main fleet under D'Anville, it was unfortunate almost beyond example. After undergoing a most tedious passage, and suffering in a storm near Cape Sable, it arrived on September the 10th at Chibouctou in Nova Scotia, where D'Anville himself died, as did half of his people of scorbutic putrid fevers and dysenteries. Their faithful Abenakis, now called the Nova Scotia Indians, paid them so many visits, that they at last caught the infection of their diseases, and were reduced almost one third. It would appear as if the British marine had been afraid of the infection likewise; for though an English squadron was then lying at Cape Breton under admiral Townshend, the French remained unmolested at Chibouctou amidst all their distress. In the mean while the Canadians, under Ramezay, were highly caressed by the French of Nova Scotia, who, as we have already observed, were, in fact, subjects to the crown of Great Britain, by the treaty of Utrecht; but having spent the summer at las Minas, without receiving any intelligence of D'Anville or his squadron, they set out on their return for Canada. While they were upon their march D'Anville arrived at Chibouctou, and immediately dispatched an express, requiring them to return, which about four hundred of them did under Ramezay. About the end of September, Ramezay encamped ed near Annapolis with a shew of besieging it; but the Chester man of war of fifty guns, a frigate and a sloop being in the harbour, and the French fleet departing, shattered and inglorious to France, he decamped on the 22d of October, and returned to Minas. There and at Chiconeito he wintered, that he might be in readiness to join the French fleet and land troops that were expected in the spring from France, to reduce Annapolis, which, by this time, was reinforced by three companies of volunteers from Boston. M. Sorene was then the English governor of Annapolis, and laid a scheme for preventing the bad consequences of French influence in that neighbourhood, by procuring 1000 men as a reinforcement from New England. The assembly of the Massachusetts Bay accordingly voted five hundred, Rhode Island three hundred, and New Hampshire two hundred. Of those the Rhode Islanders were shipped near Martba's Vineyard. The New Hampshire men never arrived at the place of their destination; but the Massachusetts Bay men, amounting in the whole to four hundred and seventeen, besides officers, arrived under captain Morris, at Minas, on the 12th of December, after a fatiguing march of thirty leagues by land; which they performed in eight days, though each man had fourteen days provision upon his back.

The French
defeat the English,

It must be acknowledged that those troops had more courage than discipline. They were commanded by one colonel Noble; but a detachment of them set out for Annapolis on the 29th of January, while the others were quartered at Grand Pre in a loose, scattered, and unsoldier-like manner. The French were sufficiently informed of this irregular cantonment, and on the 8th of January, they set out from Chiconeito, and arrived at Minas the 31st of the same month. About three in the morning having distributed their force, which consisted of about six hundred, into small parties of fifty or sixty each, they attacked the English, and murdered many of them in an inhuman manner. Colonel Noble, and the lieutenants Lechemere, Jones, Pickering, ensign Noble, with about seventy serjeants, corporals, and private men, were killed, and about as many taken prisoners. Despair, however, at last brought the English into a body, and they surrendered upon the following capitulation, first, to march off with arms shouldered, drums beating, colours flying, through a lane of the enemy with rested firelocks. Secondly, to be allowed six days provision, one pound of powder with ball; and thirdly, not to carry arms within the bays of Minas and Chiconeito for six months. After this, the French retired to Chiconeito, where they lay most part of the summer in expectation of Jonquiere's squadron, which was to bring a large reinforcement that was to enable Canada to give laws to all North America.

But are defeated at sea.

ACCORDINGLY in the spring of 1747, the junction of the Brest and Rockfort squadrons was effected at Rockelle. Their destination was to the East Indies and to Canada. The fleet consisted in the whole of thirty-eight sail, of which seven were ships of war from seventy-four to forty-four guns, and the Invincible of seventy-four guns, with a frigate of forty-four were appointed to convoy six East India ships, whilst the rest, with the transports and merchantmen full of soldiers, stores, and goods, were destined for Canada and Nova Scotia. The equipment of this squadron was no secret in England; and as it was big with destruction to our Asian, as well as American settlements, the admirals Anson and Warren sailed from Plymouth to Cape Finisterre on the coast of Galicia, and the third of May, they fell in with the French squadron. The latter immediately formed a line of battle, consisting of their chief ships of war, while the others, under the protection of their frigates, made all the sail they could to the place of their destination. The English ships, in like manner, were drawn up in line of battle; but Warren who, to all the virtues that any man could possess, added as much ability to the seaman as any one ever exerted, observed, that the real design of the French was rather to fly than to fight; and therefore he persuaded Anson, who was his superior in command, to haul in the signal for the line, and to hoist out one for the chase. This proved a most masterly manœuvre. The French fought bravely, but were at last obliged to strike their colours. Six of their men of war were taken with all their East India ships, and between 4 and 5000 French were made prisoners; amongst whom was la Jonquiere the admiral. About seven hundred of the French were killed and wounded, as were about five hundred of the English. Ramezay, who continued still at Minas and Chiconeito, received advice of this dreadful defeat by some straggling storeships, which escaped. An end was now put to all his towering hopes of reducing Nova Scotia, and he was obliged to return to Canada, while the treasure taken by the admirals Anson and Warren was conveyed in twenty waggons to the bank of England.

They endeavour to re-establish Canada.

It appears from the efforts made by the French towards the close of the war, which was terminated by the peace of Aix-la Chapelle, that they at last became sensible as to the importance of Canada, and they even strained their mother-country to support it. During the short interval between that peace, and the eruption of the late war, they constructed a number of forts, which bade fair for engrossing the whole of the American inland trade. One of their capital aims was to get possession of Nova Scotia, and to annex that extensive province

- a vince to Cape Breton (Q). They founded this scheme chiefly upon the affections of the French, who remained in Nova Scotia after the treaty of Utrecht, and who acted so much as French subjects, that they refused to take the oath of allegiance to the government of Great Britain. They endeavoured to join the two colonies of Canada and Louisiana, the former in North and the latter in South America by communications, which effectually cut the English from all the back settlements, and confined them to a very small portion of territory on the sea-coast; which in time they must likewise have been masters of. For this purpose they seized upon the river Ohio, by which they bounded the English possessions in the South, as they had done before by Crown Point and Niagara in the North. In the year 1749, immediately after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, they began to make good their unjust and scandalous claim upon that river, by sending five hundred men under M. Celeron to take possession of both sides of it. The English had a preferable right; but the natives thought that none had a title to their country but themselves, and therefore drove the French from their intended settlement. Upon this the French sent numbers of their disbanded soldiers to lake Erie, and formed settlements about Detroit, the river Miamis, and Sandoski. The uncertain condition in which the limits of Nova Scotia was left by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the shameful prevarications of the French commissaries concerning those limits, with all the various elusions they made use of, were the means they used for carrying their ambitious and treacherous designs into execution, in which they were so greatly aided by their mother-country, that at the time of that peace, the Canadian militia amounted to 12,000 men, besides 1000 regular troops, and the marine companies. In short, to bridle the British settlements, the following forts were erected; first, Crown Point, or Fort Frederick, which is an intrusion upon the jurisdiction of New York; secondly, Fort Chamblais, built upon a pass from the English settlements to the upper French settlements in Canada. Third, Fort Sorel, where the river Chamblais enters that of St. Lawrence. Fourth, Fort Frontenac, commonly called Catarocouy, which we have already so often mentioned. Fifth, Fort Denonville, near the great cataract of Niagara between the lake Ontario and the Erie. Sixth, la Trouette at les Detrouites, between the lake Erie and the Hurons. All or most of these forts have been occasionally mentioned in the course of this work; but the uses of them were never fully improved till the time of peace.
- d BESIDES the forts we have already mentioned occasional stockades were established from Canada to New Orleans, and the mouth of the Mississippi, which generally were garrisoned by a serjeant's command, and, at last, an annual patrol was settled, reaching all the amazing distance between Quebec and New Orleans, containing a journey of about six hundred leagues, comprehending the Detours. The government of England every week received fresh informations concerning the danger of their colonies from their American governors; but the imprudent, and indeed fatal stipulation of referring our territorial disputes to commissaries, who were to meet at Paris, prevented any vigorous measures from being taken. The commissaries, on the part of France, were Galiffoniere, who had been lately governor of New France and la Houettes. Those on the part of Great Britain were Mr. Shirley and Mr. Mildmay; but the proceedings on both parts were contemptible beyond expression. The French most impudently insisted upon the limits of Nova Scotia being confined to the peninsula of that name, while the English rightly claimed all the ancient Acadia, as ceded by the 12th article of the treaty of Utrecht, the limits of which are the southern bank of the river St. Lawrence to the north, and Pentagoet to the West. The particulars of this dispute are now immaterial; so that it is sufficient to say here that the French were guilty during those ridiculous conferences, not only of prevarication but of forgery, to support their claims, for they invented terms, limits, and charts, that never had any existence but in their own pretensions. But they did not confine their arguments to mere literary distinctions, for they supported them with arms. Jonquiere, then governor-general of Canada, actually sent letters to the British commandant at Nova Scotia, and the governor of Massachusetts Bay, by which he claimed great part of Acadia; and la Corne, a French Canadian officer, was detached with three companies of marines, about four hundred Indians of Canada, St. John's, Cape Sable, and Penobscot, some Canada militia and Coueurs des Bois, and French neutrals. The true design of this detachment, which was cantoned on the north side of Chicouet Bay and river, was to cover the building of forts, particularly those of Beausejour, and others near bay Verte and St. John's upon that narrow neck of land, so as to confine the British subjects entirely within the peninsula. All that the British subjects could do was to summon la Corne to retire. But without disowning his quarters of cantonment to be within the British dominions, he pretended he resided there only to protect and support the French Indians. It soon appeared that the French had a more extensive scheme in view. The governor-general of Canada formally intimated to the

governors of New York and Pensylvania, that the English inland traders having presumed to trade with the Indians, who were under the protection of his sovereign, he would arrest them wherever they could be found. This menace, though an infamous proceeding, was carried into execution by the seizure of three British traders, whose effects were confiscated, while their persons were sent to Quebec, and from thence prisoners to Rochelle. There, with difficulty, an application from them found access to the earl of Albemarle the British ambassador at Paris; and they were set at liberty upon his lordship's remonstrating against the illegality of the proceeding. It must be acknowledged that the resentment of the British court at this time fell short of the provocations it received. Mr. Pelham, who was considered as the first minister at the court of London, had himself upright intentions, and was perhaps a little too backward in believing that the French were so ill intentioned as their proceedings but too palpably proved them to be. The assurances of friendship and amity daily thrown out by the ministry of Versailles, contributed to this delusion; but instead of being followed by suitable effects, their encroachments every day became more bare-faced and intolerable. It unfortunately happened, that they received but too much encouragement from the conduct of the English themselves, which makes a retrospective narrative here necessary.

Account of the Ohio company.

SPOTSWOOD, the governor of Virginia, about the year 1716, was a man of sense and spirit, and finding the Outaouais, now called the Twightees, extremely well affectioned towards the English, he proposed to purchase some of their lands upon the river Ohio, and to erect a company for opening a trade to the southward, westward, and northward of that river with the savages. This was at once a rational and a practicable scheme, but the execution of it depended entirely upon the favourable dispositions of the natives for the English, which might have been secured by the punctual payment of the purchase-money or effects. This noble project clashed with the views of the French, who had, by this time, formed their great schemes upon the Mississippi, and the ministry of king George the 1st. as we have already hinted, having reasons for keeping well with that court, the project was not only dropt, but the French were encouraged to build the fort of Crown Point upon the territory of New York. Upon the conclusion of the peace of Aix la-Chapelle, Spotswood's scheme was revived: but the most prudent part of it was omitted; for no care was taken to conciliate the affection of the natives to the undertaking. Instead of that, certain merchants of London trading to Maryland and Virginia, being encouraged by the government upon their petition to undertake to settle the banks of the Ohio, provided they could exercise an exclusive trade with the Indians, employed a surveyor to take plans of the country, as far as the falls of that river. The natives, though pacific, were alarmed at this, and their natural jealousy was inflamed by the French, who represented the conduct of the English in the blackest colours. Even the separate traders of Virginia and Pensylvania, perceiving the gainful commerce carried on with the savages on the brink of ruin by a monopoly, co-operated with the French; so that in fact the undertakers lost all interest in that extensive country, the most beautiful and fertile perhaps of any in America. The French were not insensible of this, and continued to strengthen themselves at Niagara and the lake Erie, upon lands that originally belonged to the British subjects. Mr. Hamilton, who was then governor of Pensylvania, represented these proceedings to the assembly of that province, and proposed erecting truck houses in the nature of small forts upon the Ohio for the protection of the British traders there. But though the assembly agreed to this proposal, diversity of opinions and interests ruined the execution of it, while the French were every day becoming more and more formidable to the English settlements. Mr. Dinwiddie, the governor of Virginia, did not fail by many spirited speeches, messages, and dispatches to alarm the British government upon those interesting heads; and at last he sent one major Washington with a letter to the French commandant of a fort built on the river au Beuf, which falls into the Ohio, not far from lake Erie, and which was unquestionably situated upon British territory, complaining of the encroachment, and requiring him to evacuate the place. The only answer which Mr. Dinwiddie received to his message from the commandant, was, that he would transmit his letter to Du Quesne, the governor-general of Canada; but that it not being his business to examine into the property of the lands upon the Ohio, it could not be expected that he would leave his post. Mr. Dinwiddie upon this projected a fort near the forks of the river; but no care being taken by the Virginians for conciliating the affections of the natives, this served to exasperate them, though the province undertook to defray the expence, and the materials were actually provided.

Their practices on that river.

In the mean while, a noble design was formed at home for securing the British settlements in Nova Scotia, by building the town of Hallifax there. It is divided into thirty-five squares, each containing sixteen lots, of forty by sixty feet, one established church, and one meeting house, and a small number of houses out of the regular streets, which are fifty-five feet broad. The town is surrounded with picketings, and guarded by forts on the

a the outside. Along the river, to the southward of the town, are buildings and fish flakes, for at least two miles; and to the northward, on the river, about one mile; and behind these several lots of fifteen acres distributed; also a small Dutch town, and a large space of land behind the town besides for a common. The river Chebueto is at the town three miles broad, and over-against the town is another small town, called Dartmouth, up a cove; this is very thinly inhabited, the Indians having often visited it, and done considerable damage. This plan, however, has since received vast improvements, and the whole project was formed by the earl of Hallifax, then first commissioner of the British Trade and Plantations. The original design of it was to give tracts of land to such officers and soldiers as were willing to go over and settle there. This scheme the government adopted, and began to execute in 1749; and the lords commissioners of Trade and Plantations issued a proclamation, by which fifty acres of land were offered to every soldier and sailor, who would settle in that part of America, without paying any rent or service during ten years, and no more than one shilling per annum for the fifty acres afterwards; to every soldier or sailor, who had a wife and children, ten acres more were offered for every individual in his family, and for every increase that should afterwards happen on the same condition. To each subaltern officer eighty acres, and fifteen more for each of his family; two hundred acres to each ensign, three hundred to each lieutenant, four hundred to each captain, six hundred to each officer in rank above a captain, and thirty acres more for every person in his household. The government also engaged to transport and maintain the new settlers one year at its own expense, and to furnish them with such arms, provisions, utensils, implements, and tools, as should be necessary to put them in a condition to clear and cultivate their lands, to build them habitations, and commence a fishery. The same conditions that were offered to soldiers and sailors, were also offered to all carpenters, and other handicraftsmen; and surgeons were offered the same conditions as an ensign. Though this proclamation was published so late as March, yet in the beginning of May following, no fewer than 3750 persons embarked and established themselves on the borders of the bay of Chebueto; where, under colonel Cornwallis, who was appointed governor of the settlement, they built a city called Hallifax, in honour of the projector, and before the end of October, the same year, three hundred and fifty comfortable wooden houses were built, as were many more during the winter. Nothing can more effectually shew the difference between the English and the French genius for colonizing, than the prodigious encouragement given by the British parliament to this infant settlement, which, in five years, amounted to a greater sum than all that the French had expended for a hundred and fifty years upon their extensive colony of Canada. The same year in which the first settlers were embarked, the parliament granted them 40,000 l. sterling, for the charge of that embarkation and other expenses. In the year 1750, they granted 57,582 l. 17 s. 3 d. 1 q. for the same purpose, in 1751, 53,927 l. 14 s. 4 d. in 1752, 61,492 l. 19 s. 4 d. 1 q. in 1753, 94,615 l. 12 s. 4 d. in 1754, 58,447 l. 2 s. and in 1755, 49,418 l. 7 s. 8 d. We have been the more particular with regard to this new settlement, because it formerly lay within the province of Canada, and because it was intended as a bulwark against the encroachments of the French Canadians in those quarters. It cannot be said that the success of the settlement answered the sanguine expectations of its patrons; and perhaps after-experience may prove that nothing is more hurtful to projects of that kind, than too great encouragement given by the government, as it tends to render the spirit of industry and agriculture less necessary to the subsistence of the inhabitants.

Settlement of Hallifax,

No sooner was Hallifax peopled than the French clandestinely spirited up their Indians against the British inhabitants; some of whom were murdered, while others were carried prisoners to Louisbourg, where they were sold to the French for arms and ammunition. When the government of England complained of this to the French court, they pretended that their subjects carried on that traffic to preserve the English from the cruelty of their Indian captors; but the futility of this pretence was fully demonstrated, by the excessive ransom which they obliged the British captives to pay. As it was notorious, that even the Indian parties were headed by the French, the British settlers made repeated complaints on that head to the governor of Louisbourg; but all the satisfaction they received in answer was, that those French officers were the inhabitants of Annapolis, who remained there after that country was ceded to the crown of England; and that consequently they were the subjects of Great Britain. But at last those very French of Annapolis avowed their attachment to the government of Canada by rising in rebellion against that of Great Britain.

which is infested by the French.

In the spring of the year 1750, the government of Hallifax detached major Lawrence with a small party to reduce those rebels; but upon his approach they burnt their habitations, and fled for protection to la Corne, whom we have already mentioned, and who thereby found himself at the head of 1500 men well provided with arms and ammunition. The match therefore between him and Lawrence became thereby so unequal, that the latter was obliged to have recourse to remonstrances only, upon the perfidious part the French were acting. La Corne, as usual, pretended that he could enter into no discussion of the rights of the two crowns : but he declared that he was resolved to obey his orders, and to maintain his post. Upon this Lawrence found himself under a necessity to return to Halifax, while the French neutrals, as they were called, renewed their depredations and murders upon the English subjects. Major Lawrence was then sent with 1000 men by sea to Chignecto; and though the rebels were advantageously posted, he killed a considerable number of them, and beating them out of their entrenchments obliged them again to take refuge under la Corne, by crossing a river, on the opposite bank of which he stood with his troops drawn up, and received them as friends and fellow subjects.

It cannot be dissembled that the state of parties in England at this time was unfavourable to any vigorous measures against the French. The English Americans were indeed warranted as to their hostilities against the Indians, and the French neutrals, who, in reality, were rebels; but they had not yet ventured to attack the French themselves, and this forbearance laid them under inexpressible disadvantages. All they could do was to act upon the defensive, and they built a fort called St. Lawrence, opposite to the French fort of Beaufejour on the neck of the peninsula. Notwithstanding this the Indians surprised the little town of Dartmouth on the other side of Hallifax bay, where they killed and scalped some inhabitants, and carried off others prisoners. Their manner of making war rendered it extremely difficult for the English to suppress them. Their natural swiftness and activity were favoured by the French lending their arms, ammunition, and canoes, which they did with all imaginable secrecy; and they were sheltered by two additional forts on the neck of the peninsula, one called Bay Verte, and the other at the mouth of St. John's river to the north of the bay of Fundy. The earl of Albemarle repeated his memorials at the court of France upon those invasions. He insisted upon de la Jonquiere, the French commander in chief in Canada, receiving orders to desist from all hostilities; that fort Niagara should be immediately demolished; that all the British prisoners in America should be set at liberty, and their captors severely punished. The French, in pursuance of their schemes, sought to gain time. They sent Jonquiere orders in the terms required by the British ambassador; but gave him (as appeared by his art and their conduct) private instructions, not to mind them, and all the satisfaction Great Britain obtained was the deliverance of six English prisoners out of their dungeons.

The French surprise Loggstown.

EVERY day brought fresh instances of the French encroachments and invasions in America. They surprised Loggstown, which the people of Virginia, for the convenience of trade, had built upon the Ohio, on pretence that it was within the government of Canada, and plundered its warehouses of skins and goods to the amount of 20,000*l*. Not contented with this booty, they murdered all the British traders but two, who escaped. In like manner, one Coutrecaur, a French officer came from Venango, another of their usurped forts on the Ohio, with 1000 men and eighteen pieces of cannon, in no fewer than three hundred canoes, and surprized a Virginian fort on the banks of the Monongahela. The certainty of of those, and many other hostilities arriving in England, the government there sent orders for their American governors to endeavour to drive the French from the Ohio, and to oppose force to force; but experience taught the British ministry the great superiority their enemies had arising from the constitutions of the two governments in that country. That of Canada or New France was moved by one direction, which gave it a force that rendered it more irresistible than that of the English, who had separate governments, and separate, nay sometimes contradictory, interests in view. This had been an evil long complained of, and it had visibly rendered our superiority of strength on that continent ineffectual, even for our own preservation. Two measures were necessary to be pursued to remedy this inconvenience. The first was a political confederacy amongst all the British governments; by which their power should be united in one; and the second was to detach the Indians from their connexions with the French.

Treaty between the English and the Iroquois ineffectual.

THE British colonists were sensible of the wisdom of those orders, but for the reason we have hinted at it was not easy to carry them into execution. The governor of New York, however, attended by deputies from the other governments, gave a meeting to the Iroquois, or, as they are now commonly called, the Indians of the Six Nations at Albany, where only a few of them attended, and it was evident that all of them were cooled in their affections towards the English. This was owing to the powerful, but secret practices of the French government, who, of late, had applied themselves in good earnest to the advancement of Canada, and had sent thither immense stores of money, arms, and ammunition. The English, to counterwork them in the same way, had voted considerable presents (the province of Virginia in particular raised five hundred pounds) to the savages of Albany; which they accepted of; but could be brought into no other measures for an alliance with the English, excepting that they were willing to renew their old treaties, and to join in driving the French from a from the posts they had usurped upon their lands. Major Washington had been dispatched by governor Dinwiddie to the French commandant upon the Ohio, requiring to know by whose authority and instructions he lately marched from Canada with an armed force, and invaded the king of Great Britain's territories. An officer, called St. Pierre was the commandant, and he returned Mr. Dinwiddie an answer dated from the fort upon the river au Beuf, full of evasions, but promising to transmit the governor's letter to the marquis du Quesne the governor-general of Canada. Washington having returned to Williamsburg, the British governors of Virginia and New York, came to a resolution to send him with some men to maintain their posts upon the Ohio. He accordingly encamped on the Great Meadows, and at first obtained some advantages, which were but confusedly related in the English Gazettes, b and the accounts published by their officers. Washington had with him about four hundred men, and had thrown up a hasty entrenchment for his own defence, upon what the French called their ground. A French officer, one Villier, then commanded at Monongahela, who, according to the English accounts, was at the head of nine hundred men; and Washington was expecting reinforcements from New York, which never arrived. De Villier sent one Jamouville, with a small party, formally to require Washington to abandon his entrenchments, or as he called it, fort. But the whole detachment was destroyed or taken prisoners, if we may believe the French, in a most unsoldierlike manner. De Villier, upon this, advanced at the head of his main body, and began an attack, after killing all the English horses and cattle in the meadows. Washington, for some time, defended himself with great intrepidity, and, c notwithstanding the inequality of the numbers, the French commandant offered him and his detachment a very honourable capitulation, by which both parties were to retire; the English towards Wills's Creek and the French back to Monongahela. Washington accepted of the terms, and sent two officers as hostages for the re-delivery of some prisoners, who had been made of Jamouville's detachment. The capitulation was scarcely settled, when a body of French Indians appeared, and though they were prevented from breaking it, which they were violently inclined to do, yet the French commandant very tamely saw them harra's the English in their retreat, and plunder their baggage.

Defence of Washington.

THE French ministry, by this time, having sent the full complements of reinforcements and supplies to Quebec, were at less than usual pains to apologize for this flagrant and d warrantable hostility, when complained of by the earl of Albermarle. The English colonies in America, instead of uniting against their common danger, seemed to be more divided than ever. The Virginians laid the blame of Washington's misfortune upon the people of New York not having fulfilled their engagements. At the same time, they differed upon some very immaterial points with their governor. The like disputes happened between the government and the people of Pennsylvania. The inhabitants of New York were exasperated to the last degree, upon their discovering certain instructions, which they knew their new governor, Si. Danvers Osborn, had brought from England; and the other British colonies on that continent were in a very little better situation; but they all concurred in sometimes blaming the backwardness, and sometimes imploring the assistance, of their mother country. e Orders were at last given by the court of England for raising two American regiments, the command of which was given to Shirley, governor of New England, and to Sir William Pepperel, a gentleman of that country, who both had served in the same rank in the preceding war. Several stores were likewise dispatched from England, for the defence of our American plantations, particularly of Castle William in Virginia; and notice, on the 7th of October, was given in the Gazette of the names of the officers, who were taken from the regular troops, that they might repair to their several stations.

f THE duke de Mirepoix was then the French ambassador at the court of London, and was a nobleman of more than Gallic integrity. The English ambassador at Paris being now dead, and Mirepoix being witness of the great preparations making in England for America; his court, who did not think that that of England would proceed with so much vigour, employed him to renew their assurances, that no hostilities were intended. They knew Mirepoix's character too well, to believe that he would give insincere assurances, and therefore carefully concealed from him their true intention, which made the ambassador enter very earnest protestations of his court's good faith; and offered to be answerable for it with his private honour. The British ministry had better intelligence than he imagined, and he was con- founded when they answered all his protestations of cordiality, by producing copies of the orders sent to the governor-general and their officers in Canada, which flatly contradicted him. The proofs were too flagrant to be denied, and all he could do was to upbraid the French ministry in person, but they referred him to the king, who sent him back with orders from himself to assure the court of England of his pacific intentions. Before he could well reach London, undoubted intelligence arrived of a powerful French armament being ready to sail from Brest and Rocheft. Upon this, admiral Boscawen, towards the end of April, 1755, sailed with twelve men of war for Plymouth, where they were to take soldiers on board, and from thence to proceed to watch the progress of the French fleet. The latter appeared to be stronger than was at first apprehended; for it consisted of twenty-five ships of the line, besides frigates and transports, and had on board 4000 regular troops, commanded by baron Dieskau, bound for Canada with vast quantities of warlike stores. Upon this intelligence, the British naval preparations were redoubled, and admiral Holbourne was sent with six ships of the line and a frigate to reinforce Boscawen.

sails for Canada.

MACNAMARA was appointed to command the French fleet, and, in the beginning of May, he sailed with it from Brest, his course being directed for Canada; but, after seeing it out of the chops of the English channel, he returned with nine of the capital ships, while the rest continued their course under the command of M. Bois de la Motte. Mirepoix no longer depending upon the faithless French ministry for his instructions, still continued his negotiations; but being made acquainted that Boscawen's instructions were to act offensively, he declared that his master would consider the first gun fired in a hostile manner, as a declaration of war, which would set all Europe and America in flames. It is foreign to our subject, to trace the many operations that were designed at this time, farther than they relate to Canada, and the war between the French and the English on that continent. Boscawen arrived on the banks of Newfoundland, and took his station off Cape Race. In a few days after, M. Bois de la Motte arrived with his squadron upon the same coast: but the thick fogs prevented either squadron from discovering the other, by which, part of the French escaped up the river St. Lawrence, and part went round to the same river by the straits of Bellefleur. Two of their ships, however, the Alcide, of sixty-four guns, and four hundred and eighty men, and the Lys pierced for sixty-five guns, but mounted only twenty-two, with four companies of land-forces on board, were separated by the fog from the rest of the fleet, and fell in with the Dunkirk, commanded by captain Hotte, and the Defiance, commanded by captain Andrews, both of them sixty-four gun ships; and, after a brisk engagement, they were both taken, with about 8000 l. on board. Various were the accounts which party began the attack; but, though the dispute is immaterial, it is probable the French fired the first gun, though the English, it is said, gave the first provocation.

Colonel Monckton reduces the French forts in Nova Scotia.

THE principal effect which this blow had (though it fell short of the public expectation) was to alarm the French, as much as it animated the English. The two French ministers, Mirepoix at London, and Buffy at Hanover, (where his Britannic majesty then was) were recalled, and the people of Great Britain being now convinced that the government was in earnest in their war with France, their preparations, both by sea and land, were continued with a spirit and expedition beyond example. The assembly of Massachusetts-Bay prohibited all commerce with the French at Louisbourg; and, early in the year, they raised a body of troops, which they sent to the assistance of Mr. Lawrence, governor of Nova Scotia, who had formed a plan, the execution of which was committed to colonel Monckton, for driving the French from fort Beaufejour, and the other posts they held upon the isthmus. The French had foreseen this attempt, and had made preparations, but ineffectually, to resist it. While colonel Monckton was employed by land upon this service, captain Rous was dispatched up the bay of Fundy, with three frigates and a sloop. The first resistance the English met with was at a block-house upon the river Massaguesset, where about four hundred and fifty rebel Acadians and Indians were posted with cannon behind a strong breast-work of timber. From this post they were driven, in an hour's time, by the English provincials, and the passage of the river was left free. The colonel then, on the 12th of June, invested fort Beaufejour, which mounted twenty-six pieces of cannon, with store of ammunition; and, after a bombardment of four days, before he had mounted a single cannon upon his batteries, he obliged it to surrender, though his force was so small, that he could not invest it. About a hundred and fifty regulars and three hundred inhabitants were found alive in the fort; the name of which the colonel changed into that of Cumberland. The capitulation granted to the garrison was, that it should not bear arms in America for six months; that they should be sent, at the king of Great Britain's expence, to Louisbourg; that the Acadians, in consideration of their having been compelled by the French to rebel, should be pardoned.

NEXT day, the colonel reduced the other French fort upon the river Gaspereau, running into Bay Verte, which was chiefly considerable by the large magazines of provisions it contained for the supply of the Indians. He then disarmed the Acadians, to the number, as is said, of 25,000. Captain Rous then sailed with three twenty-gun ships and a sloop, to look into St. John's river, where they found no ships; but the French in the fort there, upon their appearance, burst their cannon, blew up their magazine, and marched off. The native Indians upon the place, next morning, invited captain Rous on shore, and gave him the strongest assurances, that they intended to live in peace and friendship with the English;

a and that they had refused to assist the French, though greatly pressed by them to do it. We are now to attend another English expedition in America, which was as unfortunate, as that we have been describing was successful.

THE war with France being now declared, the English ministry, after almost ruining the French commerce by sea, came to a resolution of pushing them with the utmost vigour by land. For this purpose, other expeditions were marked out; one under general Braddock, who was to be sent from England against fort du Quesne upon the Ohio. Colonel Johnson, a British American, and an excellent officer, was to march against Crown Point, while general Shirley was to attack their fort at Niagara. Braddock had little to recommend him, but great courage and some experience in war; though of a very different sort from that required to succeed in America. In other respects he was very ill qualified to act in concert with the British Americans. It was agreed, that the general should sail from Cork in Ireland, with colonel Dunbar's and Sir Peter Halket's regiments of foot for Virginia, where he arrived before the end of February. This first part of his destination is thought to have been injudicious, and to have been owing to certain partialities at home for the Virginians. Braddock himself, as well as the publick, knew that the success of his attempt depended chiefly upon his being able to take the field early; but, when he arrived at Virginia, where the contractors with the government had engaged to provide him with provisions, and carriages for his army, he found none in readiness, which seems to have rendered him desperate, and he was at very little pains to conceal his resentment against the provincials. Encamping at Will's Creek he had a hundred and thirty miles to march from thence to fort du Quesne, but the disappointment of his provisions and carriages, both which are very scarce in Virginia, retarded his army for some weeks. At last, the back-settlers of Pensylvania were applied to, and they furnished some provisions, but those so bad, that they could scarcely be made use of, together with fifteen waggons, and a hundred draught horses, instead of a hundred and fifty waggons, and three hundred horses, which the Virginians had contracted for. All that the general, and the officers of the expedition, could do, in this case, was to apply to some private gentlemen of Pensylvania, whose zeal for the service supplied him with what he wanted; though the principles of the Pensylvanians, in general are known not to be very favourable to offensive operations in war. Braddock, being now plentifully supplied with provisions and carriages, on the 12th of June, set out upon his march, and passed the Alleghany mountains at the head of 2200 men, till he came within five days march of fort du Quesne. Here he laboured under two great disadvantages, which he could not remedy; besides many that he could. In the first place, he could receive no certain accounts of the state of the enemy's garrison at du Quesne, or of their forts in the neighbourhood. In the next place, the advanced season of the year had brought out the leaves of the trees, and the other verdure, which concealed the ambushes of the enemy^d. With regard to the other disadvantages he was under, they were owing chiefly to himself. Though he had been furnished by the duke of Cumberland, then commander in chief of the British forces, with a set of instructions so wise and seasonable, that it seemed as if his royal highness had foreseen his conduct, and every step that brought on his fatal catastrophe; yet he treated the Indians with the utmost contempt, without employing them in guarding against what his royal highness principally cautioned him, ambushes and surprizes. He even not only neglected and disobliged the Virginians, but behaved with insupportable haughtiness to his own officers; and the rather, as they urged the necessity of a circumspect march. When he came to the Little Meadows, where Washington had been defeated the year before, about twenty miles beyond fort Cumberland, at Will's Creek he received advice, that the French at fort du Quesne expected a reinforcement of five hundred men. Upon this, he left the greatest part of his waggons, with about eight hundred men, under the command of colonel Dunbar, with orders to follow him as expeditiously as he conveniently could; and with the main body of the army, and twelve pieces of cannon, he encamped the eighth day of July, within ten miles of fort du Quesne. Sir Peter Halket, a brave but prudent officer, took that opportunity of putting the general in mind, that it was not even then too late to employ the few friendly Indians, that remained with them in the camp, in reconnoitring the woods and passages, and marching upon the flanks of the line. Braddock rejected this advice, not without some contemptuous insinuations, as to Halket's caution; and, on the ninth, he continued his march, and fell into an ambuscade of French and Indians in the woods, planted in a manner peculiar to the Canadians and their savages, so as that they could do execution, without being themselves exposed to danger. About noon, a general fire upon the front, and upon the left flank of the English, was the first intimation which the general had of the attack. By this time, he was in the very middle of the defile, where the ambush had been so artfully placed, that not a man of the enemy was to be seen; but where they could take unerring aim from behind trees and in thickets. The van of the English fell back upon their center; and the panic of the whole was proportioned to the suddenness of their danger, so that a general route ensued, and Braddock was left with only his officers, and a few brave men about him, who, in vain, attempted to engage an enemy they could not discern. The officers, who behaved on this trying occasion admirably well, endeavoured to stop or to rally the men; but the general gave no orders for a regular retreat, or for bringing up his cannon to scour the woods and bushes with great shot, which might have dislodged the enemy. Instead of that, he remained on the spot, and ordered the officers and soldiers about him to form in regular platoons against the invisible enemy, whose every shot did execution, especially on the brave officers, who were known by their dresses. The general himself, after having five horses killed under him, was shot through the arm and lungs, and he died on the fourth day after; having been carried off the field, with great affection and courage, by lieutenant colonel Gage, and another of his officers. Sir Peter Halket was killed on the spot, as were two captains and ten or twelve subalterns; and many other brave officers were wounded. In short, the loss of the English was about seven hundred.

Bravery of the Virginians.

It is remarkable, that the Virginians and other provincial troops who were in this action, and whom Braddock, by way of contempt, had placed in the rear, far from being affected with the panic which disordered the regulars, offered to advance against the enemy, till the others could form and bring up the artillery; but the regulars could not be brought again to the charge, where, as they said, they were butchered without seeing their enemy. Notwithstanding this, the provincials actually formed, and behaved so well, that they brought off the remaining regulars; and the retreat of the whole was so unintermitting, that the fugitives never stopt, till they met the rear division, which was advancing under colonel Dunbar. All the artillery, baggage, ammunition, and papers, of the division under the general, fell into the hands of the enemy, even to his own cabinet, with his letters and instructions. Colonel Dunbar, upon whom the chief command of that army then devolved, rendered unserviceable all the artillery that remained with his division; and the French Indians, after sharing the booty, which fell into their hands, returned to Canada. This fatal defeat made no impression upon the friendly English Indians, who, when they heard of it, said, that they expected nothing else from the conduct of general Braddock, who was unacquainted with their manner of fighting.

It was naturally expected that the colonel would have passed the remainder of the summer at Cumberland fort, where he might have fortified his little army, and prevented the excesses of the French Indians, on the western borders of Virginia and Pennsylvania. But it is said he found himself under two disadvantages: the first was, that the panic continued so strong upon the regulars, that they refused to remain in that inhospitable country, which had already proved so fatal to their brethren; and the next was, that they were in danger of perishing for want of provisions, which could be obtained only from Pennsylvania, with great trouble, expence, and danger. He therefore left the sick and wounded at that fort, together with two independent companies of the provincial militia, by way of garrison, and returned with the remainder of the army to Philadelphia, where the general assembly of Pennsylvania had voted 50,000 l. and 3000 men for defending the colony; but both were rendered ineffectual by the disputes that were renewed between the governor and the assembly. Soon after, Mr. Shirley, upon whom by the death of Braddock, the command of the British troops in America devolved, ordered the troops under Dunbar to remove to Albany in New York; and thus Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania were, for the remainder of the year, left entirely exposed to the barbarities of their enemies, who were not wanting in harassing them.

Discord amongst the English in America.

It appeared evidently, from the conduct of the Pennsylvanian assembly, that their members considered no evil so great as that of submitting to their governor, who pretended that, by his instructions, he was disabled from passing the bill for raising the 50,000 l. if the estates of the proprietaries were to be affected by it. Thus each party risked the safety of its country to a foreign enemy, rather than comply in a few immaterial points with the other. The rest of the American colonies observed a conduct somewhat more rational. Upon the defeat of Braddock, they saw the necessity of exerting themselves. The people of New York voted the sum of 40,000 l. for the public service; passed an act against all intercourse or trade between the French and them in America; and the rendezvous of the troops destined for the reduction of Crown Point and Niagara, was appointed to be at Albany, where most of them arrived before the beginning of July. The French all this while, by their scalping parties, filled all the out-settlements of the English in North America with the most horrid murders, but after the rendezvous of the troops at Albany, it was perceived that the artillery and provisions, with the battocs that were to carry them and the men, could not be ready before the eighth of August. As a great deal depended on the success

a success of this expedition, the American governments began to open their eyes to the necessity of postponing all the little differences amongst themselves, that they might pursue the wise plan of union recommended to them from Great Britain. The governments of Boston, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Rhode-Island, and New York, accordingly applied themselves with great spirit; and Sir William Johnson found at lake George, to which he set out from Albany, between 5 and 6000 men, besides Indians, that had been raised by those governments. Every thing then being ready for the grand expedition, Johnson, after advancing about fourteen miles, chose a strong camp, defended on its flanks by swamps, in its rear by lake George, and in its front by a breast-work of trees. In this camp, he was to wait for his battoes, that he might proceed to Ticonderoga, the strong pass, that, when taken, was to open his way to Crown Point, from which it was about fifteen miles distant. He soon received intelligence, that a body of the enemy were on their march to attack fort Edward, at the carrying-place, in which was a garrison of between four and five hundred New Hampshire and New York men. Johnson, having advertised Blanchard, the English commandant of that fort, of his danger, resolved next morning to send out, under colonel Williams, a detachment of 1000 men, and about 200 Indians, which force he thought was sufficient to cope with that of the French at fort Edward. They had scarcely left the camp when Johnson and his men heard a regular firing; the meaning of which was soon explained by the detachment under Williams returning in the utmost confusion, pursued by a regular body of the enemy, under general Dieskau, who seemed to point their march to the very center of the English camp. Had those French immediately attacked the wooden intrenchment, during the consternation of the English, and before they had been able to draw up the heavy cannon for its defence, they probably would have succeeded in their attack, to the entire destruction of the English army. But, halting about a hundred and fifty yards from the breast work, and beginning to fire at too great a distance to do execution, the English plied their great guns and musketry so warmly, that the central body of the French regulars, who were all of them picked men, began to flag in their fire, while the Canadian and Indians, who formed the flanks of their army, fled into the woods, from whence they could not be drawn to support Dieskau's attack.

THAT general varied his dispositions. Finding he could make no impression upon the center of the English, he made two different attacks on the right and left of the camp, and with vast obstinacy he continued those attacks from twelve at noon to four in the afternoon, till his fire became so feeble, that the English and their Indians completed the rout of their enemies, by jumping over the breast work, and, after slaughtering numbers, they took prisoner Dieskau himself, whom they found leaning on a tree, and wounded in his leg and through both his hips. Of the French were killed in this action about eight hundred, but those the flower of their troops. The greatest loss of the English, which in the whole did not amount to above a hundred and eighty men, fell upon the detachment under colonel Williams, who was himself killed, with his major, Ashley, six captains and subalterns. Among the slain on the side of the Indians was old Hendrick, the great Mohawk sachem, who, with his men, fought like a lion, and whose death was afterwards severely revenged on the French. Of the English within the breast-work, few were killed, but among them was colonel Titcombe; and the general and major Nichols were wounded.

THIS action, however important in its consequences, did no great honour to the military abilities of the French general. Dieskau, like Braddock, bred a regular soldier, like him owed his defeat to a ridiculous attachment to camp and field discipline, against an enemy, and in a country, where both were not only useless but prejudicial. When he left Quebec, he had with him about 3000 regulars, great part of whom he had placed in Crown Point, and at other important passes. Had he executed his original plan of seizing fort Edward, the English army must have been greatly distressed, as they could not have advanced farther, and had they retreated great part of them must have been cut off. His leaving his design against fort Edward unexecuted, was owing to his receiving intelligence, that Johnson's camp was destitute of heavy artillery, which indeed was true, the English cannon having arrived but a very short time before the attack was made, and were only mounted that very morning. Obstinacy, misinformation, and a contempt for the English provincials, occasioned his continuing his ineffectual attacks, without heavy artillery, after he saw his enemy so well prepared to receive him. With regard to Johnson, he seems to have been too late in sending out the detachment under Williams, for the relief of fort Edward, and it is amazing that he should hazard such a body, without being informed of his enemy's numbers. But the greatest blame he incurred was his not pursuing the victory he had obtained, which it was generally thought he might have done (R). Next feat.

(R) The apology the general makes for this, in his letter to the governors of the English colonies, is, "Our men, by so much fatigue, are almost worn out; and, as the enemy have considerable reinforcements at hand, we are in daily apprehensions of a more formidable attack, and that they will then come with artillery."

day;

day, a body of the defeated enemy fell upon a detachment of a hundred and twenty of the New Hampshire men, who had been ordered by the general to reinforce his camp, and who were under the command of captain Magennis. That brave officer, perceiving he was to be attacked by numbers far superior to his, made so noble a disposition, and was so well seconded by a lieutenant under him, one Van Schaack, that he defeated and dispersed the enemy with the loss only of two men, eleven wounded, and five missing; but he himself was mortally wounded, and carried, but just alive, to the camp at lake George.

He is rewarded by the king and parliament of Great Britain.

It was with difficulty, that Sir William Johnson, who had more influence over the English Indians, than any British colonist ever was known to have prevented them from putting to death Diskau, and the other French prisoners, in revenge of their sachem Hendrick's death; nor was it the least important consequence of his victory, that it regained to the English the esteem and confidence of their Indians. This, indeed, with the defeat and disappointment of the French, was all that the English colonies acquired by this expensive expedition. The battle being fought on the ninth of September, the proceeding to the attack of Crown Point was thought impracticable; especially as no care had been taken to secure a communication between the army and Albany. Johnson, therefore, leaving a small detachment to garrison a stockaded fort, at the hither end of lake George, carried back his troops to their respective homes. But, whatever mistakes he might have been guilty of during this campaign, it is certain that his services were much considered in England, where the sound of victory had not for a long time been heard, that he was created a baronet, and received from the parliament a gratuity of 5000 l. But we are now to attend general Shirley's operations against Niagara (S).

Shirley's march towards Oswego.

So important a command being conferred on a man said to have been bred a lawyer, who had never exhibited any striking instances of abilities, either in the field or the cabinet, and who had no visible qualification to recommend him, but some knowledge of the country, in which he might be equalled, if not excelled, by every common ranger, created much speculation, and damped the spirit of the service at its outset; and the public apprehensions were but too well confirmed by the event. Like all other expeditions in North America, the success of that against Niagara depended chiefly on the troops taking the field early. We have already mentioned the great importance of Oswego, which had been projected by Mr. Burnet, governor of New York, but no care had been taken to fortify it suitably. Shirley's march to Niagara lay by Oswego. In the preceding year, some measures had been suggested for strengthening that post by augmenting its garrison, and by building vessels on lake Ontario, so as to intercept all communication between Niagara and the other French forts on the south of that lake, and fort Frontenac or Catarocouy, on the north. A number of these vessels, carrying six pounders and swivels, were accordingly constructed, and greatly distressed the French trade on the lake. About the same time, captain Bradstreet carried two companies of a hundred men each to Oswego, to reinforce that garrison, which had lately been augmented from the pitiful number of twenty-five to a hundred men. The long and dangerous march between Albany and Oswego increased the necessity of the troops setting early out for New York; which they did not till the best time for action was over. It was the beginning of June, before colonel Schuyler's New Jersey regiment took the field, and while Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments, with the Indians, the whole amounting to about 2500 men, were ready to follow them, the dismal news of Braddock's defeat arriving at Albany, dispirited the troops so greatly, that they deserted in great numbers; so that when Shirley arrived at Oswego, he scarcely had the face of an army fit to go on so important an expedition, and, at the same time to secure the British settlements in those parts. Many of the battoe-men, in particular, refusing to proceed, conveniences could not be had, even for carrying the necessary provisions for the troops; and the Indians, on whom the general had laid great stress, were so far from joining him, that they absolutely declared against his expedition, as tending to disturb their peace and commerce. It was the 17th or 18th of August, before Shirley himself arrived at Oswego, and the last day of the same month before his troops and artillery came up.

(S) It may be necessary here to remind our readers of the situation and uses of the three great French forts in North America, which we shall do from a Journal of that War, published in 1755. "Niagara, Du Quesne, and Crown Point, are three forts built by the French, in consequence of their scheme to possess all the passes of the back countries, and secure them by strong garrisons, to restrain us from penetrating farther into the continent, than the part we possess, and, at length, to exclude us from all commerce with the Indians, and engross the fur trade to themselves. Crown Point was built about the year 1730, by the Canadians, though it is in the province of New York, and little more than a hundred miles from Albany. From this advanced garrison, they can easily annoy all the upper parts of New York and New England, and prevent the settlement of any lands, north of Hudson's and Connecticut rivers. Fort du Quesne was built about three years ago, and is an encroachment upon Pennsylvania; which enables the French to harass that, as well as the neighbouring provinces of Maryland and Virginia. Niagara is at the strait between the lakes Erie and Ontario, and secures the great communication between Canada and Louisiana. It is in the country of the Senegas, the most powerful of the Five Nations, and was built since the year 1721.

- a It was easily foreseen, that nothing for that year could be done against Niagara, notwithstanding the excellent conveniencies of the vessels that had been built upon the lake. The season was not only too far advanced; but though the general waited till the 26th of September, when he received a supply of provisions, it was so small that it was scarcely sufficient to subsist the six hundred men he intended to carry with him against Niagara, and to support the troops he was to leave at Oswego for twelve days; so that, if even the rainy season had not set in as it did, the expedition must have been impracticable. A council of war being called, it was unanimously resolved to defer the expedition against Niagara to the succeeding year; to leave colonel Mercer at Oswego, with a garrison of six hundred men, and to build two additional forts for the safety of that place, and the entrance of the harbour; and that the general himself should return with the rest of the army to Albany, for which he accordingly set out on the 24th of October. Thus an expedition, of which it is hard to say, whether it was planned or executed with less judgment. Nothing had happened during the course of it that might not have reasonably been foreseen, and the general returned to Albany at the very time his presence was most wanted at Oswego. The defeat of Braddock, and the taking his papers had informed the French of all the intended operations, on the part of the English, during the campaign, and Shirley had undoubted intelligence, that they had 1000 regulars at fort Frontenac, who were designed for the attack of Oswego, where the two forts had only been marked out, when he abandoned it. In the mean while the dreadful cruelties and plunderings of the French and their Indians upon the English back-
- b settlements were so numerous, that though they fell upon particular persons, they became a general concern. Upon the whole, it was evident, from the little effect, which so great a force as that employed by the English in America had this year against an enemy, which, compared to them were despicable, that certain private discontents lurked in the minds of the chief provincials. Whatever they might pretend, they knew well that Braddock had a commission to act as commander in chief of all the British troops on that continent, and that they were only to be subordinate to him. Shirley was both disliked and despised in his military capacity; and Johnson's army, which, after the defeat of the French, amounted to 6000 men, was obliged to be disbanded for the winter, for want of provisions and for other domestic reasons.
- c THE British ministry were fully sensible that mistakes and mismanagements had been committed in the service, but they were tender and cautious of enquiring into them, and far more of punishing them; as not only the rigour of the military law was new in America, but it would have been highly impolitic, to have exasperated those colonists by any unnecessary acts of severity. A resolution was therefore formed to throw the weight of the American war upon the mother-country chiefly; and that a regiment of foot should be raised in North America, consisting of four battalions of 1000 men each, besides six regiments of foot, who were to sail from Ireland to serve in North America and the East-Indies. Mr. Fox, who was then minister, at the same time presented to the house a message from his majesty, desiring it to take into consideration the faithful services of the New Englandmen, and his subjects in some other parts of North America. The 4000 men of the American regiment were composed mostly of Germans and Swiss, who had been settled on the borders of the British colonies; and an act of parliament passed, enabling his majesty to grant commissions to a certain number of foreign protestants, who served abroad as officers, or engineers, to act and rank as officers or engineers, in America only. In the month of January, De Rouille, the French minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, addressed a letter to Mr. Fox, bitterly complaining of the hostilities that had been committed by Braddock and Boscawen, and the captures that had been made of the French ships before any declaration of war, with many other matters. But a very proper, because a very spirited, answer, justifying all that had been done, was returned to those complaints; and hostilities continued to be multiplied between the two nations. General Shirley was dismissed from his military command, in which he was succeeded by general Abercrombie, who, in March this year, carried over with him two regiments to North America, while the command in chief over all the American forces was conferred on the earl of Loudon. Besides this command, his lordship was made governor of Virginia, and colonel of the royal American regiment, consisting of the 4000 men, that were to be disciplined by foreign, and other, officers of experience, besides being vested with other extraordinary powers; and his lordship embarked the latter end of May, for his important command.

A resolution was therefore formed to throw the weight of the American war upon the mother-country chiefly; and that a regiment of foot should be raised in North America, consisting of four battalions of 1000 men each, besides six regiments of foot, who were to sail from Ireland to serve in North America and the East-Indies. Mr. Fox, who was then minister, at the same time presented to the house a message from his majesty, desiring it to take into consideration the faithful services of the New Englandmen, and his subjects in some other parts of North America. The 4000 men of the American regiment were composed mostly of Germans and Swiss, who had been settled on the borders of the British colonies; and an act of parliament passed, enabling his majesty to grant commissions to a certain number of foreign protestants, who served abroad as officers, or engineers, to act and rank as officers or engineers, in America only. In the month of January, De Rouille, the French minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, addressed a letter to Mr. Fox, bitterly complaining of the hostilities that had been committed by Braddock and Boscawen, and the captures that had been made of the French ships before any declaration of war, with many other matters. But a very proper, because a very spirited, answer, justifying all that had been done, was returned to those complaints; and hostilities continued to be multiplied between the two nations. General Shirley was dismissed from his military command, in which he was succeeded by general Abercrombie, who, in March this year, carried over with him two regiments to North America, while the command in chief over all the American forces was conferred on the earl of Loudon. Besides this command, his lordship was made governor of Virginia, and colonel of the royal American regiment, consisting of the 4000 men, that were to be disciplined by foreign, and other, officers of experience, besides being vested with other extraordinary powers; and his lordship embarked the latter end of May, for his important command.
- e By this time, the English subjects all over North America, seeing their mother country was determined to support them in earnest, but sensible that they must lend their own vigorous assistance, made extraordinary efforts to bring a formidable force to the field. When general Abercrombie on the fifth of June, arrived at Albany, he took upon him the command of the troops there, consisting of the two regiments, which had served under Braddock, two battalions raised in America, the two regiments he brought along with him, four New

Who send general Abercrombie and lord Loudon to America,

York independent companies, the New Jersey regiment, four North Carolina companies, and a body of New England provincials. As to the settlements towards the southward, containing Pensylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, they had suffered, and were daily suffering, so much from the French plunderings and massacres, that it was with the utmost difficulty they could defend themselves. The plan for the campaign was to reduce fort Niagara, as being the most effectual means for disabling the French from maintaining their forts upon the Ohio, or keeping up their communication between Louisiana and Canada. Ticonderoga and Crown Point were likewise to be reduced for the security of New York. All the convenient passes upon lake Champlain were to be seized by the English; fort du Quesne was to have been besieged, and Quebec itself to have been alarmed by a body of troops detached up the river Kennebeck. This plan of operations was promising, and not at all impracticable even by the British troops, who were in readiness; but it seemed as if the commander in chief had no instructions to enter upon any decisive measures, till the arrival of lord Loudon, which proved too late in the year for their being executed; for he did not embark with the troops under his command from England, till the time abovementioned, occasioned, as was said, by the unsettled state of the British ministry. Add to this, that the provincial officers were so much divided in their opinions, that his authority was necessary for bringing the troops into the field; and thus another year was lost, under the most enormous expence that the public of Great Britain had ever been put to in that or almost any other part of the world.

Oswego taken by the French.

THE French and their Indians took care to improve this procrastination to their own barbarous purposes. They cut off, to a man, twenty-five English, who garrisoned a post amidst their own Indians. They watched the return of a convoy, which had carried provisions and stores to Oswego, and was commanded by colonel Bradstreet. This gentleman, more than suspecting their intention, made a proper disposition of his battoes, on his return by the river Onondago; and after receiving the enemy's fire from the north shore, he ordered his men to land on the south, and he there took possession of a small island. Here he was attacked by a body of the enemy, which he repelled; and, after that, by two separate bodies, who had passed the river higher up, whom he likewise defeated; and, receiving afterwards a reinforcement under captain Patten, who was on his march to Oswego, and another of two hundred men from that garrison, he probably would have destroyed the whole French detachment, consisting of seven hundred men, had not the swelling of the rivers hindered him from pursuing them. Patten then proceeded to Oswego, as Bradstreet did to Albany, where he informed general Abercrombie, that the French had assembled a considerable force on the east side of lake Ontario, with a numerous artillery to besiege Oswego; the garrison of which, by this time, had been reinforced to the number of about 1400 men, besides workmen and sailors. Upon Bradstreet's information, major-general Webb was ordered to march with a regiment to the relief of Oswego; but, before it could be put in motion the earl of Loudon arrived at Albany, on the 29th of July. His presence did not at all contribute to the unanimity of the provincials; for, notwithstanding the imminent danger of Oswego, the province of New York, and the northern governments, insisted upon the reduction of Crown Point, as being most dangerous for their country, and that some regiments of regulars should join general Winslow, who was marching with 7000 provincials, in attempting that conquest, while the remainder of the army were to remain at Albany to cover New York.

In the mean while, the marquis de Vaudreuil had been appointed to the government of New France, and the marquis de Montcalm, who succeeded Dieskau in the command of the troops, acted under Vaudreuil as major-general. Montcalm, who had the truest military genius of any officer the French had ever employed in North America, arrived the 29th of July at Frontenac, where, under the pretence of providing for the safety of that fort, and that of Niagara, Vaudreuil had assembled 3000 men, amongst whom were the battalions of Sarre, Guyenne, and Bearn, amounting to 1300 regulars, besides a body who had been sent by Vaudreuil to the bay of Niaoure, where their general rendezvous was appointed. Montcalm, having made admirable dispositions against any surprize, and for securing his retreat, if he had been defeated, embarked on the fourth of August on lake Ontario for the bay of Niaoure, where being joined by all his armament, he advanced partly by land, and partly by water, till he came within half a league of Oswego, or rather one of the new erected forts there, called by the French, Fort Chouguen, but by the English, Oswego New Fort, the other new erected one being called Fort Ontario. It was the 13th of August, before the ground was opened before the latter; but the garrison, finding it untenable, about six in the evening, having fired away all their shells and ammunition, and spiked up their cannon, evacuated the fort, and crossed the river to Little Oswego Fort. In the mean while, two armed barks, one of twelve and the other of sixteen guns, blocked up Oswego on this side of the lake, by Montcalm's orders, and a chain of posts had been formed a formed on the road to Albany to prevent the garrison from sending to, or receiving any intelligence from thence ; and his vessels were secured by a battery on the land.

The loss of fort Ontario proved irreparable to the English. Colonel Mercer did all that possibly could be done to render the seven little vessels, which lay at the mouth of the Otseguen, serviceable to his garrison ; but the dispositions made by Montcalm frustrated all his endeavours. It is, however, highly probable, that, had he not been killed, he would have baffled the besiegers, notwithstanding all the disadvantages he was under, either by a bold sally, or by burning the enemy's ships ; but, on the 13th, they having entirely invested the fort, he was killed by a cannon-ball ; and then the garrison, being left without a commander of equal authority and abilities, surrendered prisoners of war, on condition

b of their being exempted from plunder, carried to Montreal, and treated with humanity. It is to the eternal stain of Montcalm's, and the French, name, that those articles, though agreed to by himself, were violated. Under the shameful pretence, that he could not restrain the impetuosity of his Indians, they were suffered not only to rob, but to murder, several of the British officers and soldiers, after they had given up their arms, and most inhumanly scalped all the sick and wounded, who were in the British hospital. Montcalm himself, on this occasion, equalled, if not exceeded, the barbarity of his own savages ; for he put into their hands twenty English prisoners, who, probably were put to the most excruciating deaths, a custom amongst the savages that he could be no stranger to, in revenge of twenty of the barbarians, who had been killed during the siege. In the forts, c which were demolished, were found an hundred and seven pieces of cannon, and fourteen mortars, the rest of the artillery consisting of pateraroes and cohorns ; as also 1800 muskets, 25,000 lb of gunpowder, and a great quantity of provisions. The prisoners were carried to Montreal, according to the capitulation.

The reduction of Oswego very undeservedly raised the reputation of Montcalm and the French arms. The several forts of which it consisted were miserably situated, built of the very worst wooden materials, and open above ; nor did any of the officers of the garrison, after colonel Mercer's death, appear to have had much experience in military affairs. General Webb, by this time, had arrived with the regiment he commanded, for the relief of Oswego, at the carrying-place between the Mohawk's river and Wood's Creek, when he d heard of the fate of that place. Being apprehensive of an attack from the conquering army, he felled trees, and took other precautions for rendering the creek impassable ; and thus he secured his retreat. But the loss of Oswego was soon felt in the most sensible manner, by a renewal of the most shocking barbarities, which the French and their Indians now committed, almost unopposed, upon the English settlers. As to the earl of Loudon, the advanced season tied up his hands from acting, and all he could do was to promote the scheme of union among the British colonies, by endeavouring to conciliate all their differences, both public and private, and to pursue the proper measures for securing their frontiers from farther insults. For this purpose, to ease the inhabitants as much as possible, convenient barracks were built at Albany, and strong garrisons were thrown into the e forts Edward and William Henry. Notwithstanding this, fort Granville, on the confines of Pensylvania, was surprized, plundered, and burnt, by the enemy, who drove into captivity the small garrison, with the women and children it contained. To obviate, as much as possible, the like misfortunes for the future, the governor of Pensylvania concluded a treaty of peace with the Delaware Indians, who inhabit the banks of the river Susquehanna ; as the governor of Virginia did another with the Cherokees and the Catawbias, two powerful Indian tribes in their neighbourhood, who could bring 3000 men into the field. So much were the people of England intent upon the American affairs at this time, that the house of commons resolved, that the contract entered into, on the 26th day of March, in the year 1756, by the commissioners of the treasury, with William Baker, Christopher Kilby, and f Richard Baker, of London, merchants, for furnishing provisions to the forces under the command of the earl of Loudon, was prudent and necessary, and properly adapted to the securing a constant and effectual supply for those forces in America.

Lord Loudon's disappointments.

It might have reasonably been supposed, that the effects would have been in some measure proportioned to preparations so generously made, and so well supported ; but, in this, the public of England was disappointed. Lord Loudon, who was now in America, could not effect that necessary unanimity amongst the British governors and provinces that was requisite for proceeding against the common enemy with decisive success. The French, after their taking Oswego became masters of the lakes of North America, by which the Iroquois, or as they are called the Five Nations, who were now extremely well disposed g towards the English, was cut off from all communication with them. Four hundred Cherokee Indians, indeed, joined the English at fort Cumberland, and a fort was built at Winchester, called fort Loudon ; but all the British settlements along the Mohawk's river and the German Flats were exposed to the French and their Indians, who destroyed them with unrelenting fury.

In the mean while, admiral Holbourn arrived at Hallifax, with a strong reinforcement of men and ships; by which lord Loudon was put at the head of 12000 men, the greatest European army that had ever appeared in America. But M. de Bois de la Mothe, about the same time, arrived at the harbour of Louisbourg, with a squadron superior to that of the English, which rendered it imprudent to attack that place, though it was now the object of all the British operations in America, preferably to Crown Point itself. But we are to confine ourselves to the history of Canada.

Operations in America,

MONTCALM, the French general there, failed in three attacks he made upon fort William Henry. Colonel Parker, in attempting, with about four hundred men who went by water, to dislodge a French advanced-guard at Ticonderoga, was outwitted by the French and Indians, at that place, and the whole of his detachment, two officers and seventy private men excepted, was cut off. Montcalm then flushed with his new success, prepared a-fresh for the siege of fort William Henry, which is situated on the southern coast of lake George, so as to command that lake, and to protect the English colonies. The fort was garrisoned by near 3000 men, and general Webb lay near it with an army of above 4000. The general of Canada, having received great reinforcements from Old France, assembled from Crown Point, Ticonderoga, and other French posts, about 10,000 men, and invested the fort, which he summoned to surrender, as he pretended, out of humanity, it being, as he said, yet in his power to restrain the cruelties of his Indians. The garrison of the fort, depending on being relieved by Webb, made a gallant defence; but, being disappointed were obliged on the 6th of August, the sixth day of the siege, to capitulate*. The terms were, that the garrison of fort William Henry and the troops in the retrenched camp, should march out with their arms, the baggage of the officers and soldiers, and all the usual necessities of war; escorted by a detachment of French troops, or interpreters attached to the savages. It was agreed, that the gate of the fort should be delivered to the troops of the most Christian king, immediately after signing the capitulation; and the retrenched camp, on the departure of the British forces. that the artillery, warlike stores, provision, and, in general, every thing, except the effects of the soldiers and officers, should, upon honour, be delivered to the French troops; for which purpose, it was agreed there should be delivered, with the capitulation, an exact inventory of the stores, and other particulars specified: that the garrison of the fort, the troops of the retrenchment, and dependencies, should not serve for the space of eighteen months, from the date of the capitulation, against his most Christian majesty, or his allies: that, with the capitulation, there should be delivered an exact state of the troops, specifying the names of the officers, engineers, artilleryists, commissaries, and all employed: that four officers and soldiers, Canadians, women and savages, made prisoners by land, since the commencement of the war in North America, be delivered in the space of three months at Carillon; in return for which, an equal number of the garrison of fort William should be capacitated to serve, agreeable to the return given by the English officer, and the receipt of the French commanding officers, of the prisoners so delivered: that an officer remain as an hostage, till the safe return of the escorte sent with the troops of his Britannic majesty: that the sick and wounded, not in a condition to be transported to fort Edward should remain under the protection of the marquis de Montcalm, who engaged to use them with tenderness and humanity, and to return them as soon as recovered: that provision for two days should be issued out for the British troops: that, in testimony of his esteem and respect for colonel Munro, and his garrison, on account of their gallant defence, the marquis de Montcalm should return one cannon, a six pounder.

and disgraceful campaign
there.

It is a poor apology on the part of the French, for them to pretend, that it was not in the power of Montcalm to enforce the observance of this capitulation, on account of the unruliness of his Indians. Every one who has read the preceding pages, must be sensible that a French general, especially at the head of an army, is, if possible, more than master of his America Indians. Those under Montcalm were permitted, if not commissioned, to break every article of the capitulation, and to commit cruelties, that a barbarian, nay a Frenchman, ought to blush at hearing repeated. They robbed the British troops, as they marched out, they tomohawked and scalped the British Indians, they ripped up the bellies of women, and committed inhumanities, which one who has a human feeling can scarcely credit. The fort was demolished, every thing within it was seized, together with the effects, provision and artillery, and, what is of more importance than all, the vessels that had been constructed upon the lake. It had been observed, that, during this disgraceful campaign, we had no fewer than 20,000 troops on foot upon the continent of America; with twenty ships of the line in those seas: a force doubly superior to what had been ever known in that part of the world.

ADMIRAL Holbourn having discharged his transports, set sail for Louisbourg, after the earl of Loudon had departed from Hallifax. The meaning of this movement will perhaps ever a remain a secret. That he did not intend to attempt to take the place is certain, and it seems to be equally certain that his design was not to fight the French admiral in that harbour; for, upon the latter making dispositions to engage him, he returned to Hallifax. Being reinforced about the middle of September with four ships of the line, he again set sail for Louisbourg with the unmeaning intention, to all appearance, of blocking up that harbour; a measure that seldom or never has been found effectual, though often attempted. A storm, which it was not unreasonable to foresee, dispersed his squadron. The Tilbury was lost; eleven of his ships were dismasted, many of them threw over their guns, and all of them returned to England in a shattered condition: and thus ended by sea and land a campaign so weak and ridiculous that it ought to be blotted out of the British annals.

b In the year 1758, some dissatisfaction with regard to the conduct of the war in America, arising in England, lord Loudon returned home, and the command there, then devolved upon general Abercrombie. The British force in North America about this time amounted to the incredible number of about 50,000 men; of whom 22,000 were regular troops. Twelve thousand were appointed to the siege of Louisbourg, 16,000 under the general himself, were to attack Crown Point, and general Forbes, an officer, who had been bred up under general Campbell, who lost his life at Fontenoy, was appointed to reduce fort du Quesne on the Ohio. The reduction of Louisbourg, the particulars of which fall under another head of this work, was happily effected, and the island of St. John, in the gulph of St. Lawrence, a post of the utmost importance to the French and their treacherous neutrals, was reduced. Nothing now remained but to lay open the French empire in America to the British arms, and this was the intention of general Abercrombie's expedition against Crown Point, and the French forts on the lakes George and Champlain. In July this year that general, with near 7000 regulars, and 10,000 provincials, a force more than sufficient to have conquered both the French and the Spanish America, embarked on lake George on board of nine hundred battoes, and one hundred and thirty-five whale boats, with cannon mounted on rafts, and all the provisions and accommodations that could render an enterprize of so much expectation successful. The general's first operation was against Ticonderoga, a fort situated on an isthmus between lake George, and a gut communicating d with lake Champlain, and serving as the key to Crown Point, having on its front a morass, and the other three sides being surrounded by water. Nothing could be more happy than the embarkation and debarkation of the troops, which were formed into three columns, and drove a battalion of the enemy from an advanced post. The march of the British army then lay through a thick wood, where lord Howe, whose memory will ever be dear to the British soldiery, lost his life. The tracts of the wood were unknown; the general ordered the troops back to the landing-place, that they might refresh themselves. In the skirmish where lord Howe fell, about one hundred and forty-eight of the French were taken, and a considerable number were killed, and lieutenant colonel Bradstreet, by the general's order, took possession of a saw-mill, which was to facilitate the operations against Ticonderoga with e a regiment of regulars, six companies of the royal Americans, the battoe-men, and a body of rangers. Abercrombie then advanced once more towards Ticonderoga, which was defended by eight battalions of regulars, besides a body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in the whole to about 6000 men. They depended for their defence upon an entrenchment before the fort, and hourly expected to be joined by 3000 men under M. de Levi, a French general officer of some reputation. Abercrombie had intelligence of this, and not improperly, resolved to attack the enemy before this powerful reinforcement came up. Those parts of the morass, which were the most accessible, were defended by a strong line above eight feet high, on which cannon were mounted; and before that line, for about one hundred yards, trees were felled with their branches outward, which rendered f the approaches still more difficult. The general's engineer, however, after reconnoitring the enemy's entrenchments, gave his opinion that they were assailable, the works being yet unfinished, and to the amazement of all Europe (when the account came to be published by authority) a resolution was taken to attempt this formidable entrenchment without cannon, and with musquetry alone. None but British troops would have obeyed so unaccountable an order. They did it with useless, but unusual intrepidity, which was fatal only to themselves. Near 2000 of them, with a large proportion of officers were butchered, and the Highland regiment, commanded by lord John Murray, had half of its men, and twenty-five of its officers, either killed or desperately wounded. This attack, where no prospect of success could possibly present itself, was followed by a retreat as pusillanimous as the other was presumptuous. The general reembarked the troops, and though not an incident had happened that might not have been easily foreseen, or rationally expected, on the 9th of June he returned to his former camp at lake George.

Unsuccessful
attack upon Ticonderoga.

Fort Frontenac reduced.

THE reader without any suggestion of ours will be apt enough of himself to make reflexions upon this attempt so deservedly unsuccessful; but the war was not equally unfortunate in every quarter of North America. General Amherst having reduced Louisbourg, where he left a garrison, marched towards Albany about the middle of September, with six regiments, that he might support and reinforce general Abercrombie, who had detached about 3000 men under colonel Bradstreet (most of them provincials) to the important service of reducing fort Cataracouy or fort Frontenac. Incredible were the difficulties which Bradstreet surmounted in this expedition, before he arrived at lake Ontario, where he embarked his men in sloops and battoes. The reputation of the British troops was then so low amongst the French, that in that important fort they had only a garrison of one hundred and ten men, with some Indians, and it surrendered at discretion, the first happy omen of a reversal of success in favour of the British arms! In the fort, which of itself was but poorly constructed, were found sixty pieces of cannon, sixteen small mortars, but a vast quantity of provisions and merchandizes, it being the magazine for all their western garrisons and Indian allies, nine vessels, some of which carried eighteen guns, and had been, in imitation of the English, constructed on the lake Ontario, fell likewise into Bradstreet's hands, and he destroyed the fort, with all the artillery, stores, provisions, and ammunition, which he could not carry off; after which he went to Oswego. The reader in the preceding part of this history must be sensible of the vast importance of fort Frontenac to the province of Canada, both as a storehouse for trading with the Indians, and a place of strength for keeping them in awe. It is not perhaps easy to find a reason, now that the conquest of Quebec was to be attempted, why the same fort might not have been equally useful and advantageous to the British interest. It undoubtedly must have made us masters of lake Ontario; and the keeping possession of it must have distressed the French and their allies towards the west and north beyond all possibility of relief.

As is fort du Quesne.

IN the beginning of July, brigadier Forbes set out on his expedition from Philadelphia for fort du Quesne. He was to march through countries that never had been impressed by human vestige, and he had difficulties to surmount, greater perhaps than those of Alexander in his expedition to India, by establishing magazines, forming and securing camps, procuring carriages, and encountering a thousand unforeseen obstacles in penetrating through regions that presented nothing but scalping parties of French and savages, mountains, woods, and morasses. The enemy and their Indians were industrious in pestering his march with their detached parties; but he penetrated to Ray's town, which lies within ninety miles (accounted a small distance in those immense regions) of fort du Quesne. Here he detached about 2000 men under the command of colonel Bouquet to a place called Lyal Henning, fifty miles farther on; and from thence the colonel sent major Grant with eight hundred men to reconnoitre the fort and its neighbourhood. The major, perhaps, pushed his detachment farther than prudence would have dictated. He was surrounded by the enemy; but notwithstanding the vast superiority of their numbers, he made a brave defence, till losing three hundred of his party, he himself, and nineteen other officers, were taken prisoners, and carried to the fort. Unadvised as the major's forwardness seems to have been, it had a good effect by giving the enemy such a specimen of British courage, that general Forbes took possession of the fort, which he dismantled, without resistance, and they fled to their other settlements upon the Ohio. The general here found the natives amicably disposed towards Great Britain. He concluded treaties with them. He left a garrison of provincials in the fort. He built a block-house near Lyal Henning; but his constitution being delicate, and himself worn out with fatigue, he died before his return to Pennsylvania.

Sir William Johnson makes a treaty with the Indians.

HITHERTO the progress which the British arms had made in North America, was rather solid than splendid; for they had dismantled Canada of its out guards, and laid it open to an attempt so bold, that a few years before it would have been thought romantic, even to mention it, we mean the conquest of Quebec. Previous to this, in October 1758, when the British arms began to recover their lustre, the governors of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, assisted by Sir William Johnson, who was the soul of all our transactions with the savages, held an assembly at Easton, about ninety miles from Philadelphia, where a formal treaty was entered into between Great Britain and the Indians of that vast tract of country lying between the Apalachian mountains and the lakes. The contractors on the side of Great Britain in this treaty, besides Sir William Johnson, who officiated in the character of agent for Indian affairs, and the two governors, were four members of the council of Pennsylvania, six of the assembly, two agents for new Jersey, with a number of quaker inhabitants of Philadelphia. The subject of the conferences was, what we have often seen in the course of this history, complaints of encroachments by the English, and differences amongst the savages themselves about their limits. The names of the Indians, who assisted at the treaty, were the Mohawks, Oneidocs, Onondagoes, Cayuges, Senecas, Tuscarcras, Nanticoques, and Conoys, the the Tuteloos, Chugnuts, Delawares, and Unamies, the Minisinks, Mohicans, and Wappingers; so that the number of the deputies who attended, including their women and children, amounted to above five hundred. The chief on the part of the savages was Teedyuscung; for tho' every nation has its deputies, yet all of them commonly manifest a particular deference to one or two leaders. The several transactions of this meeting are not material. The precision with which those savages treated was wonderful; for they required satisfaction, and made mention of every life their countrymen lost, and the smallest damage they sustained; and the British plenipotentiaries had prudence enough to accommodate themselves to the redress of all their grievances; so that they departed seemingly with a hearty detestation of the French. It was remarked, however, that the Miamis, or, as they are called, the Ewightees, did not send their deputies to this assembly; but measures were taken for keeping them in peace.

This treaty with the savages put the finishing hand to all the preliminary measures for the campaign. The sagacity of the English ministry naturally suggested to them, that tho' Canada or New France was but thinly inhabited, yet all its force, if collected into one point, might baffle the most vigorous effort that Great Britain could make, as it was impossible for her to find ships, magazines, and conveyances for the whole of her troops, so as to employ them in one direction, in such a country as North America. It was, therefore, resolved to divide the operations of the campaign into three different directions. One under general Wolfe, who, with 8000 men, was to undertake the siege of Quebec. The second under general Amherst, who was then the British commander in chief in North America, and who with 12,000 men, after reducing Ticonderoga and Crown Point, was to cross lake Champlain, and, by the way of Richelieu river, to proceed towards the banks of that of St. Lawrence, and to assist Wolfe in the siege of Quebec. The third direction was under brigadier Prideaux, who, assisted by the great interest and abilities of Sir William Johnson, was to reduce the important fort near the cataract of Niagara, which gave law to the internal parts of North America. The same troops, after the reduction of Niagara, were to operate occasionally by embarking on lake Ontario, and reducing Montreal, or joining general Amherst's army. Besides those three grand directions, colonel Stanwix was at the head of a scouring detachment for seizing all the forts and posts upon the lake Ontario. Let us now turn our eyes towards the dispositions of the French force.

VAUDREUIL, then governor-general of Canada, with a body of about 5000 men lay at Montreal, and in its neighbourhood. Montcalm, whose reputation was very high in the military world, commanded a body of 10,000 regulars, and disciplined militia, who were better than regulars, besides a number of Indians between Montreal and Quebec. De Levi was at the head of a flying detachment, much better acquainted, than the British troops possibly could be, with that dubious country. The garrison of Niagara consisted of six hundred men; the city of Quebec had received every additional fortification that the art of war could give it; scarcely any British sailor could pretend to be acquainted with the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, which the French had industriously kept a secret, pretending it to be extremely difficult and dangerous. The strong fort of Chambly, near the fall of the river Richelieu, was in the possession of the enemy, as consequently was the pass of the river St. Lawrence, which the British troops were likewise to surmount; not to mention Crown Point and Ticonderoga, lately so fatal to the British arms.

The forces under general Amherst were first in motion, notwithstanding all the impediments that were thrown in his way, by the innate haughtiness of the provincials, and their aversion to regular troops. The season was far advanced before he passed lake George and approached Ticonderoga, which, in the night of the 7th of July 1759, the French abandoned, thereby proving that their strength chiefly consisted in our fears and misconduct. Amherst strongly garrisoned and fortified this important place, by which he secured his retreat, and covered the frontiers of New York. Here fell the brave colonel Townshend, whose elder brother was third in command under general Wolfe, as he was reconnoitring. Every day gave fresh proof of our former misconduct. Amherst's manner of proceeding was firm and cautious, but determined, and he took care to leave as little as possible to fortune. This conduct deprived the enemy of all hopes of defending themselves; so that it now seemed as if they were resolved to risk their American empire upon the stand they were to make at Quebec. On the 1st of August, the British general had intelligence, by one of his scouting parties, of the French having abandoned Crown Point in the same manner as they had done Ticonderoga. He did not fail to improve this incident; for, three days after, his troops were encamped in the neighbourhood of the fort, and he laid the foundations of a new and a stronger one for bridling the cruelties of the natives.

Operations of general Amherst.

The French, after evacuating those two forts, retired to the isle Aux Noix, at the other end of lake Champlain, to the number of 3500 men, under the command of M. de Burlemaque, and provided with a strong train of artillery. Four of their vessels mounted with cannon,

cannon, and manned with the piquets of their regiments, were in possession of the lake ^a under the command of M. le Bras, and M. de Rigal, two sea officers, which rendered it necessary for Mr. Amberst, if possible, to have the command of the lake. He had directed captain Loring to build a sloop of sixteen guns, and a radeau eighty-four feet in length, capable of carrying six large cannon, together with a brigantine. But it was the 11th of October before they were finished, and then Loring sailed with them down the lake, where he drove three French ships into a bay, where two of them were sunk, and the crew of the third ran it aground; but it was taken and repaired by Loring. In the mean while the general embarked the troops in battoes; but by stress of weather was obliged to shelter them in a bay on the western shore. He reembarked them again; but from the same cause he was forced to desist from proceeding, and through the ^b lateness of the season to finish the operations of his campaign. Few commanders ever were in the situation in which he now found himself. Though successful beyond all expectation, he did not know, but he and his troops might fall victims through the ill success of the other divisions, of whom he had little or no intelligence, excepting a few discouraging hints of Wolfe's having landed in the neighbourhood of Quebec. It was the 21st of October, before he returned from his tempestuous expedition to Crown Point, where he applied himself to improve his superiority on the lake, and the fortifications of the place; so that at last he was enabled to open a communication between Ticonderoga and Massachusetts.

Sir William Johnson defeats the French.

PRIDEAUX and Sir William Johnson were all this while proceeding against fort Niagara; ^c but on the 20th of July, Prideaux, to the inexpressible grief of the army, was killed in the trenches by the bursting of a cohorn. The command then fell upon Sir William Johnson, who was superseded by brigadier-general Gage, by the appointment of Amberst, who always had kept up a correspondence with that division. Before Gage could arrive at Niagara, Johnson performed wonders. He had carried his approaches within one hundred yards of the covered-way of the fort; and the French were so apprehensive of losing that palladium of their interest in North America, that they exerted their utmost to maintain it, by collecting 1700 men from all the neighbouring posts, particularly from Detroit, Venango, and Presque Isle, under the command of Mons. D'Aubry. Had this reinforcement reached the fort it must have been impregnable; but Johnson made dispositions towards his left, on ^d the road leading from Niagara falls to the fortress, for intercepting them. His light infantry and piquets over-night were placed there, and in the morning reinforced with the grenadiers, and part of the forty-sixth regiment commanded by lieutenant-colonel Masse, while lieutenant-colonel Farquar, with another regiment, was posted so as to support the guard of the trenches. About eight o'clock on the 24th of July the enemy appeared, and the English Indians attempted, in vain, to have some talk with their countrymen, who served under the French. The battle began with a horrible war-whoop, which was now matter of ridicule, rather than terror to the English, uttered by the French Indians. The French, as usual, charged with vast impetuosity; but being received with equal firmness, and the English Indians on the flanks doing considerable execution, all the French army ^e were put to the rout, and, for five miles, the pursuit continued, in which seventeen officers, amongst whom were the first and second in command, were made prisoners.

^f NEXT morning Sir William Johnson sent a trumpet to the French commandant, with a list of the seventeen officers that had been taken, to convince him of the inutility of farther resistance. The commandant found all Sir William Johnson's intelligence to be perfectly true, and in a few hours a capitulation was signed, by which six hundred and seven men, of which the garrison consisted, were to march out with the honours of war, to be embarked on the lake, and carried to New York, but protected from the barbarity of the Indians. The women and children were carried to Montreal, and the conqueror treated the sick and wounded in a manner so humane, as to prove himself worthy of victory. Thus for a second time, this self-taught general obtained an entire triumph over the boasted discipline of the French arms. But that was his least praise. Though 1100 Indians followed him to the field, he restrained them within regular bounds, and their example shewed demonstrably that the excesses which the other savages had been guilty of against the English, had been prompted and directed by the French. Those conquests opened the scene of the grand catastrophe, which was the reduction of Quebec. The French court, sensible of its importance, had for years before been fortifying it even with a profusion of works, men, and shipping; and they boasted that it was in a condition to bid defiance to all the powers of Europe. About the middle of February, a strong squadron under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes, sailed from England for Cape Breton; but finding the harbour ^g of Louisbourg frozen up, they bore away for Hallifax in Nova Scotia, from whence rear-admiral Durcell was dispatched with a small squadron to the river St. Lawrence. All he could do was to take two storeships; fourteen other vessels, with stores, ammunition, and recruits, having

- a having already reached Quebec, under the convoy of three ships of war. By this time admiral Saunders was able to make Louisbourg, and an embarkation of about 8000 men for the reduction of Quebec was effected.

MR. PITT was then one of the British secretaries of state, and considered as having the direction of the war. Perhaps one of the greatest merits of his administration consisted in his breaking through those ridiculous military forms of standing rank and seniority, that had long disgraced the British military service, and his preferring merit, courage, and ability, to every other consideration. In the mismanaged expedition against Rochfort, under Sir John Mordaunt, lieutenant-colonel James Wolfe, the son of major-general Wolfe, was an officer. When the general's conduct came under examination, he was brought as an evidence by both parties. The candour, the precision, and knowledge with which he delivered it, gained him esteem, and, though a young man, his military talents in conversation appeared with such lustre, as recommended him to the knowledge and patronage of the ministry, and his majesty king George the II. who was otherwise no friend to warlike anticipations; so that to the satisfaction of the public, he was pitched upon to command the expedition against Quebec. He had already distinguished himself in the reduction of Louisbourg, where he had given amazing proofs of his abilities, personal as well as mental; and three general officers, the sons of noble families, almost equal in years as quality, were appointed to serve under him; the brigadiers Monckton, Townshend, and Murray. Some charts which had been taken from the French, contributed to render the navigation of the British armada up the river St. Lawrence, far more safe and easy than had been given out by the French. And towards the latter end of June the land troops were disembarked upon the Isle of Orleans, which we have already mentioned to lie beneath Quebec, and which at that time was, in reality, a large continued garden, abounding not only with all the necessaries, but the delights of life. Soon after landing, the general, as is usual in cases of invasion, published a manifesto or placart in the following terms:

"THE king, justly exasperated against France, has set on foot a considerable armament by land and sea, to bring down the haughtiness of that crown. His aim is to destroy the most considerable settlements of the French in North America. It is not against the industrious peasants, their wives, and children, nor against the ministers of religion, that he designs making war. He laments the misfortunes to which this quarrel exposes them, and promises them his protection, offers to maintain them in their possessions, and permits them to follow the worship of their religion, provided that they do not take any part in the difference between the two crowns directly or indirectly."

"THE Canadians cannot be ignorant of their situation: the English are masters of the river, and blocking up the passage to all succours from Europe. They have, besides, a powerful army on the continent, under the command of general Amberst.

"THE resolution the Canadians ought to take is by no means doubtful: the utmost exertion of their valour will be entirely useless, and will only serve to deprive them of the advantages that they might enjoy by their neutrality. The cruelties of the French against the subjects of Great Britain in America, would excuse the most severe reprisals; but Englishmen are too generous to follow so barbarous examples. They offer to the Canadians the sweets of peace amidst the horrors of war; it is to their ownelves to determine their fate by their conduct. If their presumption, and a wrong placed, as well as fruitless courage, should make them take the most dangerous part, they will only have their ownelves to blame, when they shall groan under the weight of that misery to which they will expose themselves.

"General Wolfe flatters himself that the whole world will do him justice, if the inhabitants of Canada force him, by their refusal, to have recourse to violent methods." He concluded, in laying before them the strength and power of England, which generously stretched out her hand to them: a hand ready to assist them on all occasions, and even at a time when France, by its weakness, was incapable of assisting them, and abandoned them in the most critical moment.

THIS humane manifesto had no effect with the Canadians, who had been by their missionaries and officers taught, not only to hate, but to despise the English; so ridiculous was their infatuation, and so insufferable their pride. They joined the Indians in their scalping parties, and they were guilty of the greatest inhumanities against the English, so that Wolfe, after admonishing them of the necessary consequences, was obliged to give way to some retaliations. Montcalm, notwithstanding his boasted abilities, knew too much of the English, to venture a battle on equal terms, and never perhaps was there an army under such dreadful circumstances as that of Wolfe. He was disappointed of his junction with Amberst, on which he had greatly depended; and though he had found the navigation of the river St. Lawrence safe and practicable, yet he had received no information concerning the ground in the neighbourhood of Quebec, where he found the difficulties of landing on the Quebec shore, shore, to all appearance impracticable. The conduct of Montcalm, though not brilliant, ^a did honour to his judgment; for secure of the inaccessibility of that shore, he kept upon the heights of Abraham, with an army superior to that of Wolfe, which he well knew could not long remain in so indecisive a situation. In the mean while he threw five battalions of regulars into Quebec, and the Canadians accustomed to the field from their birth, were, to a man, in arms; so that their army occupied all the shore of Blaufort, from the river St. Charles to the falls of Montmorenci, fortified with intrenchments at every place that was accessible to the English. Under those circumstances all he could do was to detach brigadier Monckton with four battalions; and on the 29th of June he passed the river, to drive the enemy from Point Levi; which, after some skirmishes, he accordingly did, and took possession of that post, while colonel Carleton made himself master of the western- ^b most part of the isle of Orleans, lying nearest to Quebec. By those two operations, which it is surprising the enemy did not more vigorously oppose, the British shipping remained safe in the basin of Quebec, which otherwise it could not have done, if the enemy had erected batteries on those points. Montcalm seemed, when it was too late, to be sensible of his omission; for he sent 1600 men to destroy the batteries erected by the English at Point Levi, but without effect; and the batteries from thence entirely destroyed the lower town, and did great damage to the upper. The works for the security of the British hospitals and stores being finished on the isle of Orleans, the English passed the north channel, and encamped on the left of the enemy, from whom they were divided by the river Montmorenci. In this situation, many skirmishes passed with various success: but the enemy ^c still remained masters of all the ground between Montmorenci river and Quebec, and all the strong banks above that capital. While the two armies lay thus, general Wolfe, in reconnoitring the river Montmorenci discovered a ford that was practicable; but the bank on the opposite side was so strongly intrenched, that it could not be forced, and the English lost some men in attempting it. On the 18th of July^f, two men of war, two armed sloops, two transports, with some troops on board, passed by the town without any loss, and got into the upper river. Wolfe took this opportunity to reconnoitre the banks of the river above Quebec, which he found rendered inaccessible, equally by art as nature, and so situated that if he had been able even to effect a landing, the first detachment must have been cut off before it could have been supported by another. Not an hour passed, that ^d was not employed by the active British general, in exploring some place where he could land his men, but all to no purpose. At last, hearing that many of the enemies had taken refuge at a place called Point au Tremble, some miles above the city, colonel Carleton was dispatched with a small body to attempt it. But though he drove the Indians from it, his success was of very little consequence. After this the general returned to his camp near the falls of Montmorenci, where brigadier Townshend had destroyed a battery attempted to be raised by the enemy on the bank of the river to cannonade the British camp. But this had no great effect, farther than to secure the camp. At this time the reader is to observe that the divisions of the British ships under admiral Holmes lay above Quebec, and that under admiral Saunders below it, between the city and the westernmost ^e point of the isle of Orleans, while the transports lay at anchor in the south channel, which divided that isle from the encampment of brigadier Monckton; but the British men of war could not, for want of water, come nigh enough to the land to annoy the enemy's intrenchments.

Difficulties of Wolfe in the siege of Quebec,

and miscarriages.

WOLFE was sensible, that the eyes, not only of his own countrymen, but of all Europe, were upon him, and he resolved, under the most discouraging difficulties, to attempt a landing. Admiral Saunders prepared two transports, which drew but very little water, and therefore were proper to favour a descent. His view was to make himself master of a detached redoubt near to the water's edge, above a musket shot distance from the enemy's grand entrenchment; by which he was in hopes of either bringing them to a general en- ^f gagement, or of learning how to attack them with efficacy. On the 31st of July, in the afternoon, the boats of the fleet were filled with grenadiers, and a part of general Monckton's brigade from the point of Levi: the two brigades under the brigadiers Townshend and Murray, were ordered to be in readiness to pass the ford, when it should be thought necessary. To facilitate the passage of this corps, the admiral had placed the Centurion in the channel, so that she might check the fire of the lower battery, which commanded the ford: this ship was of great use, as her fire was very judiciously directed. A great quantity of artillery was placed upon the eminence, so as to batter and enfilade the left of their intrenchments. The two armed ships could not be brought near enough to cover the vessel that ran a ground nearest it, and the redoubt was too much commanded by the intrenchments a to be kept without great loss. The brigadiers-general, however, were ordered to be ready, brigadier Monckton to land, and the brigadiers Townshend and Murray to pass the ford. In rowing towards the shore many of the boats grounded upon a ledge, which put the whole operation into such disorder, that the general sent orders to brigadier Townshend to stop; but at last thirteen companies of grenadiers, and two hundred of the second royal American battalion got ashore to attack the French entrenchment. "The grenadiers were ordered to form themselves into four distinct bodies, and to begin the attack, supported by brigadier Monckton's corps, as soon as the troops had passed the ford, and were at hand to assist. But whether from the noise and hurry at landing, or from some other cause, the grenadiers, instead of forming themselves, as they were directed, ran on impetuously towards the enemy's b intrenchments in the utmost disorder and confusion, without waiting for the corps which were to sustain them, and join in the attack." Monckton was not then landed, Townshend was at a considerable distance, and the event was answerable to the rashness of the grenadiers, and their disregard for discipline. The enemy's first fire obliged them to shelter themselves in or about the redoubt, which the French had abandoned; but they still were exposed to a very hot fire from the intrenchments, which made it necessary for the general to call them off, that they might form themselves under brigadier Monckton's corps, which was now landed, and drawn up on the beach in extreme good order. It was now near night. A storm came on. The retreat of Townshend might have been uncertain, and a thousand c circumstances concurred to render it adviseable for the general to desist from this attack, which can be termed no other than unfortunate. Wolfe himself, in his letter to the secretary of state, intimates, as if he had no great opinion of his success. "The place (says he) where the attack was intended, has these advantages over all others hereabouts. Our artillery could be brought into use. The greatest part, or even the whole of the troops, might act at once; and the retreat (in case of a repulse) was secure, at least for a certain time of the tide. Neither one or other of these advantages can any where else be found. The beach upon which the troops were drawn up, was of deep mud, with holes, and cut by several gullies. The hill to be ascended, very steep, and not every where practicable. The enemy numerous in their entrenchments, and their fire hot. If the attack had succeeded, our loss must certainly have been great, and theirs inconsiderable, from the shelter which the neighbouring woods afforded them. The river St. Charles still remained to be passed, before the town was invested. All these circumstances I considered, but the desire to act in conformity to the king's intentions, induced me to make this trial, persuaded that a victorious army finds no difficulties."

He is defeated.

THE general then sent brigadier Murray with 1200 men up the river, to assist admiral Holmes, if possible, to destroy the French ships, and to open a communication with general Amberst. Great difficulties attended this undertaking; but after being unsuccessful in two attempts he made to land on the north shore, Murray succeeded at a place called de Chambaud, where he burnt a magazine with some provisions, ammunition, and all the spare stores, cloathing, arms, and baggage of the enemy's army. This was a service of great e importance: but still almost insurmountable difficulties remained, as nothing, with any feasibility of success, could be undertaken against the body of the place. Every day produced skirmishes, which, though of no great importance, and though generally successful on the part of the English, considerably weakened their army. "By the list we have so often quoted (says Wolfe) of disabled officers (many of whom are of rank) you may perceive, Sir, that the army is much weakened. By the nature of the river, the most formidable part of this armament is deprived of the power of acting, yet we have almost the whole force of Canada to oppose. In this situation, there is such a choice of difficulties, that I own myself at a loss how to determine. The affairs of Great Britain, I know, require the most vigorous measures; but then the courage of a handful of brave men, should be exerted only f where there is some hope of a favourable event. However, you may be assured, Sir, that the small part of the campaign, which remains, shall be employed (as far as I am able) for the honour of his majesty, and the interest of the nation, in which I am sure of being well seconded by the admiral, and by the generals. Happy if our efforts here can contribute to the success of his majesty's arms in any other parts of America."

SUCH was the situation of this arduous enterprize, when the general quitted his camp at Montmorenci, and landed his troops and artillery at Point Levi. From the vexation he had conceived from his failure at Montmorenci, he had contracted a dysentery and fever: but the sense of the mighty things expected from him, overbore all other considerations; and it was resolved, though with small probability of success, that the enemy should be again g alarmed above the river on the north side. Still no fixt plan of an attack was formed, though Wolfe, at all events, seems to have been determined upon one. At last, the most desperate one that can well be conceived was laid down by the three brigadiers, and adopted by the general, which was that of conveying the troops farther down in boats, and landing landing below the heights of Abraham, within a league of Cape Diamond. Though nothing could be more unpromising than this plan of operations, yet the general proceeded with the same precautions, as if the success had been more than probable. The movements of his troops, and those of admiral Holmes's squadron, occasioned Montcalm to detach M. Bougainville with a party of observation, consisting of 500 men to watch the motions of the English both by land and water. a

NEVER was there a scheme formed with less probability of success, than the above, and no scheme ever was more liable to disappointments, because an alarm from the musket of a single centinel must have rendered it impracticable, not to mention the prodigious difficulties of its execution, from the nature of the shore and the tide. On the 12th of September, the first embarkation, consisting of four regiments, the light infantry, a detachment of highlanders, and the American grenadiers, was made in flat bottom boats, under Monckton and Murray, about three leagues farther up the river, than the intended place of landing. The ships under admiral *Saunder*s, who lay over against Beauport, made a feint against the French intrenchments there to amuse them, and, in the mean while, by a happy mistake, the boats were carried below the intended place of attack by the rapidity of the current, but followed by the ships, who were prepared at all events to cover their landing, which they accordingly effected. The French, at this time, expected the return of Bougainville, and various were the successful arts practised by the English to make the enemies sentries believe, that the first landed troops were part of that detachment. Being landed, the boats were sent back for the second embarkation under Townshend; but nothing even then presented on all hands, but the impracticability of the ascent, Wolfe, who landed in the nature of a volunteer, with the first embarkation, told an officer who was near him, that they must do their endeavour to get up, though he did not see how it was possible. In the mean while, colonel Howe, with the light infantry and the highlanders, discovered a narrow path, slanting up the hill, by which, with the assistance of roots and boughs of trees growing on each side, it was just possible to ascend, though the path was intersected by cross ditches, and a French intrenchment lay at the top, which, however, seems to have been but slenderly guarded; so secure were the French on that quarter. The troops, gaining the summit of this path with incredible difficulty, were formed by the general, as they arrived at the summit, having dislodged the French guard at the intrenchment; so that by break of day the whole army appeared in order of battle. b

MONTCALM, when the news was brought him, could not credit the report. The ascent of troops by such a guarded precipice had never occurred to him, either in experience or reading; but the intelligence being confirmed beyond all possibility of doubt, he found all his illusive arts were at an end, and resolved on the only measure that was left him, to fight. The defeat of the English army would have rendered the operations of their fleet against the place useless, and a victory would have ranked his name amongst the most illustrious of any in history. He therefore collected together all his strength about Beauport, passed the river St. Charles, and shewed great judgment in the dispositions he made for a general engagement. Having with him about 1500 Indians and Canadians, who were excellent marksmen and bush-fighters, he lodged them in the thickets all around. He placed his regulars in the left, all but two battalions, who were to support the troops of the colony on the right, while the remainder of the Indians and Canadians were disposed so as to flank the English on the land side on their left. c

To prevent any fatal effects from this disposition of the enemy, brigadier-general Townshend, on the left, drew up his division, which consisted of six battalions, en Potence; that is, in such a manner as to present two fronts to the enemy. Brigadier-general Murray commanded in the center, and Wolfe himself served on the right wing, where a regiment was placed in reserve, formed into eight subdivisions, with large intervals. The rear and the left were protected by the light infantry under colonel Howe. It was now that the difference between English and French courage was to be tried. The ground was equal; the French were superior in numbers; and their army was drawn up to as full advantage as that of the British. In short, nothing could have given the latter the victory, but the mere superiority of personal strength and courage. Their bush-fighters began the battle, by a firing that was once irregular and unfair, because their pieces were levelled against the most gallant, and therefore the most exposed, of the British officers. The steady fire of our troops silenced those barbarians; and the English sailors, with a spirit that none but Englishmen could have exerted, had drawn up the amazing precipice, by which the army ascended, a cannon, of which they made excellent use; but the French, in this respect, had the advantage, for they had in their front two field pieces. About nine in the morning, the French advanced a front, which shewed that they intended to do somewhat that was decisive; and the battle soon became general. The fire of the French, though frequent, was destitute of that steadiness, which characterizes national courage; but that of the British, which d a which was kept up till their enemy was within forty yards of their line, took place with such effect, that the main body of the French was staggered. General Wolfe was stationed in the front of brigadier Monckton's division on the right, at the head of Bragg's regiment, and the Louisbourg grenadiers, opposite to the French battalions of Languedoc, Bearn, and Guienne; but their left flanked by a body of colonists, bush fighters, who took aim and wounded the brave general in the wrist, as he stood exposed in the front of his battalions. He felt the wound; but far from betraying any symptom of pain or disorder, he wrapped a handkerchief round his arm, and was advancing at the head of the grenadiers, with their bayonets fixed, when he was wounded with another shot, and that mortal. Nature could no longer support him. He leaned on the shoulder of a lieutenant, who kneeled down, b that he might the more conveniently uphold him. While he was in the agonies of death, the lieutenant called out, "They run." "Who run?" replied the general. "The French." "Do the cowards run already!" were Wolfe's last words. "Then I die happy," and expired (T).

gained by the English.

Death of general Wolfe.

THE right continued regularly to press on with their fixt bayonets; but the most effectual execution was done by the division under Murray, many of whom were highlanders, who, drawing their broad swords, drove the French before them, some into the town, and others into the works, which they had raised at the bridge of the river St. Charles. The French still depended on their outflanking the English; but their right was so briskly plied by colonel Howe, that they obtained little or no benefit from that disposition. In the mean while, brigadier Monckton, who was next in command to Wolfe, was, by a wound thought to be mortal, which he received at the head of Lascelles's regiment, rendered incapable of acting; and thus the command devolved upon brigadier Townshend, who advanced platoons against the front, and remained at the head of Amherst's regiment to support his disposition, till, hearing that the command was devolved upon him, he was obliged to hasten to the center, where he new formed the troops, that were somewhat disordered by the pursuit. By this time, the battle was completely gained; and it is hard to say to what species of true British courage it was chiefly owing. The activity of the highlanders, the discipline of the grenadiers, and the undaunted spirit of all the other troops, rendered the victory not only glorious, but cheap, if we except the death of the brave general. But courage was not that day more conspicuous, than coolness and wisdom amongst the British troops. d Bougainville, whom we have already mentioned to have been detached with a party of observation now increased to 2000 men, appeared in the rear of the English, immediately after they had gained the battle; but, by the prudent dispositions, which Mr. Townshend made, he found himself obliged to retire to swamps, and woody fastnesses. It is true, he might, even there, have been forced; but the active commander judged better. His victory was complete, his situation favourable, and the reduction of Quebec, the great object of the expedition, more than probable, and yet might have been hazarded by a fresh action, and therefore Mr. Townshend most wisely declined to crown glory with ostentation.

WITH regard to the particulars of the battle, never was there such an immense country c conquered at so cheap an expence of men. The English lost about fifty men killed, and about five hundred wounded; and the French about 1500, but about 1000 of them were made prisoners, of whom a great number were officers. The fugitives reinforced the garrison of Quebec. The remainder retired to Point au Tremble, thence to another post called Jaques Quartiers, and, at last, to Trois Rivières and Montreal. The fates of the chief commanders were remarkably similar; Montcalm, as well as Wolfe, was mortally wounded, and carried to Quebec, where he expired in discharging the decent, but superfluous, duty of writing a letter, recommending the French prisoners, to British generosity; a request, that, of all mankind, came from him with the worst grace, but was more than punctually complied with. His second in command, like Monckton, was wounded, but, like him, did f not survive; for, being taken prisoner, he expired next day on board an English ship. Few generals ever died more lamented, or under more advantageous circumstances, than Mr. Wolfe did. Though not above thirty four years of age, he achieved the most permanent, if not important, conquest, that this age can boast of. The character drawn by Tacitus of g Agricola seems to have been the model of his conduct in military life; for so well was he acquainted with the classics, that he wrote with the elegance, as well as fought with the spirit, of Cæsar. To the genius of a hero, he added the accomplishments of a general, without disdaining even the most mechanical. His affability and openness of disposition endeared him to his soldiers, and convinced them that the strictness of discipline he required of them was equally necessary for the safety as their glory. Temperate, vigilant and observing, he reduced the military art to a system, which had those qualities for its basis; for his own heart told him, that courage is no distinguishing property in a soldier, because it is, or ought to be, in common with all mankind; and is to be found in the ranks, equally as at the head of an army. His humanity was distinguished, and his manner of expressing himself was remarkably precise and intelligible. In his person, he was strait, well limbed and genteel; but he had something in his countenance, that was equally uncommon and unpromising; and, till he spoke, by no means prepossessing in his favour. Rigid disciplinarians may perhaps condemn his exposing his person too much in the day of battle. But this, if a fault, was one of the noblest kind; and, considering his circumstances, and the mighty expectations of his country, perhaps necessary.

(T) Some accounts bear that Mr. Wolfe received three wounds before he died.

Surrender and capitulation of Quebec.

THOUGH the battle of Quebec was gained, yet that city was not reduced. The works of the upper town were still in excellent order, and its garrison strong, and provided with all the requisites for making a noble defence. On the other hand, the admirals Saunders, Holmes, and Durell, who had all along acted with admirable, and almost unprecedented, unanimity with the land officers, made dispositions with their ships, for attacking the lower town, as general Townshend did for besieging the higher. Perhaps a British garrison, even though they had been, as that of Quebec was, cut off from the field, would not have capitulated; the French did: and, before a battery could be finished against the city, a flag of truce was hung out, and the following articles were agreed upon by eight the next morning.

Articles of capitulation demanded by M. de Ramsay, commander for his Most Christian Majesty in the higher and lower town of Québec, knight of the military order of St. Lewis, from his excellency the general commanding his Britannic majesty's forces.

ARTICLE I. M. de Ramsay demands the honours of war for his garrison, and that it shall be conducted back to the army in safety by the shortest road, with their arms, baggage, six pieces of brass cannon, two mortars or howitzers, and twelve rounds.—The garrison of the town, composed of land-forces, marines, and sailors, shall march out with their arms and baggage, drums beating, lighted matches, with two pieces of cannon and twelve rounds, and shall be embarked as conveniently as possible, in order to be landed at the first port in France.

ARTICLE II. That the inhabitants shall be maintained in the possession of their houses, goods, effects, and privileges.—Granted, provided they lay down their arms.

ARTICLE III. That the said inhabitants shall not be molested on account of their having borne arms for the defence of the town, as they were forced to it, and as it is customary for the inhabitants of the colonies of both crowns to serve as militia.—Granted.

ARTICLE IV. That the effects belonging to the absent officers or inhabitants, shall not be touched.—Granted.

ARTICLE V. That the said inhabitants shall not be removed, nor obliged to quit their houses, until their condition shall be settled by a definitive treaty between their most Christian and Britannic majesties.—Granted.

ARTICLE VI. That the exercise of the catholic and Roman religion shall be preserved, and that safe-guards shall be granted to the houses of the clergy, and to the monasteries, particularly to the bishop of Quebec, who, animated with zeal for religion, and charity for the people of his diocese, desires to reside constantly in it, to exercise freely, and with that decency, which his character, and the sacred mysteries of the catholic, apostolic, and Roman religion require, his episcopal authority in the town of Quebec, wherever he shall think it proper, until the possession of Canada shall have been decided by a treaty between their most Christian and Britannic majesties.—The free exercise of the Roman religion. Safe-guards granted to all religious persons, as well as to the bishop, who shall be at liberty to come and exercise freely, and with decency the functions of his office, wherever he shall think proper, until the possession of Canada shall have been decided between their Britannic and most Christian majesties.

ARTICLE VII. That the artillery and warlike stores shall be delivered up bona fide, and an inventory taken thereof.—Granted.

ARTICLE VIII. That the sick, wounded, commissaries, chaplains, physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, and other persons employed in the hospitals, shall be treated agreeable to the cartel, settled between their most Christian and Britannic majesties on the 6th of February, 1759.—Granted.

ARTICLE IX. That before delivering up the gate, and the entrance of the town, to the English forces, their general will be pleased to send some soldiers to be placed as safe-guards at the churches, convents, and chief habitations.—Granted.

ARTICLE X. That the commander of the city of Quebec shall be permitted to send advice to the marquis de Vaudreuil, governor-general, of the reduction of the town; as also that this general shall be allowed to write to the French ministry, to inform them thereof.—Granted.

ARTICLE

A ARTICLE XI. That the present capitulation shall be executed according to its form and tenour, without being liable to non-execution, under pretence of reprisals, or the non-execution of any preceding capitulation.—Granted.

The present treaty has been made and settled between us, and duplicates signed at the camp before Quebec, the 18th of September, 1759.

Charles Saunders, George Townshend, De Ramsay.

THE conclusion of this capitulation was the more sensible, because the French and the Canadians were assembling in great numbers in the rear of the British army, where, if any impression had been made, it might have been attended with a most dreadful reverse of fortune. We may add to this, that the season was so far advanced, as to render it unsafe for the British fleet to continue in the river St. Lawrence, or their troops to keep the field. The capitulation, which overthrew all the schemes of the French, being finished, the upper as well as the lower town was completely garrisoned by British troops. The enemy, in the mean while, were not idle, M. de Bougainville was ready at the head of eight hundred men, with a sufficient convoy of provisions, to have thrown himself into the town, upon the 18th, the morning on which it surrendered, the place then being accessible, because not completely invested. Next day, all kind of precautions having been taken for the preservation of order and discipline, the prisoners, who were about 1000 in number, were embarked for France on board transports. Thus, this amazing and almost miraculous conquest of Quebec was effected, while the enemy, under the command of M. de Levi, the governor of Montreal, had still an army in the field, while the fortifications of Quebec itself were yet undamaged, though its houses were demolished, and while the garrison had still a communication with their army.

BUT though the French thus notoriously failed in point of courage, they were so successful in craft, that they instigated the Cherokees to butcher the English subjects. Mr. Lyttleton, governor of South Carolina, marching in person at the head of 1100 men, obliged them to agree to a peace, which, no sooner was he returned to his government, than they broke. Mr. Amherst, who was still continuing his operations against the French, upon the application of the southern British colonies, sent colonel Montgomery, at the head of 1200 men, to chastize their perfidy; which he did in a most exemplary manner, by destroying all the villages and towns in the lower division, which were remarkably well provided and situated. The rest of the operations against the Indians in this campaign, belong to another part of this work. We are now to attend those against the capital of Canada.

The Cherokees chastised.

BRIGADIER Monckton, who, by Wolfe's death, became first in command there, being happily recovered of his wound, brigadier Murray, who was now the third in command, was appointed to the government of Quebec, with a garrison consisting of about 6000 men. General Amherst was then wintering in New York, from whence he could the most easily recommence his operations against Canada in the spring, and lord Colvil was stationed, with a strong squadron of ships, at Hallifax in Nova Scotia, with orders to visit Quebec, as soon as the navigation of the river St. Lawrence should be free from ice. Brigadier Murray, in the mean while, made indefatigable; and indeed incredible, efforts to secure his government from the attempts of his enemies, both within and without, where he knew them to be very strong. Above five hundred houses were repaired in the winter; magazines of all kinds were amassed; the fortifications were improved; the disaffected inhabitants in the neighbourhood were disarmed; and such active movements were made by surprising the advanced posts of the enemy, that not only the inhabitants of Quebec, but those of eleven parishes around, from whence provisions and firing could be brought, took the oaths to the British government; as did great numbers of the inhabitants on the south side of the river. It is surprizing, that the French, a nation seldom deficient in activity, should tamely suffer all those precautions to be carried into execution, with little or no resistance on their part. Levi and Bougainville must have been destitute either of resolution or courage, or both. They were at the head of troops used to the climate; they had advanced their troops to Point au Tremble, St. Augustin, and Le Calvaire; their main body lay at Trois Rivières and Jaques Quartier; and they were provided with snow shoes, fascines, scaling-ladders, and all the preparatives for regaining the capital of Canada during the winter, besides amassing large quantities of provisions at Point Levi. All those dispositions came to nothing, through the active vigilance of the British general. He surprized their magazines, cut off their communications, and beat, or carried off, their advanced posts; so that they resolved to delay the siege of Quebec, on pretext that they could more effectually undertake it in the spring. This pretext was not without foundation. They had still abundance of shipping left, which lay up the river, and which they refitted, so as to transport every thing proper for besieging Quebec in form; and when the frost broke up, up, those ships with troops on board, falling down the river, landed at St. Augustine, and forced the English out-post to retire to the city, which they however did without loss. a

BUT the French preparations were not near so dangerous to the garrison, as its own condition. During the inclemency of the winter, the intense cold, the want of vegetables, and the scarcity of fresh provision, had introduced amongst the soldiers scorbutic disorders, which had cut off 1000 of them, and had rendered above 2000 of them unfit for service. Thus the garrison did not consist of above 3000 effective men. De Levi's army, on the other hand, amounted to eight battalions, and forty regimented companies of colony troops; so greatly improved was Canada of late in its strength and population. Mr. Murray, at first, thought of intrenching his troops on the heights of Abraham; but the frost continued still to be so deeply lodged in the ground, that he could not execute his lines. He then secured the landing-places at Cape Rouge and Toulon, together with his own posts, which the French were making dispositions to cut off. When he returned to Quebec, a thousand dangers and difficulties presented to him upon the expediency of standing a siege; and trusting to the well-known valour of his troops, he resolved to give the enemy battle, though their army amounted to above 12,000 men, and 500 savages; and perhaps, every thing considered, and all circumstances weighed, this resolution was as prudent as it was brave, especially as he was provided with a fine train of artillery. b

ON the 28th of April, in the morning, he set out at the head of his little army, scarcely 3000 men, and formed it in order of battle upon the heights. The right brigade consisted of the regiments of Amkerst, Anstruther, Webb, and the second battalion of the royal Americans, under the command of colonel Burton. Colonel Frazer commanded the left, which was formed by the highlanders, and the regiments of Kennedy, Lascelles, and Townshend; as the body of reserve was of Otway's and the third battalion of royal Americans. The right flank was covered by major Dalling's light infantry; the left by captain Hazzen's rangers, with an hundred volunteers under captain Macdonald; and two field pieces were assigned to each battalion. At first, the general descending from the heights of Abraham, his troops beat the enemy from some woody eminencies they had taken possession of, but their main army advanced with order and rapidity, and formed in columns, though in danger of being disordered by their advanced-post giving way. Their fire upon the British battalions, who pursued their van, was hot and regular, and stopt their progress; while their superiority of numbers, after their center was secured, gave them the advantage of outflanking the English both on the right and left, and bidding fair to close upon their rear. All this time, a most furious fire and charge was kept up from the center of the French, which drove the light infantry first towards the front of their own right, and then towards the rear, where they found they had suffered so much, that they could not again be brought to the charge. Notwithstanding this, the enemy could not break the British right wing, which was supported by Otway's regiment from the reserve; but the left wing, after gaining vast advantages, was overpowered by numbers, and obliged to give way, the French fighting with unusual ardour. The disorder of the left wing communicating itself to the right, and the whole in danger of being entirely surrounded, the general thought fit to retreat; which he did with great courage and conduct, after having the third part of his army killed or wounded, and being obliged to leave the greatest part of his artillery, which it was impossible to drag off, through the wreaths of snow which still lay on the ground. In this battle the French, who may be said to have fought it for fighting sake, lost above 2000 men, and after it they made not the least effort to improve it. c

Quebec relieved.

IT is true, they opened the trenches before Quebec the very night after the battle was fought, and were employed for several days in landing cannon, mortars, and ammunition, out of three ships, which were anchored below their camp; but it was the 11th of May before they opened a battery, while general Murray made such preparations for the defence of the place, as proved that his spirit had grown upon his defeat; for he planted an hundred and thirty-two pieces of artillery, most of them dragged along by the soldiery, upon the ramparts. Lord Colville had sailed from Hallifax on the 22d of April with his fleet; but the ice, and other inconveniencies of fogs and winds retarded his progress. Commodore Swanton had sailed from England with a squadron, but had stopped in the beginning of May, at the isle of Bec, in the river St. Lawrence, till he could be joined by some of his squadron, from whom he had separated. One of his missing ships, the Lowe's offe, commanded by captain Deane, had proceeded to Quebec, and entered that harbour the 9th of May, with the joyful accounts of the only relief, which the garrison could depend upon, being at hand; and, on the 15th, the commodore himself anchored above Point Levi. Next morning, captain Schomberg, in the Diana, and captain Deane, attacked two French frigates, and two armed ships with a considerable number of other vessels, and totally took, burnt, or destroyed them. Levi, the French general, beheld, from the heights of Abraham this mortifying catastrophe, this dreadful demolition of all his towering hopes. He concluded that d a that the ships, which had done the execution, were only the fore-runners of an invincible armada then in the river, and he formed a resolution of abandoning the siege, at the very time, when Mr. Murray was preparing to attack him in his entrenchments, to repair the discredit of his late defeat.

MURRAY soon learned that the enemy had abandoned their trenches, and that too, so precipitately, that they had left behind them their provisions, tools, and artillery. He endeavoured to overtake them; but, though he made some prisoners, they retreated with such haste, that he could only take a large quantity of their baggage. The artillery, which fell in his hands, amounted to thirty four pieces of battering cannon, ten field pieces, six mortars, four petards, with all the other stores and implements in proportion. Levi, after remaining some time at Jaques Quartier, retired to Montreal, where Vaudreuil was; and the latter, to support the spirit of the Canadians, circulated letters amongst them full of the most ridiculous falsehoods concerning the weakness of the English, and the prosperity of the French affairs in Europe: particularly, that their king was then in Holland at the head of 200,000 men. Those arts, childish as they may now seem, might have had their designed effect upon so uninformed a people as the Canadians, had it not been for their recent and severe experience of English power and courage. But his credit, great as it was, could not take from them their feeling; so that the inaccessibility of the country was all he had to depend upon, till a general peace could be effected in Europe.

c MR. AMHERST, notwithstanding all the discouragements he had met with, did not relax in his dispositions for completing the conquest of Canada. He sent colonel Haviland to take possession of the Isle aux Noix in lake Champlain, and from thence to gain the banks of the river St. Lawrence: then he dispatched instructions to general Murray to advance up the river to Montreal, with all the force he could spare from his garrison. He himself, with the main body of the army, consisting of about 10,000 men, including Indians, leaving the province of New York, was to proceed by the rivers of the Mohawks and Oneidas to lake Ontario, from whence he was to fall down the river St. Lawrence, and to join Mr. Murray at Montreal. Except the expeditions of Genghis Khan, perhaps so arduous a march as this never was projected, and never was there a march, depending on so many distant events, so happily accomplished. It was the latter end of June, before the general, after providing all the necessary means of navigating the lake Ontario, left Schenectady; and, on the 9th of July, he reached Oswego, the place of his army's rendezvous. Here they were joined by 1000 Troquois, under Sir William Johnson; and, on the 10th of August, notwithstanding the numerous inconveniencies and difficulties, that were to be obviated and conquered, the whole army was embarked on lake Ontario; a small detachment having been sent before in vessels, to prepare the way for the embarkation to advance up the river St. Lawrence. On the 27th, he entered that river, and took possession of Swegatchie, and afterwards invested L'Isle Royale, which lies farther down the river, and is one of its most important posts. After having run ashore a French sloop, and taken another, batteries being erected, the fort of L'Isle Royale was briskly cannonaded, and surrendered on capitulation by its commandant M. Pouchaut. The general thought this post of so much consequence, that he repaired it, and left it garrisoned. His greatest difficulty was still to surmount, we mean his navigation from thence to the river St. Lawrence; which was rendered extremely dangerous by the rapids he had to encounter. Yet, even this impediment was vanquished with the loss of some artillery and stores, forty-six battoes, seventeen whale-boats, a row-galley, and above eighty men. This discouraging voyage was performed, from the time of the troops leaving Schenectady, to that of their landing at Montreal, which they did on the 6th of September, in two months and seventeen days. The enemy, by this time, more than probably had given over all serious thoughts of making a defence. The British Indians were exasperated to the highest degree, by the recent marks they had discovered during the voyage, of the cruelties of the French savages, and eagerly waited for an opportunity to retaliate them. Montreal was reduced to the most dreadful distress, by an universal famine; the Canadians never having been remarkably provident, and discovering the gross impostures, that had been practised upon them, they conceived both a hatred and contempt for their commanders. Add to this, that, though the town of Montreal itself might have made a good resistance against provincials and Indians, yet its fortifications were in no condition to stand a regular siege, against an army provided as that under Amherst was. But it is now time to attend the motions of general Murray.

Progress of general Amherst,

who takes Isle Royale;

and, after a
voyage,

By the manifestoes he published, he had disposed the inhabitants of the south shore of the river St. Lawrence to submit and take the oath of neutrality, while lord Rollo made himself master of Trois Rivières without resistance, and disarmed the inhabitants on the north side. It is amazing, that Levi, the French general, who kept at Murray's rear with his army, made no attempt to stop his progress, but abandoned every post he came to.

When Murray came to the village of Sorel, he found it deserted, and the inhabitants in arms, “ I was, therefore, (says he, in his letter to the secretary of state, which does immortal honour to his humanity) under the cruel necessity of burning the greatest part of the houses of this poor unhappy people. I pray God, this example may suffice, for my nature revolts, when this becomes a necessary part of my duty.” On the 24th, he arrived at Contecaur, which lies within nine miles of Montreal, under the discouraging circumstance of not having heard all this while of general Amberst or his operations; but he was resolved, at all events, to have attempted the conquest of Montreal with his own troops.

In the mean while, Mr. Amberst landed at La Chine without opposition, and taking precautions for the security of his boats, after a march of two leagues, he formed his army on a plain before the town, being provided with two twelve pounders, and some other pieces of field artillery. His troops passed all that night under arms, and next morning, being the 7th of September, Vaudreuil sent Bougainville and another officer with a letter, proposing a capitulation, and a copy of the articles he was willing to agree to. All that this produced was a cessation of arms for a few hours; and Amberst returned the terms, which he was willing to grant. Levi, who, by this time, had arrived with his troops at Montreal, interposed to have the English terms mitigated, and general Murray having now landed below the town, Amberst's terms were accepted of on the morning of the 8th, with mutual expressions of politeness on both sides.

THE chief of the articles were, That the garrison of Montreal was to lay down their arms, and not to serve during the war, as were all the French troops at Detroit, Michillimakinac, and other places of Canada, the whole of which was now to be considered as being subject to his Britannic majesty. The Canadian militia were to return home without molestation, but all warlike stores were to be delivered up, through the whole province, to the British army; while the marquis of Vaudreuil, with all the chief military officers, who should chuse it, were to be conveyed in British ships to France, as likewise were all the civil officers who desired the same. The exercise of the Roman catholic religion was to continue to the inhabitants under certain restrictions. In short, the capitulation was extremely favourable to the French, considering their situation; but the wording of it, it being drawn up by themselves, was tedious and tautologous. We shall here but just mention, that general Murray's difficult voyage from Quebec to Montreal, was so happily conducted by captain Deane, that he did not lose a boat or a man during the whole; and that before the capitulation was signed, colonel Haviland, with his detachment, landed on the south side of the river opposite to Montreal. Thus was effected the conquest of this extensive province; and it would be doing injustice to the chief officers employed under the general, not to insert his own account of their conduct, which he sent home to the government of England.

A passage of his letter to the secretary of state.

“ I SHOULD not (said he) do justice to general Murray and colonel Haviland, if I did not assure you they have executed the orders I gave them to the utmost of my wishes. I must also beg leave to say I am obliged to brigadier-general Gage for the assistance he has given me, and I have taken the liberty to give, in public orders, my assurances to the three armies, that I would take the first opportunity of acquainting the king with the zeal and bravery, which has always been exerted by the officers and soldiers of the regular and provincial troops; as also by his majesty's faithful Indian allies. Sir William Johnson has taken unwearied pains in keeping the Indians in humane bounds; and I have the pleasure to assure you, that not a peasant, woman, or child, has been hurt by them, or a house burnt, since I entered what was the enemy's country. I shall now use my utmost endeavours for settling every thing in this country, to keep a sure possession of it; and I shall immediately dispose of the troops in such a manner, that I may completely finish the forts, which were begun last year; and, as far as the season will permit me, I shall repair or erect such forts or posts, as may be necessary for strengthening and insuring the future command of the lakes, with the possession of every part of the south side of the river St. Lawrence.”

French ships destroyed in the bay of Chaleurs.

No sooner was the capitulation signed than colonel Haldiman took possession of Montreal with the grenadiers, and the light infantry of the line, and brought off in triumph the colours of Pepperell's and Shirley's regiments, that had been taken at Oswego, and deposited at Montreal as trophies. Brigadier general Gage was appointed governor of the place, with a garrison of 2000 men. Mr. Murray returned to Quebec, where his garrison was augmented to 4000. During Mr. Amberst's expedition, the object of which was no secret to the French, that court had given orders for equipping the Machaux frigate of thirty guns, two large storeships, and nineteen sail of smaller vessels, most of which had been taken from the British traders, which was accordingly done. While they were on their voyage they received intelligence of the British squadron having proceeded up the river St. Lawrence; upon which they thought proper to take shelter in the bay of Chaleurs on the coast of a of Acadia. Captain Byron was then senior officer of the British ships at Louisbourg, and receiving intelligence from brigadier general Whitmore of the enemy lying at Ristigouchi at the bottom of that bay, he immediately sailed with the Fame, Dorsetshire, Achilles, Scarborough, and Repulse, and destroyed them all, together with two batteries and two hundred houses, besides ruining the French settlements there.

THIS gave the finishing blow to the power of France upon the continent of North America; an event productive of many reflexions. Had the French court exerted half the expence of men, money, and shipping, in establishing this colony, that it did in endeavouring to save it, it must have been inaccessible to the British arms. Though enough cannot be said in praise of the courage and conduct of the officers and soldiers, who achieved the conquest, yet it cannot be denied, that great part of it was owing to their good fortune. The immense preparations made by three separate armies, to reduce such a place as Montreal, exceeded perhaps the importance of the object; but it is without a precedent in history, that the three armies, which marched against it in such different directions, should all meet at the same place within twenty-four hours of each other. The province in general was in a worse condition than our generals seem to have apprehended, and when the inhabitants appeared before Mr. Amherst, misery and famine were painted in their countenances; so that in fact they were saved by being subdued; for the British general was so humane as to give them bread and provisions from his own stores. The French colonists of Miramichi, Reckebou, and other places, newly colonized, had before this time made their submission to colonel Frye, the commandant of fort Cumberland at Ghigneto in the most formal manner, and had engaged for themselves and their constituents, that they would in the spring repair with their ships and effects to Bay Verte, there to be disposed of according to the direction of colonel Lawrence, the British governor of Hallifax. In this submission they were accompanied by two Mickmack deputies, who likewise put themselves under the protection of the English.

All Canada reduced, and ceded to the English by the treaty of Paris.

THE great object of the war between Great Britain and France, being now accomplished on the part of the former, by the reduction of all Canada, and thereby disabling the French from extending their encroachments upon the English possessions, which were now fully secured; the fate of that province became a capital consideration at the conferences for peace, which were opened between the two crowns, soon after the accession of his present majesty king George the third, in 1761. The public is sufficiently apprized of the progress of that negotiation, which is foreign to this part of our work, any farther than it relates to Canada. By Vaudreuil's capitulation at Montreal, the English general insisted upon him and his officers giving up all the charts and plans relating to that colony, or its dependencies; and according to the report of the English officers, Vaudreuil made them far more extensive than Mr. Bussy, the French minister at London, and his court, were willing to admit of; but the English still insisted upon having the boundaries fixed as they had been described by Vaudreuil. This was an important article and made some noise; upon which Vaudreuil wrote a letter to the duke de Choiseul, solemnly disclaiming all that had been alledged by the English on that head, and that he had never furnished the English with any maps; but that a British officer afterwards coming to him with a map, he told him the limits marked upon it were not just, and that Louisiana not being comprehended under the term, Canada, which he had always made use of, extended on one side to the carrying-place of the Miamis, which is the height of the lands, whose rivers run into the Ouabache, and on the other to the head of the river Illinois.

October 30, 1761.

THE assertion of this Frenchman did not greatly draw the attention of the people of England, who were divided on another head, namely, whether it was most eligible to give up Canada, or the French islands that had been reduced in the West Indies. The truth is, interested considerations had a great share in this dispute; but the government, as well as the majority of the public, was of opinion, that, if a cession must be made, it ought to be that of the islands; and that Canada should be retained, as best answering the original purposes of the war. The subsequent advantages gained by Great Britain, rendered the disputes concerning the limits of Canada of no significance; because not only that country, but Louisiana itself, all but New Orleans, and a district about it, was ceded to Great Britain by the treaty of Paris, on the 10th of February, 1763. By the 13th article of that treaty, his most Christian majesty renounces all pretensions, which he has heretofore formed, or might form, to Nova Scotia, or Acadia, in all its parts, and guaranties the whole of it, and with all its dependencies, to the king of Great Britain: Moreover, his most Christian majesty cedes and guaranties to his said Britannic majesty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies; as well as the island of Cape Breton, and all the other islands and coasts in the gulph and river of St. Lawrence; and, in general, every thing that depends on the said countries, lands, islands, and coasts, with the sovereignty, property, possession, and

and all rights, acquired by treaty or otherwise, which the most Christian king, and the crown of France, have had, till now, over the said countries, islands, lands, places, coasts, and their inhabitants, so that the most Christian king cedes and makes over the whole to the said king, and to the crown of Great Britain, and that in the most ample manner and form, without restriction, and without any liberty to depart from the said cession and guarantee, under any pretence, or to disturb Great Britain in the possessions abovementioned. His Britannic majesty, on his side, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada. He will consequently give the most effectual orders, that his new Roman catholic subjects may profess the worship of their religion, according to the rites of the Romish church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit. His Britannic majesty further agrees, that the French inhabitants, or others, who had been the subjects of the most Christian king in Canada, may retire with all safety and freedom, wherever they shall think proper, and may sell their estates, provided it be to the subjects of his Britannic majesty, and bring away their effects, as well as their persons, without being restrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatsoever, except that of debts, or of criminal prosecutions: the term limited for their emigration shall be fixed to the space of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the present peace.

Reflexion.

We shall conclude our account of Canada with one reflexion, highly interesting to its new possessors, which is, that it is greatly to be wished, before the country had been ceded to Great Britain, some care had been taken to have obtained the consent of the savages, as to what regards their subjection to our crown. It already appears from many bloody effects, that they either did not consider the French as being authorized to subject them to England; or that the jesuits and popish missionaries are now exciting them to renew all their barbarities against our fellow-subjects; but it is to be hoped, that the prudent and vigorous measures taken by our government, will soon have their due effect, not only in repressing, but humanizing those barbarians.
